Minority students preview Williams' science courses

Happy any chance you might have to see Williamstown, the New England museum one Saturday afternoon in June, you might have seen about a dozen students from Williams College, each with a clipboard and a pen, looking for a place to sit down and talk to the students.

The students, who were part of the Williams College Science Outreach Program, were looking for a place to sit down and talk to the students. The program is a joint effort of Williams College and the New England Aquarium.

The program is a joint effort of Williams College and the New England Aquarium. The program is a joint effort of Williams College and the New England Aquarium.

The college asked black and Hispanic students who had expressed an interest in any one of the sciences or a career in medicine on their college applications to participate in the program, and a number accepted, according to mathematics professor Olga Beaver, the program's director.

The purpose of the program is to give the students an interest in the sciences, and to give them a chance to see the world through the eyes of a scientist. When the program was in the planning stages, the number of minority students at Williams College could be counted on the fingers of one hand.

Beaver said that the program is intended to show the students the joys of science, math, and computer science programs at Williams, and to show them what they can do in high school preparation for college courses.

These are bright students, she said. We would be happy if they remain in the sciences in any capacity, and would be very happy if they go on to do research, and still happier if they decide to go to medical school.

The College spent approximately $10,000 on the program, which included providing transportation, food, and a computer board to each of the 12 students who participated. Two of the students were from Southern Africa.

Joan Davis '88, one of the group's two leaders, said she thought the program was fairly successful because it has helped the students adjust to their new world at Williams, and it should help the students adjust to going to school at a small college in a predominantly white town.

Davis said that because the program was so brand new, this summer there were some rough edges that had to be worked out.

One of those rough edges was that the students still had to do an unnecessarily heavy workload.

At the start of the program, the students had to attend a lecture in the morning, a lab in the afternoon, and a lecture in the evening. The students had to attend a lecture in the morning, a lab in the afternoon, and a lecture in the evening. Student rental disturbs neighbors

by Debbie Snyder

Williams students who seek to live off-campus in the near future may find that residential areas of Williamstown have been re-zoned to prohibit rental housing on streets where it is now permitted. Martha Mercer, of 22 Thomas St., hopes that one of those streets will be hers.

Mercer said she discovered a few weeks ago that the house at 23 Thomas St., which had earlier been occupied by its owner, is occupied by five Williams students this year. The house had been sold, and its new owner, Elaine Hantman, had rented the house to a Williams senior, who had then sublet to four of her friends, Mercer said.

"My reaction was not just to the students," Mercer said. "It was that what was a private house had suddenly turned into a commercial business without having had to go before the zoning board, the planning board or the abutters."

Mercer voiced her objections at the Williamstown Selectmen's meeting September 14. Other residents of Thomas St. accompanied her and echoed her concerns that rental property decreases the value of neighboring properties and that students, who only rent houses for one year, do not contribute to the community.

Williamstown building inspector Richard C. Millanesi said that he visited 23 Thomas St. three times, accompanied the third time by the fire chief, and that he found the residence conforms to the Williamstown zoning by-laws.

"The fire chief and I will keep a close eye on the situation, but want to avoid harassing the tenants any further," Millanesi wrote in a September 17 memo to Town Manager Steven L. Ledoux.

"If the town's residents have problems with the rental of single-family dwellings which are in turn subleased to boarders, then the by-law should address this issue. At present it does not," the memo said. "I am working with town planner Barbara Bashevkin to determine if it is possible to resolve this problem to the satisfaction of all those concerned and avoid any such situations in the future."

Associate Dean of the College Mary Kenyatta said she met with the students last Wednesday to discuss their relations with their neighbors on Thomas St. "I suggested they write a letter to all their neighbors introducing themselves and saying that if anyone had any problems to contact them," she said.

Kenyatta said town residents are often concerned that having rental properties in their neighborhoods will lower the value of the real estate and that students who rent houses will aggravate an already acute shortage of moderate-income rental housing.

"We don't want more people living off campus," she said.

The students living on Thomas St. declined to comment.

College reduces plots on Pine Cobble to 70

by Allison Werthelm

The college's plan to create 70 lots for faculty housing on Pine Cobble came closer to reality this summer.

The Williamstown Planning Board approved the preliminary subdivision plan and the Zoning Board of Appeals approved the college's plan to build a cluster housing development on the 212-acre plot off North Hoosac Road.

According to attorney Bruce Grinnell, who represents the college, the next step in the process is to file a definitive subdivision plan and an environmental impact statement.

If the project is approved, the college will develop the land into 70 lots and sell them to faculty and staff members for the building of houses. College officials have said the development is needed because of the low availability and high cost of real estate in Williamstown.

The Planning Board approved the college's preliminary subdivision plan at a July meeting. At the meeting, the college revised the original subdivision plan, which called for the development of 83 lots, and reduced that number to 70.

College attorneys cited objections to building houses above the 1150 foot mark, which the original 83-lot plan called for, as the reason for the revision, according to Planning Board Chairman Charles Schlesinger.

Schlesinger said several people objected to the original plan because they felt that homes situated above 1150 feet mark would be visible from the town below. He added that some people feared that construction above 1150 feet might interfere with a water recharge area located at that elevation.

A cluster housing development such as the one planned by Williams involves putting

The Administration's Drinking Game

When people recall the Log that died in June of 1985, they remember an institution now almost totally absent from daily campus life. What's more, they tend to get a melancholy glint in their eye as they muse about the good times, good friends and good drink that used to be available at the far end of Spring Street.

The Log, of course, was not all that the warm fog of memory (or the hazy smog of an overcrowded Purple Pub) might now make it appear. To many students, the Log was irrelevant to campus life; its demise probably meant little to them. To some it may even have appeared a relief from the inordinate social pressures fostered by such a drinking establishment.

Nonetheless, the Log holds a treasured spot in the hearts and minds of many who still remember it. And many still express a wish that the Log would return in all its drinking-age-be-damned splendor.

That Log, though, is gone. Here to stay is the increase of the Massachusetts drinking age from 20 to 21 and the concurrent tightening of liability laws. To muse about a lost love, however fond it may have been, is ultimately pointless if our objective is to make the best of what we have.

And that should be our objective, for after two years, the Log has not been able to establish a workable role for itself as a campus bar. Some progress has been made in other spheres: the introduction of Log lunches and an increase in Log entertainment. But the Log as a campus bar has not reappeared in any workable form.

Many schools — even those of Williams' small size — manage to support campus pubs that are both popular and legal in their operations. For the administration to concede defeat in achieving such a balance would be a loss to Williams.

The Log is, of course, open for business at night as a campus pub. But with the exception of occasionally successful senior nights, the Log as bar is a failure.

There are two reasons for this failure. A large portion of the blame probably belongs with students. The understandable shock accompanying the Log's dramatically-changed nature has faded into a complacent acceptance of the common wisdom that the Log is essentially worthless as a bar. The Purple Pub has taken up much of the slack; the Log now competes most nights with the Library as reasonably good place to study.

If the Log is ever to change, students must approach the topic with an open attitude as to what the Log can and should be. Without such flexibility, any other changes in the Log's operation must prove ultimately fruitless.

The other reason for the Log's failure as a bar concerns its operation. A series of ill-conceived and badly-timed administrative decisions, particularly the establishment of a two-drink limit, served only to aggravate what was already a contentious issue.

Of course, the drink limit is now gone, but its effect on student perception of the Log lives on. What we need now, to save the Log from the morass of invisibility in which it now finds itself, are two administrative reforms in Log operation.

The most important fact to recognize is that the Log will never function effectively as a bar until it can compete with the Purple Pub. As long as the Log continues to cost more than the Pub, the administration cannot assume that the student body will go there. The answer — as monetarily painful as it may seem — is to lower beer prices.

What? Lower prices when the Log is already losing vast sums of money? Yes, because unless prices are lowered, attendance at the Log cannot be expected to rise. Given the current situation, bottled beer at the Log costs more than pitcher beer at the Pub. Although a dubious argument can be made as to the superiority of bottled beer, it remains essentially true that for college students beer is pretty much just beer, and bottled beer at the Log is just expensive beer that we can't afford. Until that beer becomes more competitively priced, the Log as bar cannot succeed.

The second administrative improvement would be a lengthening of the Log's hours. Midnight is simply too early a closing time, especially in contrast to the Purple Pub's longer hours.

The adoption of these proposals would go a long way toward attracting significant student support for the Log. At this point some move is necessary to spur student re-evaluation of the Log and perhaps a revival of its formerly prominent campus position.

Tong's talk deserved coverage, but freshman anecdotes did not

To the Editors:

Instead of filling space with the usual "freshman-have arrived" clichés and anecdotes, why not cover in-depth the speech professor Rosemarie Tong delivered on friendship? It's not that I am opposed to levity, but my sides weren't exactly splitting after reading the article. Those of us who missed Tong's speech, as well as those who attended, would have benefited more from substantial coverage of the event.

What irks me even more, though, is Beth Broadrup's condescension to the freshman class. Especially evident from her use of "we" and "them" is a person likely to assume that the article is being directed only at upperclassmen for the purpose of receiving upperclass chuckles.

If the Record really wants to expand its staff, it should not make a practice of excluding one quarter of its readers.

A note to our subscribers

In the past several years, The Record has had considerable difficulty with its off-campus subscriptions. Problems of issue delay and lost subscriptions have plagued our circulation department and given rise to numerous complaints.

In the last year, we have taken a number of steps that should eliminate most, if not all, of our problems.

As a token of appreciation for those who bore with us during this time, and as an apology to those who finally grew too frustrated, we are mailing a complimentary copy of this issue to the home address of every student currently at Williams.

If you have any questions concerning your subscription, contact Shelley Hiatt, Circulation Manager, The Williams Record, Baxter Hall, Williamstown, MA 01267. Thank you

Two rulings on the nomination of Robert Bork

Reagan's choice lacks broad vision

by Matt LaPointe '88 and Karen Olson '88

Since his nomination by President Reagan in July, Judge Robert H. Bork's judicial philosophy and criticism of landmark decisions of the Warren Court have been nightly news topics. Yes, the Bork nomination is even being discussed on our "apolitical" campus. Most talked about have been Bork's views on the following issues: his determination of a need to narrow the scope of speech protected by the First Amendment, his criticism of the distinction of a constitutional right of privacy protecting both a woman's right to a legal abortion (Roe v. Wade) and a married couple's right to use contraceptives (Griswold v. Connecticut), his questioning of the extent to which the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment prohibits racially restrictive covenants (Shelley v. Kraemer), and, finally, the basic issue of his seeming preference for the expansion of Executive Branch powers, manifested in his criticism of the War Powers Act.

Ever since Marbury v. Madison in 1803, one of the most important roles of the Supreme Court has been its protection of individual constitutional rights from the excesses of those branches of government under majoritarian control. Since 1803, the legacy of the Supreme Court has been such that the government must give compelling justification for any attempt to take away individual rights. Judge Bork's philosophy is dangerous in that its application would abdicate the Court's authority to define what the law is.

Both Bork's gross simplification of constitutional doctrine and the nihilism which informs it provide real causes for concern.

As illustrated in his now-famous 1971 Indiana Law Review article on the First Amendment, Bork's judicial philosophy argues that cases must be decided through the application of "neutral principles" reflecting the intentions of the framers insofar as they can be inferred from the text of the Constitution and from the historical circumstances facing the framers at the time the Constitution was written. According to Bork, the text of the Constitution and the historical record unambiguously define a Constitutional value. The addition to this value is beyond the scope of the Court's adjudication and must be abdicated to the political arena. Here partisan politics reign and all too often the voices of the individual, of the poor, and of the disadvantaged are eclipsed by the voices of the socially dominant and economically powerful interests. One need only glance at Madison's writings in the Federalist Papers to sense the dangers of the majoritarianism anticipated by the founders themselves.

Judge Bork's simplification of questions of right into competing "preferences" and "gratifications," as contained in his Indiana article, is just that: simple. Justice Felix Frankfurter has noted that Constitutional interpretation is "not a matter of mathematical determination." There are serious issues of morality over which the Warren and Burger Courts pondered that would simply not fit into Judge Bork's catch-all definitions of adjudicable issues. Both his gross simplification of constitutional doctrine and the nihilism which informs it provide real causes for concern.

In the four areas mentioned above, Bork's philosophy of original intent or strict construction is found wanting in its results. Bork himself has criticized the two previous Courts for being too activist; because he has criticized most of the cases forming the phalanx of progress in civil rights and other social legislation over the last thirty years as being non-adjudicable on a constitutional level, Bork seems to have certain results in mind as well. Could his clever rationales really cloak the implementation of his own ideological preferences?

It is patently undeniable that the decisions Bork criticizes most vehemently are those which have formed the backbone of the major advances in the rights of women and of minorities. However elevated the former Yale Law Professor's analysis is, it falls on the most important of tests; it is simply not pragmatic. And, again, its simplicity tends to disguise a greater purpose. This is a time when the progress of formerly disadvantaged constituencies in this land where "all men are created equal" is most evident. When compelling issues of morality such as homosexual rights in the age of AIDS compose the American political agenda, a philosophy such as Judge Bork's that denies the growth of constitutional doctrine to meet modern questions seems uncaring at worst, provincial at best. For example, Judge Bork said this in reference to the First Amendment: "Constitutional protection should be accorded only to speech that is explicitly political. There is no basis for judicial intervention to protect any other form of expression...."

Judge Bork's legal philosophy leads him to a dangerously narrow reading of an individual's rights not only of the First Amendment, but also in the critical areas of privacy and equal protection. When his philosophy is applied, it becomes clear that his aim is not simply that the Supreme Court becomes less "activist" but that the passivity resulting from his doctrine of original intent provides an end to itself and would erase substantial civil rights progress.

In claiming that Constitutional values are to be drawn solely from what can be gleaned from the text and the historical record, Bork claims to be insuring that the true values of the founding fathers be implemented. What Bork ignores, however, is something which is suggested clearly and emphatically by the Ninth Amendment: "The enumeration in the Constitution, of certain rights, shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people." This clause suggests the opportunity for the evolution and development of Constitutional ideals. Importance ought to be accorded to "certain rights" not explicit in the text of the Constitution.

Is it not likely that the founders left certain ambiguities intentionally in order to allow for the deepening of our understanding of Constitutional values through 200 years of experience? Judge Bork's answer seems to be "no."

Bork is a skilled mainstream jurist

by Jim Hartnett '88

The Constitution grants the President the power to select Supreme Court Justices with the approval of a majority of the Senate. The requirement of Senate approval is intended to force the President to appoint qualified jurists to this extremely powerful and permanent position. The Senate's role in the selection process is to assure that the Presidential nominee is in fact a qualified jurist, displaying an understanding of Constitutional law suitable for service on the nation's highest court.

Unfortunately, the recent Senate hearings on President Reagan's nominee, Judge Robert H. Bork, have almost nothing to do with the issue of whether Bork is qualified to be a Supreme Court Justice. Instead, the hearings have become a political circus, with liberals using the attack on Bork as a means of reasserting a weakened political agenda, and Democratic Senators using the hearings to further presidential aspirations.

The debate on Bork's nomination has had little to do with his ability as a jurist. As a successful corporate lawyer, a professor of law at Yale University, the Solicitor General of the United States, and a Federal Judge, Bork has demonstrated indisputably that he is qualified to serve on the Court. He is considered a brilliant legal scholar. By virtue of these qualifications, Bork should receive approval from the Senate.

Some Senators, however, who disagree with Bork's political convictions have decided that demonstrated legal scholarship is not enough to qualify for the Court. Rather, the candidate's views must be acceptable as well. Ideologically, Bork has evolved from being a socialist to a New Deal Democrat to a free market libertarian to a conservative. Contrary to what certain Senators would like the public to believe, he is not a racist, not a woman-hater, not a pro-life advocate. Bork is, however, a proponent of judicial restraint.

The principle of judicial restraint asserts that Supreme Court Justices, as unelected officials, should restrict their judgments to defending only those rights that are directly stated in or clearly implied by the Constitution. The determination of the scope of other rights should be left up to the legislatures and other elected officials, thus assuring that the courts do not end up usurping the democratic process. Judicial restraint also emphasizes adherence to legal precedent, in that the rationale used to decide previous similar cases is to be respected.

The opposing point of view, judicial activism, has been the recent dominant philosophy. It asserts that the Supreme Court should be involved in defending all sorts of rights, determining the scope of the protection as it goes along. The problem with judicial activism, however, is that it frequently results in judicial legislation, with the Supreme Court creating the law rather than upholding it.

Because of Bork's belief in judicial restraint and because in the past he has disagreed with certain First and Fourteenth Amendment decisions, liberals have tried to portray him as an arch-conservative whose views on the Constitution are not within the bounds of mainstream American political thinking. This is not the case. While he is certainly not the centrist that the Reagan Administration has tried to portray him, Bork is also not a reactionary. He is a conservative judge with a variety of not-easily-plugholed opinions on legal principle.

Bork has on occasion challenged the Supreme Court's liberal interpretation of the right to privacy. Yet, he also feels that the framers were concerned with "guaranteeing privacy after just having separated from an intrusive British Government," and thus sees a limited Constitutional right to privacy. Bork has argued that the gender discrimination is not always the same as discrimination by race or religion (i.e. the difference between men's and women's bathrooms and "white only" and "black only" bathrooms). But he also feels that the landmark desegregation decision, Brown v. Board of Education, is "one of the most important legal decisions in this century."

In his five-year tenure as a federal judge, moreover, no one has been able to find a decision in which he expressed a view inconsistent with legal precedent

1st semester calendar changed

As a result of the implementation of a new calendar for the next three academic years, Thanksgiving break will be extended from four to nine days and Christmas break will be shortened from 19 to 13 days. Fall reading period will be eliminated.

Professor Russell Bostert, former chairman of the Calendar and Scheduling Committee, said, "The time has come to try an experiment," noting that the old calendar had been in effect for ten years.

The committee voted on the new calendar in 1984-85, after proposing it to the faculty. According to Bostert, the calendar is prepared three years in advance because several departments, including the athletics department, need an advance schedule.

Bostert said the committee decided to change the calendar because, "We felt that the first semester was too congested, too cramped. People in courses where papers were due didn't have enough time to do them." He called the extended Thanksgiving break a "catch-up period for faculty and students for an all-too-brief first semester."

Bostert said that dormitories will remain open and meals will be served during Thanksgiving vacation.

The Calendar and Scheduling Committee also found fault with the students' use of the fall reading period, which is now eliminated. The committee, by checking with dining hall attendance, found that people left early for the break, making it a "mini-vacation," according to Bostert.

The committee received a student petition disapproving of the new calendar. Bostert said, "There were a number of signatures on the petition, but I'm not sure that all the signatories knew what they were signing. Also, they were passing judgment on something before it was tried. It shows the conservative, reactionary nature of the students."

When asked if the calendar could be changed back to its old form before the three-year experiment is over, Thomas Hudgins '88, college council liaison to the committee, said,

"They need a lot of opposition to get it changed next year. They need opposition from the faculty, but I have a feeling that they (the faculty) like it."

A new one-day break, Mountain Day, has been added on Friday, October 16. "I hope that it will restore the old tradition of celebrating the mountains," Bostert said.

Comptroller cuts down on cash flow

Missing funds might be responsible for a change this fall in the way students purchase offset reading packets for their courses.

Charges for the packets will now be placed on students' term bills. In the past students paid for the packets by cash or check when they purchased them at Stetson Hall.

According to Eugenia Smith, who supervises student accounts for the Comptroller's Office, there had been "incidents in the past when cash was stolen" after students paid for their packets in cash.

Although Smith said that she was not involved in the decision to change the procedure, she offered as a reason "the tightening up of cash on campus."

Assistant to the Comptroller Doug Phillips, who designed the change in procedure along with Vice Provost David Booth, said the old procedure caused a problem of cash control, which an outside auditor said needed changing.

The first changes were implemented last year, when students paying for the packets in cash were required to first pay at the Comptroller's Office and then produce a receipt in order to obtain the packets in Stetson.

Phillips said that the new procedure is also designed to speed up the process of purchasing packets.

With thousands of dollars in secretaries' offices in Stetson, Booth added, "the possibility of thievery and a loss was far too high." He said that there was no safe in the building to secure money that was received.

"The Comptroller (Saeed Mughal) saw cash changing hands and didn't like what he was seeing," said Booth.

However, both Booth and Phillips denied that there were ever incidents in the past when money had been stolen.

Council meets for first time

In its opening meeting of the year Thursday, the College Council addressed the issue of recruiting more minorities and women to the college's faculty.

The council mailed to the faculty last Spring a questionnaire investigating the possibility that the all-white male composition of the Committee on Appointments and Promotions (CAP) hindered the college's efforts to recruit women and minorities. The 55 responses from faculty members pointed the council toward individual departments' efforts to recruit a more diverse faculty.

"The next logical step seems to me to go to the students," council president Carter Zinn said. "Our idea is to get at the problem through the majors."

The council's officers proposed to send students a copy of the letter summarizing faculty responses to the questionnaire along with a cover letter urging students with declared majors to work through their departmental liaison committees.

Further discussion brought up the question of whether liaison committees actually exist for all departments and if they are effective. The council decided to conduct a study of the departmental liaison committees as a vehicle through which students can investigate the issue. The results will be reported at the council meeting in two weeks.

Two new trustees elected

Two men have been elected to the Williams College Board of Trustees. Raymond F. Henze III '74, president and chief operating officer of Pacific Holding Company in Los Angeles was chosen by the alumni society to fill an unexpired term as alumni trustee.

Currently a member of the executive committee of the alumni society, Henze is a former class agent and a member of the executive committee of the Los Angeles Williams Association.

At Williams Henze was president of Gargoyle society, news director of the radio station, college social chairman and a member of the tennis and squash teams.

Dr. Michael Z. Lazor '53, chief of the nephrology section at Hartford Hospital, has been elected to a five-year term as alumni trustee. A director of Hartford Health Services and of ConnecticutCare, Lazor is also a corporator of Hartford Hospital and a clinical professor for the University of Connecticut Medical School. He was national chairman of its 1984 and 1985 alumni funds, as class agent, and as president of the Connecticut Alumni Association.

He graduated from Williams with highest honors in chemistry and was elected to Phi Beta Kappa. He was also secretary of the Undergraduate Council and captain of the basketball team.

Students to be surveyed on spending

In the next few weeks, 30 Williams College students will be asked to answer a few questions about how much money they spend while going to college in Massachusetts. The information will be used in a study designed to show the importance of the independent colleges and universities in Massachusetts to the state's economy.

No one will be asked to give their names and the information will be pooled with similar information gathered from other Massachusetts independent college and university students.

The Social Welfare Research Institute at Boston College is conducting the study for the Association of Independent Colleges and Universities in Massachusetts (AICUM). All of the association's member institutions, including Williams College, will participate in the study. College Council president Carter Zinn '88 will be coordinating the student survey in cooperation with Nancy McIntire, assistant to the president, who is collecting the other institutional data.

A similar study conducted for AICUM in 1985 showed that independent higher education is a $3.7 billion industry that creates 155,668 jobs in the Commonwealth.

College searches for a chaplain

Despite the efforts of a search committee composed of students, faculty and administrators, the position of associate chaplain to the college remains vacant this year, following the departure of Father Augustine Graap in the spring.

Kathleen McNeely will fill the gap this year as acting associate chaplain to the college.

McNeely, who holds a Master of Divinity degree from Harvard University, will be available to advise and work with all members of the college community and, in particular, to serve the needs of Catholic students at Williams.

McNeely spent the past year in Nuevo Segovia, Nicaragua, near the Honduran border, working for the Witness for Peace Organization. Her duties there included documentation of the cultural war and acting as a translator for delegations of United States citizens on fact-finding tours.

With regard to her duties at Williams, McNeely said, "So far, it's been wonderful. Everyone I've met seems really interesting and interested. I also see a lot of potential for Catholic students to get together and make Sunday liturgy more interesting."

In the absence of a permanently appointed priest, Catholic liturgy will be celebrated every Sunday by a priest from Williamstown's Carmelite residence. Wednesday mass will be said by a priest from Troy, N.Y.

College chaplain Carol Pepper said that McNeely will perform the full range of pastoral work during her time at Williams. She referred to McNeely's presence as "precedent-setting at Williams and precedent-setting for the whole lay ministry. Imagine a woman in this role. Imagine a highly educated woman. She's not just plugging in a hole while we wait for the real thing. She is the real thing. It's not definite that the permanent chaplain has to be a celibate, white male."

Dean of the College Stephen Flx, a member of the search committee, said that the complexities of fulfilling the position of chaplain is further complicated by the relative shortage of priests across the nation. Relatively small numbers of priests choose campus ministry, he said.

Flx said that a new search committee, not yet appointed, will reopen the search for a permanent associate chaplain.

Stoddard leads excavation

Students dig French countryside

by Alex Oh

Tired of no-pay internships, brain-sizzling beaches and greasy hamburger joints? How about spending the summer on an excavation?

Some Williams students had the unique pleasure of spending a month of their summer vacation in the small town of Psalmodi, France, as part of an annual archeological excavation headed by Professor of Art Emeritus Whitney Stoddard.

'Awesome'

Annie Cordova '88 said that the experience was simply "awesome." She said that she had been hoping to take part in the dig for a while, so when Stoddard mentioned the opportunity to her Art History 301 class, she approached him for permission to join the excavation. Cordova said that there were no special qualifications for the project, although Art History majors were preferred.

When June 15 rolled around, Cordova and about 15 others, including both graduate art students and undergraduate students from Williams, architects, archaeologists and members of the Stoddard family, found themselves in Psalmodi.

"The dig itself was kind of a research," Cordova said, indicating that it wasn't all fun and games, but hard work as well. For some, the work was made even more difficult by the harsh living conditions.

Cold showers

quez '89, another member of the excavation team, of the living situation. Their sleeping quarters consisted of sleeping bags under tents, and frequent rain was a problem. Keeping clean was difficult, as everyone had to line up after work each night for the single cold shower that they built when they first arrived at the site.

Into the river

Henriquez also spoke of some fun times, like when everyone piled into the car after the dig and drove to an old ruined bridge nearby and jumped into the river with bars of soap to clean themselves.

Cordova was less hampered by the conditions: "It was fun standing in line for the shower, drinking wine," she said.

Skeletons

Cordova and Steph Jacon '87 were the first to find a skeleton at the site: "It was great! There's this tradition of whoever finds a skeleton naming it, and we named ours after the Director of Williams College Museum of Art: Thomas Krens."

"It was a really good experience," Henriquez said, "I would go back next year if I had the chance. You really learn to appreciate what you have. It's something everyone should experience."

Returnees find unfamiliar faces in old familiar places

by Sunita Duggal

Freshmen are not the only ones feeling a little disoriented at this time of year. About one-third of the class of '88 has returned from various study abroad programs to find not one, but two classes of unfamiliar faces among some much missed familiar faces.

"It's nice to come back to old friends," said Elizabeth Hines, voicing a sentiment echoed by many others. "But I miss England and a lot of people there ... it feels kind of surreal to be back."

Culture shock

Some are experiencing what Dean Sheila Spear called "reverse culture shock." According to Spear, this phenomena occurs when people bring a fresh outlook to little intimate parts of life such as styles of greeting and friendship. Some returning students also react to the amount of waste and commercialism in this country, she said.

Why did these students choose to leave all that was familiar to them in the first place? Many of them wanted to be exposed to a new culture and acquire or sharpen skills in a foreign language. A few cited not being selected as a junior advisor as being a key factor in their decision. J. R. Rahlili '88 said, "I always wanted to go abroad. I picked Italy because I am fascinated by Italian culture. They make awesome bikes, motorcycles, cars and food, and Italian women are beautiful."

'A cake-walk'

Some of the students found that they had a lighter course-load abroad, though not all of them would follow Rahlili in describing classes as "a cake-walk." Chris Hayes said that his classes at Oxford weren't really comparable to Williams courses. "We met (individually or in pairs) with a tutor once a week to discuss our essays. There was much more emphasis put on going out and finding relevant materials from book lists. I found this to be an effective way of learning."

Classes are just one of the many challenges of going abroad. Often students found that making friends required a concerted effort. "It took a long time. I had to make the effort. It's hard because you feel insecure about your proficiency in the language," said Katie Kessler, who studied at the Universitat Freiburg, in Germany. Vicky Smith, on the other hand, said she found it extremely easy to meet people at Kings College in London. She chose a residence where food was served

Dartmouth

Many faculty members and administrators at Dartmouth College do not believe that the student population is intellectually serious. They have suggested that perhaps too many athletes, rather than scholars or students with special talents, are attracted by the school's image of being more fun than intellectual. This year, the Admissions Office plans to actively recruit more "serious" students and to downplay the idea that the only Dartmouth student is a "well-rounded" one.

Bryn Mawr

Martina Navratilova headed the list of eight professional women tennis players appearing at the KISS 100 Invitational Tennis Tournament held at Bryn Mawr College August 28-30. This event was the first professional women's tennis tournament in the Philadelphia area in six years and drew 9,000 people to the college. Navratilova won the three-round tournament, defeating Helen Kelesi of Canada, 6-4, 6-0. Members of the college community enjoyed free viewing from small stands and grass seats.

More Bryn Mawr

Two Bryn Mawr graduate students visited with General Secretary Mikhail Gorbachev in Moscow last month to discuss an exchange of language students and teachers between the Soviet Union and the United States. The students were part of a Bryn Mawr-sponsored exchange program of Soviet and American teachers. Bryn Mawr graduate student Elizabeth Melofchik, present at the meeting, said that the atmosphere of the meeting was nonpolitical and sincere. "Because we (students) see more than what's in the paper, we get to go beyond politics," Michael Gorham, a Bryn Mawr graduate student and instructor of Russian at Haverford College, said of Gorbachev, "He was very spontaneous, he joked around a little. It was a light atmosphere."

WPI

Mike Membrino is a quadriplegic. He is also one of the hundreds of freshmen to arrive at Worcester Polytechnic Institute (WPI) this fall. Membrino was paralyzed from the neck down in a football game three years ago. After six months of rehabilitation, he learned to use an electric wheelchair which operates by airflow which Mike controls by exhaling and inhaling through straws. He gets some more technological help from his IBM PC. It is equipped with a mouthstick which enables him to do his homework. WPI officials have been very helpful in seeing that Membrino's needs will be adequately met so he can reach his goal of graduating in five or six years with a degree in chemical engineering.

Summertime, but the living ain't easy

by Gayle Gaddis

I found that summer starts much earlier in the morning than the rest of the year. It's just something I discovered one day as I jolted awake to find my face parallel to my breakfast. This was the first in a series of summer setbacks. (The annoying urge to alliterate being another of them.) Picking my face out of my Captain Crunch, I looked up to see a pink-frosted female gazing at me with a hideous, grimace-like smile moulded to her face. I decided she had made too many faces as a child. Behind an oncoming Elderhostel (n. 1. A Williams College summer conference member 2. Any of a growing species of aged women named Miriam who will, in fact, stop at nothing to see prunes on the salad bar), I saw the boring guy. That's what we called him—the boring guy. I'm not sure if he actually had a name; I know he didn't have a personality. I took this as a pretty darn good time for me to leave. As a rule, I do not speak to boring people before 8 a.m. So, grabbing the one piece of fruit I was allowed to take out of the dining hall, and being sufficiently late for work so as not to disrupt anyone's image of me, I headed for the library.

Suddenly, it was lunch time. That is, suddenly in the sense of after four hours of grime-encrusted, mind-dulling, insipid labor, I headed for the door, being careful to exit through the "entrance" path. (I have a deathly fear of setting off the book alarm and hearing someone say, "It must be your magnetic personality.")

I was on my way to crash the Bronfman Science Lunch, when I found myself surrounded by a flock of tousle-headed boys all in white who nevertheless looked strikingly unlike the Vienna Boys Choir. Maybe it was the tennis rackets they had pinned to their sleeves.

Bronfman Science Lunches, I've decided, are the embodiment of the Williams summer experience: an enthusiastic professor giving a lecture on hyperbolic tri-manifolds to a room full of social psychologists. Then there was the day we got llamas. Not in the same sense we got mice mind you, I don't think the llamas were big on the idea of scurrying under doorways looking for spare Doritos. For no explainable reason, a conference of solar scientists decided that what the science quad lacked was llamas. So they fenced in West and let the llamas have the quad.

After shifting the entire fourth floor of the library onto the third, my day was done, and I gleefully looked forward to a night off, when I didn't also have to work at Goodies. (More Goodies Cafe that is; there's a difference.) One less night as "Gayle: Ice cream scooper to the stars." Christopher Reeve, incidentally, lets his children have far too many sweets. They served a sundae bar for dinner. At 6 p.m. on the nose, theater interns started filing into Baxter in one long, monochromatic line. Some weirdo mumbles, "Ooo, ooo, baby, black turns me on." I mumble, "Weirdo." This is the guy that stands up in the audience and yells to a professional comedian, "Who does your hair?" Or maybe he was just related to the guy who decided the best place to dry his laundry was on the lawn of West. At midnight, it was stolen. I'm sure it was just a coincidence that I saw a toga party going down Spring Street that night.

I found that summer lasts longer than the rest of the year. My summer is to everyone else's summer as dog years are to people years. That's three months to you and me. But Williams has always been a little out of step with the rest of the world, and that's not such a bad thing.

Gayle Gaddis has spent the past three summers in Williamstown. This year, she worked at Sawyer Library during the day and More Goodies Cafe at night.

Dramatic preview

Theater boasts full fall

by Travis Pierson

As the winter months approach and the weather grows more frigid, theater at Williams is warming up for a rousing season. Williamstheatre is planning two productions for the fall semester: Harold Pinter's The Homecoming and Moliere's Tartuffe. Also scheduled are Fred Curchack's one man performance entitled Stuff As Dreams Are Made On; the Japanese dance-theatre group, Sankai Juku; and Cap and Bells' Freshman Revue.

The Homecoming is one of the two fall productions that are being sponsored by the Department of Theater and presented in the Adams Memorial Theatre. Director David Eppel explained that the play was chosen "because we haven't done anything by Pinter in a while and because it is very representative of Pinter's style." He added that he is a great fan of Pinter's and that the play offers excellent opportunities for students of theatre.

Although the other major fall Williamstheatre production, Moliere's Tartuffe, directed by Tina Shepherd, was written centuries ago, it has recently been enjoying a widespread resurgence of interest. Its theme of religious corruption and fraud reflects today's headlines of televangelists and scandal. The play's witty and astute observations make it as topical and entertaining for modern audiences as it must have been for Moliere's contemporaries.

Similar to Tartuffe, Fred Curchack's work, Stuff As Dreams Are Made On, is based on a 400-year old theme, but it is presented with a thoroughly modern twist. The play, loosely based on Shakespeare's The Tempest, incorporates mime, masks, voices and candles to create a work that critics nationwide have called "stunning" and "magical". Curchack, who is currently a professor in the Department of Art and Performance at the University of Texas at Dallas, has worked in theatre over the past 25 years and has produced 37 original pieces.

As one of the events complementing the ongoing Mingei: Japanese Folk Art exhibition at the Williams College Museum of Art, Sankai Juku, the world-renowned dance-theater group from Japan, will perform at the AMT. (See related story on page 9.) Student-run Cap and Bells also has a show in the works. The Freshman Revue, written primarily by senior Kristin Szarto and junior Laura Richman, is an as-yet-undefined combination of scripted and improvisational material on which the whole cast collaborates.

Sankai Juku will appear at the AMT on October 6. The Freshman Revue will premiere on October 22 and continue through Freshman Parent's weekend. Tartuffe will be performed on October 22, 23, 24 and 31 and November 5 and 6, and The Homecoming will appear on October 29 and 30 and November 7, 12, 13 and 14. Fred Curchack's one-man show will come to town on December 4 and 5, coinciding with a workshop that he will be offering.

Festival complements WCMA Mingei show

by Beth Broadrup

The Berkshire Quad hosted a celebration of Japanese folk art Saturday in conjunction with the Williams College Museum of Art's current exhibition entitled "Mingei: Japanese Folk Art." A host of students and visitors packed the area for demonstrations of traditional Japanese crafts, music, theatre, and dance.

The exhibition itself, on display until October 25, displays more than 100 objects dating mostly from the Edo and Meiji periods which lasted from approximately 1800 to 1910. The traditional arts and crafts comprising the exhibition are part of the Brooklyn Museum's permanent collection. They are shown here for the first time outside of their home museum.

The festival brought to life the arts represented in the exhibition. In addition to presentations of Taiko drumming, which is intended to communicate with the gods, folkdancing by the Sankai Juku Dancers and children's theatre, there were also artisans adept in traditional Japanese crafts on hand to share their skills with festival visitors.

Mingei encompasses both art (such as paintings) and crafts (ceramics or furniture, for example) produced by anonymous artisans for use by ordinary Japanese people. This folk art is celebrated for its simplicity, informality, richness and use of natural materials. Saturday's festival reflected this tra-

Jenkins challenges self in oboe recital

by Sean Timmons

Carl and Jane Jenkins performed a challenging program of oboe and piano music Thursday evening to a nearly full house in Brooks-Rogers Recital Hall. The program featured works by composers that ranged from Bach to Walter Piston.

Carl Jenkins, a graduate of both Montclair State College and Columbia University and the Berkshire Symphony's principal oboist, displayed a warm tone and phrased the music with a sensitivity that was especially well-suited to Ravel's Piece en forme de Habanera. This brief, slow work has a Spanish feel, with delicately rhythmic piano accompaniment complementing the long, flowing oboe lines. Jane Jenkins handled her part beautifully, playing the soloistic portions with great intensity but never overpowering the oboe's passionate melody. Clearly, this piece was the finest duet of the evening.

Much of the rest of the program, however, was marred by a poor balance between the piano and the oboe. Although a majority of the evening's works involved the piano in much more than just a supporting role and therefore required a strong and distinct piano voice, there were moments at which Mrs. Jenkins could have played more lightly and allowed the oboe part to sing out more. Even in her solo parts, at times, Mrs. Jenkins did not make her phrasing clear and therefore lost much of the sensitivity that was characteristic of her playing in the Ravel piece.

Mr. Jenkins, while repeatedly demonstrating his ability to inject feeling into a flowing line, showed occasional articulation problems that diminished the intensity of some of the faster, more virtuosic passages. In his performance of the first and third movements of Walter Piston's Suite for Oboe and Piano, for instance, Mr. Jenkins seemed to be so caught up in the technical execution of the piece that much of the music's humor and lightness was lost.

The evening's finale, Mozart's Quintet K. 452 for piano and woodwinds, deserves special mention. For this piece, Mr. and Mrs. Jenkins were joined by clarinetist Susan Martula, David Saunders on french horn and Stephen Walt on bassoon, all of whom are principal players in their respective sections of the Berkshire and Albany Symphonies and members of the Northeastern Winds quintet. Except for a slight problem with balance in the opening, all of the musicians performed exceptionally well, handling their solo passages with great confidence and sensitivity while showing an ability to blend in the ensemble sections. The quintet's performance was certainly a highlight of the evening.

ARTS IN VIEW

A show of paintings by Cathy Salser entitled "Images in Progress: a Woman's Body in Process" is on display in Goodrich Hall's Goodrich Gallery through Friday. Mike Giller, one of four artists creating "Wallworks" on the atrium wall of the Williams College Museum of Art, will speak tonight at 8 p.m. at WCMA. The lecture is free and open to the public. On Friday at 4 p.m., noted guitarist David Starobin will conduct a music workshop for all interested players and observers in Bernhard Music Center's Instrumental Rehearsal Hall. At 8 p.m. Friday, Starobin will open the Thompson Concert series in Brooks-Rogers hall with a concert featuring works by Elliot Carter, Per Norgard, Michael Starobin, Robert Saxton, Joaquin Turina, and Manuel de Falla. Admission is free with Williams I.D. Saturday night at 8 o'clock, Victor Hill, harpsichord, Janet Puchalski, flute, and Marlene Walt, soprano, will perform as part of a 20th anniversary Griffin Hall Concert. Featured will be works by Bach, Berlioz and Mozart. The concert will take place at the Clark Art Institute Auditorium and admission is free. Sunday at 8 p.m., Eileen Southern of Harvard University will speak on "Folk Elements in Black Church Music" in the last of the Ethnomusicology Lectures series, which began last year. For more information on events sponsored by the college's Department of Music, call Concertline at 597-3146.

clay with a string. One must form the pottery completely in its softer stage since it becomes bone-dry in four to five days; "Once it dries it is like carving stone," he explained. Smoothed, dried pottery may then be painted by hand.

The process of textile dyeing, or Roktsu, was demonstrated by Yasuko Yabe, a graduate of the International Design School in Kyoto, Japan. On a sheet of silk stretched loosely over two bow-shaped supports, Yabe drew the outline of her design in a heated mix of microwax and paraffin. "I sign it that way, too," she said. The scene she drew depicted flying taiko drumsticks, which were featured in an earlier demonstration, situated under the tent's purple and gold stripes.

"They all say it was hard work and they were right," said Beaver. "They had a very vigorous schedule and they really showed their commitment to the sciences. They see the value of it now that they are taking college math and chemistry courses."

Perhaps the greatest problem was that the students were housed in the Center for Development Economics (CDE), a tremendous building which Davis said led to a certain amount of polarization among the students.

Bats

Worse yet, the house was inhabited by a legion of bats, which plagued the students throughout the summer. But despite the problems, reactions to the program from the participants seemed positive.

One of the twelve participants, Eleanor Mendoza '91, from Salt Lake City, Utah, said that the college "really made us an offer we couldn't refuse. I thought this was a perfect opportunity to get a feel for Williams before the fall semester started."

"Williamstown isn't exactly a bustling metropolis," she added, "but we did go out to eat, go to the movies and even got a chance to see Chris Reeve at the Williamstown Theater Festival — even though I fell asleep halfway through the show."

Eleven of the 12 students are taking introductory level science courses this semester.

Williams had a summer pre-med program for minority students from the early 1970's to the early 1980's, Beaver said, but it was cancelled because of lack of interest.

Members of the Deans Office, the Admissions Office, and the Provost's Office, as well as the Assistant to the President for Affirmative Action and Government Relations and the chemistry and physics departments, helped to formulate the program, Beaver said.

"I am confident that we have the commitment from the college for another summer," said Beaver, "and we already have a house."

In addition to college funding, the program received a $30,000 General Telephone and Electronics Corporation grant to pay for a follow-up program during the academic year. Beaver said that the follow-up will examine the availability of tutors for the program's participants and the number of program participants who continue in the sciences.

The grant, which is intended to cover two academic years, will also allow the professors who are part of the program to investigate alternative methods of presentation, Beaver said.

pretty much stuck with our game plan from the first half, and things started to fall into place."

Nachamkin and Masters each tallied goals in the squad's season opener against Springfield last Wednesday. The Ephs beat the well-conditioned Springfield team 2-0 at Cole field.

This Saturday will be an important test for the Williams team as it plays host to soccer power Middlebury, which won the ECAC Division III tournament last year. Despite the Panthers' past success, team members are confident going into Saturday's match. "They'll be tough to beat, but we've got a few matches under our belt and should be ready for them," said Swann. (In past years, Williams has occasionally suffered by opening their season against a Middlebury team which had already played a few games, a situation which is not the case this year).

Log continues tradition of losing money

by Alexandra Glover

The Log, the Williams College pub, has established many traditions over the years. While some would argue that the raising of the Massachusetts drinking age to 21 has threatened to make the Log history, manager David Lamarre said that one tradition — operating in the red — is still going strong.

Both the administration and Food Service have acknowledged the fact that the student pub may never operate at a profit.

"The place can't run for free," Lamarre said. "When the Springstreeters perform, if we have 300 people in the building, we do close to $300, and the prices we charge are incredibly low. We'd have to do that every night to break even."

Last year the Log continued to lose money despite the enormous popularity of the Log lunch program which was instituted last spring and continues this year. This program allows students to use their ID cards at the Log to eat a buffet lunch.

"With the lunch income we did better," said Lamarre, who explained that the Log gets $4.25 in board pay from the Food Service department for every person who uses their ID. This is not strictly money earned, however, because the amount of student board income to Food Service is the same.

Last year, according to Lamarre, the Log cut its losses in half from the previous year. Although neither Lamarre nor Food Service would release figures, Lamarre did indicate that the amount the Log loses now per year is significant, and the cash income from individual student patrons negligible.

"Running the Log is not for our department to determine," Assistant Director of Food Service Kari Kowitz said. "It is at the Dean's level. It is a student service. There are a lot of student services that don't operate at a profit." He said that the school supports the Log as a tradition, not for the purpose of making money.

Associate Dean of the College Mary Kenyatta said, "The Log is a tradition. In the past it served a very useful function for students. It is not simply a narrow student service. We were able to get people in there with some of the programs it had last year."

Student entertainment programs under the advice of the Log committee will continue this year, as well as Over 21 nights on Wednesdays. "These (Over 21 nights) will continue until they are ridiculously unsuccessful," said Lamarre. "They were not highly successful last year."

Log lunches will continue on Monday, Tuesday, and Thursday. The Center for Environmental Studies sponsors Lunch at the Log every Friday. In addition, the Sideline Quarterbacks' Club (a Williams football booster organization), will continue to meet on Wednesdays during the football season, as they did last year before the Log Lunch program began.

"On Thursday, September 24 we are featuring a live paid professional rock and roll band," said Lamarre. "That is a definite and automatic loser. I will not do the business to cover the cost of the band. It's just a mathematical impossibility."

The Purple Pub, a bar on Bank Street, seems to be doing very strong business with the over-21 crowd at Williams, and it is not a question of which bar is a better bargain. The Pub sells bottled domestic beer for $1.50 and imported beer for $2-$2.50, according to Gary Brooks, the night bartender at the Pub. In comparison the Log stocks domestics for 75¢-$1, and imported beer for $2.

"It's a question that I don't think anyone can answer," said Brooks.

"Everybody wants the Log to survive," said Lamarre. "But they ain't down here either. But I can't say that I blame them."

and conservative Constitution theory. Of 100 decisions that Bork wrote for the majority, not one has been overturned.

Thus, the Bork confirmation hearings have little to do with his qualifications or his legal philosophy. What we are seeing is political grandstanding, with Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Joseph Biden more concerned with his own personal image than with anything Judge Bork has to say. Additionally, the fact that Bork is another Reagan appointee offers an opportunity for the Congress to take a shot at eroding the President's already-damaged prestige. By denying Bork's approval, the Democrats could prove once and for all that the Reagan is now fully a lame-duck President. Every liberal coalition has rallied against Bork, not because he is an unqualified candidate or even a threat to American liberalism, but rather because he is a symbol of both the conservative tide in American politics and their own political failure.

The Supreme Court was written into the Constitution by the founding fathers so that there would be a branch of government that could resist demagoguery that politics often inspires. It is unfortunate that in the selection of a Supreme Court Justice, such political image-polishing and special-interest lobbying should play such a major role.

Abroad — Pine Cobble

even though the food was rumoured to be pretty awful. "The food was wretched, but I met people."

Swindled

Rahill, who studied in Florence, Italy, said he made some interesting friends in Morocco. "Three of us got swindled by these guys. They took us around for three days, pretending to be our friends. On the last day, they told us that each of us owed them $250, and locked us in a basement while we talked about it among ourselves. There were five of them, and only three of us. Each of us ended up giving them $75."

Jack Phillips found a different kind of adventure in his travels. His passport, money and train ticket were stolen in a train station in Spain on Easter Sunday as he was returning to Germany. "There wasn't another train for two weeks and everything was booked. My friends told me to get on the train and say my things were stolen on the train. Luckily, I had some official looking papers for registration at college with my social security number on them."

Shakuhachi

Besides traveling on weekends and vacations, students found time for a variety of extra-curriculars abroad. According to Hayes, more than half of the Exeter College rugby team were Williams-in-Oxford students. Students enjoyed other sports, as well as plays, movies, concerts, ballets and pubs. They also spent a lot of time exploring the cities they resided in.

Some students acquired exotic skills: Cathryn Clayton took lessons in Taijiquan, a Chinese martial art, and Sarah Loeb took lessons in Shakuhachi, the Japanese bamboo flute.

Andy Mayer, who studied in Leningrad, said he became "more politically hopeful, but at the same time, a little less hopeful about inner reforms in Russia." Mayer described an encounter with the KGB, which he said was an isolated incident: "The KGB called a friend of mine and asked her to spy on me a bit — find out what terrible anti-Soviet activities I was up to. She refused and told me, but she was scared out of her mind."

Most students enthusiastically recommended their programs, though some added that study abroad programs are not for extremely shy or insecure people. Phillips said he has no regrets. "Best thing I've ever done."

Sophomores considering study abroad will be able to attend a series of informational meetings in October.

houses on smaller pieces of land than is normally permitted by zoning by-laws and putting the remaining land into open space. The proposed Pine Cobble project would include lots in three separate zoning districts. On August 13 the planning board voted to allow Williams to "borrow" open space from the district around the 1150 foot mark for use as open space.

Schlesinger said the specific concerns of this project are what led the Board to its decision and he emphasized that they do not intend this to be a "precedent-setting decision." If the project is completed, it will be the first cluster-housing development in Williamstown.

The project will interfere with the existing trail that runs up Pine Cobble. Plans for the preservation of the hiking route involve the creation of another trail on the western side which will eventually connect at a higher level to the present trail.

Grinnell said that the next stage in the project is to file a definitive subdivision plan (which would show specifics such as roads, lighting and sewers) and an environmental impact statement. The next stages will involve meetings between Scape Unlimited, the firm hired to design the project, and Camp, Dresser, and McKee, the town's planning consultants, he said.

Grinnell said he expects only four or five of the lots to be built upon by faculty members in the next three to four years. He said it may be 15-18 years before all of the lots are occupied.

He said he does "not expect the project to have a dramatic effect on the community" on a short-term basis.

INTERNATIONAL HONORS PROGRAM

Sankai Juku heads dance offerings

by Heidi Zimmerman

The internationally-acclaimed Japanese dance/theater group Sankai Juku will kick off the 1987-1988 season of events sponsored by the Department of Dance on October 6 with a performance in the Adams Memorial Theater. The group's performance is only the beginning of a year-long schedule of events sponsored by the Department of Dance that are geared toward increasing awareness, involvement and participation in dance courses and projects.

The Japanese dancers combine styles from their culture and experiences from their people's history, such as the holocaust of the atomic bomb, with the techniques of modern dance to develop a new way of moving. The Paris-based group uses this approach to communicate the variety of states that humans experience. Before each performance, they enter a state of complete physical and spiritual calm that enables them to express any emotion, thought or condition.

The group's performance will feature their signature work, Kinkan Shonen (The Quinquat Seed), as one of the events surrounding the ongoing exhibition entitled Mingei: Japanese Folk Art at the Williams College Museum of Art. Ushio Amagatsu, the director, choreographer, and lead dancer of the five-member all-male troupe, commented, "Projecting unerasable impressions is our business." And, indeed, judging from the response given world-wide to Sankai Juku, his claim seems to be true.

The performers, working with shaved heads and powdered-white bodies, are noted for performing feats such as lowering themselves to the stage, hanging upside-down from ropes, and presenting the unexpected, as in Kinkan Shonen which features a live peacock on stage. Sankai Juku's first American performance was in 1984 at the Los Angeles Olympic Arts Festival.

Since that time, they have been performing to standing ovations all over the country. According to Time Magazine, "The singular glory of Sankai Juku is that it achieves almost pure metaphor. It is not like anything else. Rather, it becomes the thing that all else is like."

Head of the Department of Dance Sandra Burton is producing the performance as part of the exhibition Mingei: Japanese Folk Art, currently on display at the Williams College Museum of Art. It is sponsored in part by the College's dance program, the Massachusetts Council on the Arts and Humanities and the Orrin Simons Fund.

Burton describes the group's work as "something deadly and terrifying, like a cobra," but insists that "we can look at it and say 'That is a magnificent phenomenon,' and appreciate its beauty. They show us our joy and pain and terror in a way that's beautiful." She explained her personal attachment to the art of Sankai Juku, saying, "They are one of my personal favorite groups because they are doing work that is unique and speaks to the human condition, whether it is the pain or the joy."

The College's own student dance group will be working on small projects with visual arts students and music students interested in collaboration. Several members will also be choreographing work for the annual dance concert in March. The group has been invited to perform at the First Congregational Church in Williamstown and at a benefit for the Little Red Schoolhouse. In addition, they will be working with the WCMA to develop dance programs for the community.

Burton is continuously researching different dance groups, watching performances and talking to others in the field in an effort to bring artists to campus who are new on the scene or who wouldn't ordinarily visit the campus. She said she hopes to service the community by offering year-round quality performing. A different artist is scheduled to appear nearly every month from now through April to conduct workshops and perform in an effort to promote student interest and involvement.

Coming in mid-October is the Jane Comfort Dance Company. Comfort stresses rhythm and content in her performances which include such varied resources as sign language, singing, film and acting. She plans to work with dancers, actors, writers and musicians in her workshops.

Yabe colored the silk with Procion, a fiber-reactive dye, using a brush. She repeated this process of waxing and dyeing until the wax was finally removed chemically. The process of steaming then fixed the dye into the silk.

Artisan Keiji Shinohara demonstrated his skill in the art of woodblock printing. To produce the multicolored prints, Shinohara used a different carved woodblock for each color. He applied a watercolor and then mixed it with rice paste to help bind it to the paper, using a horsehair brush to cover the raised portions of the block. Laying the paper in set grooves on the block, he rubbed it with a brush made of bamboo and woven knots to transfer the paint. "I brush the instrument on my face for oil, which keeps the brush from sticking to the paper," he explained to an attentive audience. He must repeat the process for each color; the print he produced at the festival had 11 different colors.

A panel discussion held in the WCMA focused on three objects from the exhibition: movable stairs from a Japanese farm house, small wood objects painted symbolically called "ema," and a statue of a Buddhist deity. Discussing the objects were Asian Studies Chairman Professor Peter Frost, Visiting Assistant Professor of Anthropology Jennifer Robertson and John E. Thayer, a research fellow from the Peabody Museum of Salem.

Frost, explaining the cultural importance of mingei to the Japanese people, noted that the word mingei did not exist until 1918. Yanagi Soetsu, a Japanese art critic, invented it to refer to the traditional folk arts whose future was threatened by the industrialization of Japan. "Mingei is a handcrafted marriage of function and form," said Frost. Its revival is "a lament against mass production," he continued, "... in which the individual craftsman could no longer find expression."

The Japanese are fascinated with mingei, Frost said; "It gives them a sense of what is Japanese." They are, however, he added, in danger of romantizing their agricultural past. "The Japanese are doing the same thing we are with our farm tradition," he said. They are nostalgic about simpler days on their farm, but often "they forget the bad parts of farm life these objects represent."

Two great ways to cruise through the semester.

The hand on the left is poised on what could be the most essential part of your education.

A Macintosh™ computer.

And the hand on the right is gripping pure, simple, unadulterated fun.

A Honda Scooter. One we're giving away.

All you have to do for a chance to drive it away is visit your campus computer center and fill out an entry form. While you're there, take a Macintosh for a test drive.

Because Macintosh can help you write term papers, categorize elements of the periodic table, plot the rise and fall of pork-belly prices, compile computer code, and talk to other computers.

And the first 250 people on campus who get behind a mouse, so to speak, will receive a free Apple® memo board.

Men's rugby routed by Olde Farts

by Andy Harris

As the haze of another beer practice closed gently around the minds of 80 undergrads and half again as many aged white dog alumni — the venerable Olde Farts, the living history of Williams rugby — nary a rucker considered the physiological havoc to be wrought by so many swills of Old Milwaukee. Fewer cared. But after suffering through the dreamless nightmares of AIDS (alcohol induced drunken sleep), the players rose, slowly at first to vie, for the first time in many months, for the right to be called 'victor.'

When the first ball was put into play, the A-side quickly staked the undergrads to a 14-0 lead. Never really threatened because of the fine ball control of the scrum, spear-headed by junior hooker Chas Benedict, the A's were allowed to forego the exhaustive task of defense and concentrate on scoring. Behind the precision passing of captain Michael Sullivan '88, and the punishing running of Brian Baird '89, the white dogs rode the crest of superior physical conditioning to the early lead.

After an earlier Mike Goldstein '88 to Andy Harris '88 conversion for a try, Goldstein again ignited the Williams line. As the A-side pack, under the tuition of captain Nils Christofersen '88, was to do all afternoon, it provided the ball for scrumhalf Kurt Oeler '88. From Oeler to Goldstein to Baird and the footrace began.

Slashing through the alumni with the fury of a pit bull terrier, Baird forced the ball deep into enemy territory, and with one man left to beat, passed the ball a la Meadowlark Lemon behind his back to Sullivan who slipped a heroic pass into the hungry hands of club president Tom Higgins '88 who touched down for the score. In frustration on the sidelines, one Olde Fart could only remark: "Built like Eddle O'Toole ('86) and he runs so spryly; like a gazelle."

But A-side joy and elation were soon forgotten as the more experienced alumni turned up the heat on the Williams younger players. The Killer B's kept things close allowing only one score during thirty minutes of play. With Joe Mannix '89 at the link, the transition from a strong scrum led by remarkable play from Sherwood Smith '89 and Jon Dillon '89 at the hook, was as smooth as combed cotton. Mike Shelby '88 provided the tough hits inside and Julius Yang '89 and Steve Felix '90 shored up the wings in an outstanding defensive effort.

Although the alumni were to triumph eventually by the rather lopsided tally of 38-14, the lower slides all showed great promise for the future of the club. Sterling defensive efforts were recorded by Eddle Anderson and Bruce Young, both juniors. Phil Jack '90 continued to show great deft in his play at fullback. Young players in the scrum also displayed great savvy: Tim Murphy '89 and Wil Lafave '90 both delivered several shivering hits to creaking alumni bodies. Freshman Matt Conlin impressed the opposition with his quick study of rugby play.

With a challenging nine week schedule before them, the White Dogs of the WRFC seem in excellent position to vanquish all who dare come before them. Eight weeks until Amherst.

Volleyball

A tired Eph squad competed in a long day of volleyball on Saturday, placing second in a six-team tournament held at Connecticut College in New London, Conn.

The Ephs started out strong as they won their three-team pool convincingly, beating both Amherst and Bowdoin in straight games. Winning the pool earned the women a bye in the next round as the losers fought for the right to continue on. Amherst beat Conn. College to get to the semifinals, but the Ephwomen quickly snuffed out the Jeffs' fire, winning a tough match in straight games, 15-7 and 15-12, to advance to the finals.

The winning feeling continued into the first game of the finals, a 15-6 victory over Hamilton. The second game of the final match saw the Ephs lose their momentum as the tournament grind took its toll, especially the emotionally draining Amherst matches. Hamilton went on to win the last two games of the match, 15-10 and 15-12, narrowly gaining a comeback victory.

Coach Nancy Roberts was happy about the team's opening exhibition, especially highlighting the efforts of senior tri-captains Jenny Aulse and Maureen Brand, as well as the hard-hitting Laurie Hartsoe '91. Laura Wefling '88 and sophomores Kathy McConnel and Shelly Whelpton round out the starting six. Ruth Burday '90 came off the bench to give setters Wefling and Whelpton a much needed rest.

Tonight the team faces Smith and Amherst at Smith, and Saturday the squad travels to Hamilton for matches against Hamilton and Skidmore.

W. Soccer

Despite the loss of key players to graduation, the women's varsity soccer team started the new season with an easy 5-0 victory over a weak Vassar team. That victory, however, only served as the preface to two losses to North Adams State College and SUNY-Albany.

With eleven freshmen and three upperclassmen who have never played with the team before, Coach Lisa Melendy has a very young and inexperienced team to work with. Melendy attributed last Wednesday's 4-0 loss to North Adams to the fact that her squad had underestimated the strength of the Mohawks. "We didn't realize that they were strong, and they scored all their goals in the first half. But despite some communications problems, we played well in the second half," said Melendy.

The team travelled to Albany last Saturday to face a solid SUNY-Albany team. However, due to rain the previous day and night, the players had to struggle in muddy field conditions. The outcome: a 1-0 loss.

Melendy commented on the game — "(With the) bad field condition, it wasn't a skills game. Because of the 4-0 loss to North Adams, we concentrated on a tight defense throughout the game. However, some key players were injured and there were was a flu around. But we played well; it was just that opportunities didn't convert into goals."

The coach remarked that because of the fresh make-up of the team, she thinks of this year as a rebuilding year for the team. The team is scheduled to face a tough Skidmore team, whom it has not beaten in two years, and a strong Smith squad this week. Melendy said that she will focus on improving passing and shooting in order to capitalize on more opportunities.

The women's and men's cross country teams ran at Middlebury on Saturday — the men in a dual meet with the Panthers and the women in a five team competition. The men, a squad depleted by injury, lost by a 24-32 score, while the women ran into third place, with the scoring as follows: Bates 20, Middlebury 45, Williams 60, Albany St. 96, and Johnson St. 145.

The women were led by captain Sarah Pierce '88 who covered the 5,000 meter course

Undefeated men's soccer unscored upon

by Ted Ruger

The men's soccer squad, full of talent and a desire to expel the memory of last year's 8-4-2 squad that missed the ECAC playoffs, opened its season with a very successful first week, featuring home victories over Springfield and Hamilton.

Saturday's game, a 3-0 win over the Continentals, was a particularly impressive showing in which the Ephs dominated both offensively and defensively. Williams had eight corner kicks to Hamilton's one, and outshot their visitors by an amazing 32-4 margin.

Hamilton could master only one legitimate scoring chance against the solid Eph defense. Dan Calichman '90, Mike Roach '88, Rob Swann '90, Steve Bailey '91, and Mike Morris '88, helped goalkeeper Rob Blanck '89 earn his second consecutive shutout.

"We really shut them down. They only had one good chance to score the entire game," said captain and midfielder Nick Nachamkin '88. "Their offense was fairly old-fashioned and unimaginative and we handled it well."

Despite controlling play and putting constant pressure on the Hamilton goal, the Williams squad could not find the back of the net in the first half and found itself tied at 0-0 at the break.

On the Board

The second half was a different story, however. Less than ten minutes into the period Doug Brooks '90 put the Ephs up to stay. Brooks pounced on a through ball in the box from Mike Masters '89 and put it in the net. Just ten minutes later, Nachamkin took a pass from Calichman off a free kick and blasted it into the corner of the goal. Brooks sealed the win when he knocked in a rebound with just two minutes left to put the squad up 3-0.

Nachamkin said Coach Michael Russo made no significant changes at halftime to increase the scoring. "We

WWRFC taught lesson in 36-4 alumnae defeat

by Cecilia Malm

The women's rugby football club made its debut Saturday in a traditional match played against the Used Bagges — a team of dedicated alumnae who left their cluttered desks, grumbling faces, and New York nightclubs to come relive their glory days on the verdant pitches of the Purple Valley.

The Bagges first faced an eager A-side squad who quickly set the pace of the game as R. Sophia Lennigick '88 burst through the supporting scrum to score. Undaunted, the Bagges retaliated and Kate Shaw '87 saw the opportunity to touch down a loose ball in the try zone, proving once again that you do not have to run to play rugby.

The Killer B-side team swarmed onto the pitch for the second period but those winded Bagges held them back with devastating tackles and tough rucking by Lael Ludtke '84, Ann Melvin '85, and Sarah Keohane '84. Fine scrum work by Diana Roberto '86 gave the Bagges possession of the ball, and Ginger Williams '85 made a brilliant run, passing at the last moment to Allison Martin '85 to the try.

Kara Lynch '90 blocked a scoring attempt by the Bagges' fiery red scrum half, Stephanie Jacob '87, but Dorie Dew '85 soon humiliated the defense by sprinting into the try zone with her trusty teammates Kerry Cullen '87, Anne Marie Plankey '87, Kate Litten '87, and Meg Holiday close at hand.

The C-side took the field in the third period. Many of the C's were new ruggers playing their first game with outstanding desire, but alas, experience still triumphed over youthful enthusiasm. Barbara Goode '82 scored with the help of brilliant ball work by Beck Halley '86 and Suzanne Bielmueller '87. Mary Peterson '87 scored in addition to all the points she had already contributed to the game with her magical kicks.

With a final score of 36-4, the Used Bagges leave Billsville triumphant, but even though they may play the wild rover for many a year, we look forward to their return each fall to reassure us that rugby mentality is a permanent affliction.

Sophomore number one player Amy Davidson smacks a forehand in her match on Saturday. Davidson and team fell to Tufts to the tune of 7-2. (Scala)

1-0 Field Hockey to host Skidmore today

by Marc McDermott

Outshooting Vassar 22-3, but only outscoring them 1-0, the women's field hockey team dominated its opening-day opponent of nine days ago. The team just ended a ten-day layoff today, hosting Skidmore on Cole Field at 4 p.m.

The one goal margin of victory in the opener belies the onesidedness of the contest. The Ephs benefitted not only from their offensive onslaught, but also from Vassar's gift of 23 penalty corners. The first and only goal of the game came twenty-seven minutes into the first half. Senior co-captain Lisa Tenerowicz combined with sophomore Mo Flaherty to feed Kirsten Neuse '89, who pushed the ball into the net for the score. Having touched twice once, the squad needed no more offense as it glided to an easy shutout win.

The victory gets the squad off to a good start in its quest to improve on last year's impressive 8-4 record. Coach Chris Larson Mason will look to co-captains Tenerowicz and Suzanne Falcone '88 to lead a strong contingent of veterans, including: Flaherty (5 goals, 3 assists in '86); sophomore Amy Kershaw (5 goals, 1 assist); Neuse (4 goals, 1 assist); and junior netminder Wynn Hohlt who posted four shutouts last year.

Jumbos drop netters to .500

by Jim McDermott

After falling to Tufts University 7-2 Saturday, the women's tennis team slid back to .500, after a 7-2 trouncing of Vassar a week earlier at home. The loss to the defending New England champions was unusual in that the match, played here under chilling weather conditions, was conducted so that the doubles and singles matches were played simultaneously. This runs contrary to the normal format in which singles players can, and do, compete in doubles after their first matches are complete.

Coach Sean Sloane said that this type of match did not really affect the way the two teams would compare regularly. It did, however, allow some of the team's strong freshmen to gain valuable match experience. At number two doubles, the class of '90 team of Katherine Stearns and Lisa Brayton soundly beat their Tufts opponents in straight sets, 6-1, 6-2.

In singles, the only win came at the number three slot. Mary Montgomery '88 beat Kirsten Collar in a three set battle. After losing the first set 5-7 and winning the second 6-4, Montgomery was faced with a 5-4 deficit late in the third set. She responded by winning the next ten points, including three baseline winners and a putaway volley uncharacteristic of her steady baseline play. She said the key to her victory resulted from her "being more aggressive and trying something, like the volley."

Vassar trampled

A week earlier, the team coasted as only its number four singles and number two doubles players lost in the victory over Vassar. The most important matches in the win came at number one and five singles, according to assistant coach Ed

Grees. Amy Davidson '90 beat her number one opponent in three sets, pulling out a 2-6, 7-5, 6-2 come-back victory. She relied on her solid groundstrokes to rally from losing the first set to win the close second set and coast through the third. Katie Brackenridge '88 started quickly and beat Chris Bark (Vassar's number 5 player) 6-3, 6-4.

In evaluating his squad after two revealing matches, Coach Sloane said, "The team has a nice blend of experience and youth with some excellent freshmen and good players returning." He pointed to the hard work his players put in at practice and was optimistic about the season and the team's chances for equalling last season's third place in the New England tournament.

The team hosted Skidmore today at 4:00 and travels to Smith on Saturday.

Senior Lewis Collins snares a pass in a scrimmage against Mass. Maritime ten days ago. The tight-end and the rest of his teammates won't take to the field for real until this Saturday, when they will host Middlebury. Collins and his senior teammates have never lost a game to the Panthers. (Camp)

Department chairmen stress minority recruiting efforts

by Craig Gangi and Paul Kwon

Although the college's academic departments are vigorously pursuing potential minority faculty members, their efforts at recruitment often fall short of hiring goals because of a variety of external factors, several department chairmen said last week.

Individual departmental hiring of minorities has been targeted by the College Council as the next area of focus in its ongoing examination of how the college recruits minority faculty. Last spring the council explored how the Committee on Appointments and Promotions (CAP) recruits minority faculty.

College Council distributed to the faculty last May a summary of the responses to a questionnaire regarding the composition of the CAP and faculty recruitment. Fifty-five faculty members responded, the majority of whom cited the same difficulties as department chairmen in attracting minority candidates to Williams.

One-third to one-half of the faculty responses cited a difference between departments in effort spent to recruit minority and women faculty, however, whereas department chairmen all spoke of repeated and concerted attempts at recruitment.

The lack of a black community in Williamstown, the scarcity of lab and research facilities at Williams, and high competition among colleges and universities for qualified minority candidates make it difficult to recruit minority faculty at Williams, according to political science department chairman Gary Jacobsohn.

Jacobsohn said his department actively pursues minority candidates and takes affirmative action when hiring.

"We look carefully at applications from minority candidates, and if they look very good, we might invite them up (for an interview) in situations where we wouldn't invite a non-minority candidate," he said.

"Unusual diligence"

"Failure to succeed (in hiring minorities) shouldn't reflect negatively on the efforts of the department," Jacobsohn said. "We go about (minority recruitment) with unusual diligence. The political science department has made over the last few years four offers for a position in Afro-American politics. For various reasons, we've been turned down ... We could write a book on it."

The recruitment process involves a cooperative effort between departments and the CAP, said professor William Grant, the acting chairman of the biology department. Grant said his department follows standard college procedures for minority faculty recruitment, including advertising for job openings in publications for minorities.

"We make it very clear in the ad that we encourage minorities and women to apply," Grant said, adding that the biology department also places advertisements in major science journals and sends fliers to various institutions.

Tougher in sciences

Difficulties in recruitment in the sciences are compounded by the fact that there seem to be fewer minority candidates in the science pool than in other areas. Grant said he thinks the reason for the lack is that minority science students tend to pursue careers in applied professions, such as medicine, rather than research in their fields.

"We are most anxious to increase the number of minority professors in both the biology department and in the sciences in general," Grant added, "and we make a very

Tauber chairs IPECS, new department for innovative, interdisciplinary courses

by Peter Balaban

A program to facilitate innovations in the curriculum at Williams is beginning its first year.

The Interdepartmental Program for Experimental and Cross-Disciplinary Studies (IPECS) is, according to its description in the 1987-88 Course Catalog, "designed to facilitate and promote innovations in curricular offerings in relation both to interdisciplinary conceptual focus and experimental pedagogical form."

According to Professor of Political Science Kurt Tauber, who chairs the program, IPECS also fills the more modest bureaucratic role of providing an institutional home for the interdisciplinary Freshman Residential Seminar (FRS) courses and the student-initiated course "Non-violence and Social Change."

Tauber said that the program has at its disposal a fund provided by an anonymous alumni family in support of curricular innovation.

Innovations

College President Francis Oakley said the program will provide an administrative structure for accommodating and evaluating new programs, instead of placing the onus on individual faculty members. In addition, he said, IPECS itself may come up with ideas for new programs.

"It will create a mechanism to help people who have ideas... and to see a proposal through channels," Oakley said. "Some innovations come in ordinary departmental settings, (but) it's nice to have a reserve to turn to."

"One thing that no college or university can afford to be is complacent about what it's doing.... It should always, if it's a healthy institution, be open to new things," he said.

Curricular developments

Tauber, who also chairs the Gaudino Committee, said he would like to use IPECS to begin a series of curricular developments in experiential courses, student-initiated courses and perhaps nonviolence programs.

Although he said he wasn't sure whether the program should "dive right into the business of developing cross-disciplinary programs in areas such as peace studies and world studies" or concentrate on developing individual courses, he said he encourages both faculty and students to come forward with ideas.

Tauber said the Literary Studies and Asian Studies majors, which the faculty approved in March, were created because of significant student interest.

"Williams is a very conservative place, educationally speaking," Tauber said, and in justifying new programs "the burden of proof is on those who would like to innovate." IPECS, he said, will urge Williams to engage in curricular innovation.

Conflict of interest?

Tauber said he was aware of the potential conflict of interest between his role as chair of IPECS and his role as Gaudino Committee chairman. "Clearly it would be very cozy to think up proposals at Gaudino and then put on another hat and say, 'Yes, let's do it in this program,'" he said.

"It's not likely that it will be a pattern where the two will be combined," Oakley said of Tauber's involvement with IPECS and Gaudino. "(But) there is some economy of effort involved."

Oakley noted that any IPECS proposal, regardless of its sponsor, must also go before the Committee on Educational Policy (CEP), and that the faculty will vote on curricular changes.

Tauber will resign as Gaudino Scholar at the end of this academic year, something he said he had planned to do before being named to chair IPECS.

The faculty, voting March 11, approved IPECS for a period of five years.

Council reorganizes the freshman council

by Susanne Abell

The College Council, in an effort to increase the accountability to the council of its student-faculty committee liaisons, has implemented several changes in the liaison system.

Council Vice-President Nicole Melcher '88 said that, beginning this year, most committees will select a liaison to the council from among their student members. In the past, liaisons to the committees were appointed by the council's elections committee.

The liaisons to the Committees on Educational Policy and Undergraduate Life will still be nominated by the elections committee and confirmed by the council, she said.

Melcher said that as the council's elections committee went through its review of applications for student-faculty committees last spring, it tried "to find out what the committees did, when they met, and who they reported to."

"We found out that no one knows," she said. "It was a pretty ambiguous thing."

The liaisons will meet every other week with the officers of the council in order to convey committee ideas and programs and to solicit help from the council.

"Basically, we're trying to clean up the system," Melcher said. "We definitely want committees to be accountable to the council."

Although some committees were very active and met regularly, Melcher said she knew of at least one student committee

Innovation and tradition in the Williams curriculum

This semester marks the debut of the Interdepartmental Program for Experimental and Cross-Disciplinary Studies (IPECS). Approved by the faculty in March, the program's stated goal is to provide "support for faculty and student efforts to develop a curriculum that creatively responds to intellectual needs and modes of teaching/learning that currently fall outside the conventional pattern."

IPECS will serve partly as an institutional file folder within which to place a number of programs already in existence, such as the Freshman Residential Seminars and the student-initiated course "Non-violence and Social Change." But it is not simply an administrative entity. The IPECS program also holds promise of a greater flexibility and diversity within the Williams liberal arts education.

The value of IPECS, however, is inextricably bound up with the curricular environment within which it finds itself. New and innovative approaches to both traditional and non-traditional subjects are valuable, but only in so much as they do not supplant the traditional modes of intellectual inquiry.

Departmental delineations, for all their artificial clarity, do reflect significant differences in the modes of inquiry that each discipline brings to bear on its subject matter. The goal of a major in the liberal arts education is to familiarize students with at least one such mode, so that they too may employ it in their future interpretive efforts.

IPECS does not in and of itself threaten the prominence of such modes of inquiry in the Williams curriculum, but carried too far, it could. While our caution may seem unnecessary, the danger of losing touch with the traditional disciplines of a liberal arts education does not seem so remote as to warrant easy dismissal.

Our feeling about IPECS, then, is one of cautious enthusiasm. While we recognize the institutional gaps which the program seeks to fill, and while we applaud its efforts to add flexibility to the Williams curriculum, we are wary of undue haste in adding to the program's curricular prominence.

The Reagan legacy lies in a critical national feeling of self-sufficiency

To the Editor:
Although my friend John Canty's heart was in the right place in his critique ("New Patriotism," Record, September 15), his mind was obviously elsewhere.

Canty said that the Reagan revolution seems to have ended sometime in 1985. The cessation of the implementation of the President's vision on the American political system was not a result of that vision's lack of foresight, as Canty says, but the result of bombastic idealists such as Canty failing to see the validity and common-sense logic of the completeness of President Reagan's true vision.

In 1980, most of Reagan's appeal to a country suffering from economic malaise was his faith in the ability of the American people to improve their own lot better than the government was able to do. Canty simply ignores the goals of the Administration when he says that the Federal Government "can be a vehicle for positive action." Reagan has spent the last seven years trying to convince the American people that individuals are a far more efficient vehicle for positive action than the Federal Government.

When Canty says that "cost cannot be the sole factor" in any attempt to solve the nation's ills, he displays a remarkable ignorance. His zealous desire to see an end to evil and misfortune prevents him from seeing that his goals only promote the things he detests. It is his fundamental disagreement with the Administration's agenda for the implementation of change that caused him to label Reagan's vision "shallow."

Canty seems to neglect the essence of what Reagan's vision has been all along. He derides the New Patriotism's "basic divorce from a sense of national commitment" only because he does not see what that commitment really is.

The truth is that Reagan's vision does not, as Canty said, want people to "pursue a self-absorbed life with no obligation to aid their fellows." For one to even think that Reagan is so malicious evidences an incredible lack of understanding. An implementation of the vision Canty called New Patriotism is better able to help the people he called "those less fortunate" than is the bureaucratic and inefficient welfare state that he wants to use to solve the nation's ills.

College scheduling panel overlooks dissent with calendar conversions

To the Editor:
For the past year, students have been in the dark as to how the Calendar and Scheduling Committee views students, when it considers us at all. Now, thanks to Professor of History Russell Bostert, we have some idea.

According to him, students are a "reactionary, conservative" bunch who are in mad rush to sign every petition waved in front of their faces. He doesn't appear to think students might actually be able to judge what is in their best interest.

If his attempt at a witty dismissal isn't bad enough, he advises students not to criticize a schedule that hasn't been tried yet. I spent four days at Williams last Thanksgiving. During Thanksgiving the College is near-deserted, isolated, and cold. I seriously doubt spending additional time in the same state will make it more appealing. Yet, Professor Bostert wants me to withhold judgement because I haven't tried his nine-day plan.

Students protested against the new schedule and signed a petition opposing it, because we had faith the administration and faculty would treat our complaints seriously. Instead, it looks like some treated the protest as a big joke.

If Professor Bostert does not reflect the committee's view, I offer a suggestion: Instead of the new schedule, why doesn't the faculty try passing a different resolution? Just announce the College is only interested in students from the Northeast. That resolution would be much simpler than the new schedule, and it would have the same result.

Breaking the spiral: toward a U.S.-USSR nuclear pact

With the agreement in principle last week between the Soviet Union and the United States over first-ever reductions in their stockpiles of intermediate-nuclear weapons, it appeared that a watershed event had occurred in the foreign policy of the Reagan Administration, long known for its enmity toward the Soviets. Record reporter Brad Gendell talked to Williams Professor Fred Greene about the agreement's implications.

On its effects on American-Soviet relations in general: When you're dealing with an American government that has been very hostile to the Russians and yet has been engaged in negotiations with them, you have a paradox.... A combination of verbal hostility and real diplomatic bargaining has been picking up during the Gorbachev years.

The current agreement is less important because of its specific military implications than for the simple fact that it is the first major agreement between the superpowers since 1979.... Also, this is the first agreement where they are going to take out missiles instead of simply limiting the number of missiles and bombers. There is a verification process built into the agreement.

On the long-range effects of the agreement, if a treaty is ratified: If a conservative Administration like Reagan's can reach an arms control agreement it will be difficult for later Administrations of either party not to do the same.... Passage of this agreement will make it easier for future agreements to get through the legislative and avoid the problems SALT II encountered. Two, if this agreement successfully implemented a verification process, then future agreements can build on that and reduce the constant suspicion that the Russians are cheating....

On the role of the controversial Strategic Defense Initiative (SDI) on the negotiations: SDI does not have a role.... The whole Reykjavik idea was to come up with an agreement on long-range missiles.... The Russians want some limit to keep the US from deploying SDI.... Until there is an agreement (on that area), there will be no progress on long-range missiles. In a sense, the SDI roadblock funnelled energy into these negotiations on shorter-range missiles.

On the chances of the agreement's passage under a "lame duck" Reagan Administration: I don't think that will have any effect. Reagan is still a strong leader of the Republican Party, which could be the source of most of the opposition to the treaty.

On the theory, beginning with Richard Nixon and the SALT I accords of 1972, that Republican Presidents have a better chance at reaching meaningful agreements with the Soviets: It could be true that that might happen, but the fact that a conservative President is pushing for arms control means that any President, Democrat or Republican, will have the same kind of a shot. On margin, this question should focus on moderate Republicans who are more amenable to NATO allies a graded, flexible response to the Soviet threat. With these missiles removed, the idea of a self-contained force in Europe to respond to a Soviet attack has been shredded. The remaining short-range warheads will be seen by the allies as essential to maintaining this more limited deterrence capability.

The British and French will probably be more determined to keep their missiles in Europe.... They will have approximately 1000 warheads in the next decade. That makes them major parties to any future negotiation. The only thing that might change their plans would be a negotiated agreements.... The Reagan contribution is simply to make arms control agreements legitimate again.

On the implications of the agreement for NATO's European deterrent: The intermediate range missiles (added in 1979 and now to be scrapped by the agreement) were supposed to give the significant reduction in Soviet arms.

Our allies may become more skeptical of American constancy in Europe.... The Europeans may get together more, they may fall more in control of their own destiny and be less amenable to US leadership in conducting arms negotiations. European autonomy may increase.

Campus rights protests judge nations with double standard

by Michael Barbera '89

I read with great interest in last week's Daily Advisor that our campus charter of Amnesty International was asking students to sign a letter in protest of Chile's human rights violations. If memory serves me, a similar campaign was conducted last year as well. Certainly, no one can quarrel with the basic cause behind this effort. All of us should support the promotion of human rights. It strikes me, however, that the human worthy of note. The authoritarian regime of Augusto Pinochet has been one of the most repressive in Latin America, a fact made clear by Amnesty International.

But if that is where our concern ends, we do a grave disservice to the cause of global human rights. We hear precious little on campus about the conduct of such tyrannical regimes as Nicaragua, Cambodia, Vietnam, Ethiopia, Afghanistan, and Cuba. Any casual reader of Amnesty International's Annual Reports can see that these regimes violate human rights violations systematically year after year. Yet there are no tables set up in Baxter Hall in protest of these nations' human rights records. Why is there such selective interest in the preservation of human rights?

If we are truly concerned with the promotion of freedom and liberty around the world, we should be outraged at all abuses of human rights, whether they come from right-wing or communist governments. We should be outraged at the consistent harassment of the Miskito Indians in Nicaragua, many of whom are killed indiscriminately because they do not agree with the Sandinistas. We should be outraged by the systematic starvation of the desert people in Ethiopia, whose government diverts international relief efforts so that the military is fed while the desert tribes die. We should be outraged by the tales of political repression told by the immigrants from Southeast Asia. We should be, but apparently we are not.

This is not a problem unique to our school community. Our national media seems all too happy to report on the alleged human rights abuse of anti-communist rebel groups while giving ning." The Committee also received reports of some two hundred human rights violations by the ruling Sandinista junta." Oh, really. A committee that was charged with investigating the human rights abuses of the contras received reports of ten times as many violations by Daniel Ortega and his communist little coverage to the horrible human rights records of the governments the rebels are fighting. Examples can be found in the coverage of civil wars in Nicaragua and Angola.

A case in point occurred this past July. My local newspaper carried a piece, "Report Details Contra Rights Abuses," by the Associated Press wire service. The article covered a report issued by the Nicaraguan Human Rights Committee, a group hired by Congress in 1986 to report on the human rights practices of the contras.

The article's lead sections detailed the twenty-two reports of human rights violations by the contras that the group received. Further down in the story was a rather interesting paragraph begin-deputies. One would think that would make a terrific story in itself. Apparently, the Associated Press did not. Neither did Congress's Committee.

Students here at Williams have little control over the national media. We certainly control, however, the political debate taking place on our own campus. If human rights is to be an issue, as it certainly should be, then we should address the problem without regard to ideology. The same standards must be applied to all nations. Let us concern ourselves with the human rights of all people, whether they live under tyranny from the right or the left. South Africa and Chile are not the only countries which abuse human rights. We should not pretend that they are.

rights struggle on our campus is decidedly limited, focused on two countries—South Africa and Chile.

There are good reasons to be concerned with these countries. The cause of blacks in South Africa is one of the great issues of our time. We should be moved by their struggle to end the repulsive policies of apartheid. Chile as well is

Mt. Sinai seeks pre-med

A new program at Williams, offered in conjunction with the Mount Sinai School of Medicine in New York, will enable undergraduates to take fewer science courses on campus than is often possible in a pre-medical course of study.

The program is one of a handful in the country in which students gain acceptance to a medical school early in their college careers. Similar programs are offered by Amherst, Hamilton and Haverford colleges and by Wesleyan University.

Mount Sinai's Humanities and Medicine program requires only one year of chemistry and one year of biology, plus one or two summer intersessions at Mount Sinai, for admission to its School of Medicine, which is part of the City University of New York.

The intersession, between sophomore and junior years, includes a seminar series focusing on the humanities and medicine, as well as a specialized course, "Basic Organic Chemistry and Physics Related to Medical Sciences," for those students who have not studied organic chemistry and physics as part of their undergraduate program.

Chemistry professor James Skinner, the college's pre-medical adviser, said that since this is the first year of the program, he does not yet have a sense of student interest in it.

Students apply for admission to the program no later than the beginning of the second semester of their freshman year, and must maintain at least a B average during their four years at Williams in order to qualify.

"It's a good way for the medical school to attract students majoring in the humanities to a career in medicine," Skinner said. "Non-science majors at Williams apply to, and are accepted by, medical schools throughout the country, but this program addresses formally the issue of whether the preparation of many physicians is as broad as it should be."

Chemistry receives $10,000

The chemistry department has received a $10,000 grant from the Alcoa Foundation. According to department chairman James Skinner the grant will be used to purchase new instrumentation for the physical chemistry laboratory, and to assist younger professors in beginning research programs.

For almost 20 years the Alcoa Foundation has provided the chemistry department with funds on a continuing basis, amounting to more than $100,000, for this purpose.

Skinner says that the grant will help supply the department with the type of up-to-date laboratory equipment necessary for student and faculty research. "We are most appreciative of the Alcoa Foundation's continuing support," Skinner said, "and are especially grateful to Torrence Hunt," Hunt, a 1944 graduate of Williams, is a former Vice President at Alcoa, who for many years brought the needs of the Williams chemistry department to the attention of the Alcoa Foundation.

"Advances are continually being made in the types of laboratory equipment available," Skinner said, "and we must keep up with these improvements both to maintain a high level of instruction for our students and to further the research of our faculty."

Kuo gets grant for China

Jason Kuo, assistant professor of art, has been awarded a grant to study the works of Huang Binhong, one of the most important painters in 20th-century China, at the Zhejiang Academy of Fine Arts in Hangzhou, China.

According to Kuo, Huang Binhong was one of the last and greatest literati painters in China. The presence in China from the eleventh century until modern times of literati painters, Kuo says, "is a peculiarly Chinese phenomenon." Literati painters were primarily men of letters rather than primarily artists.

During the 1988-89 academic year, when Kuo is affiliated with the Zhejiang Academy, he will examine Huang Binhong's paintings to determine the important characteristics of his style, in particular his composition and brushwork. Kuo intends to complete a comprehensive monograph, as well as a scholarly catalogue to accompany an exhibition on Huang Binhong's art he is organizing for the Williams College Museum of Art.

Kuo received a B.A. degree in foreign languages and literatures, and an M.A. degree in history and Chinese art, both from National Taiwan University. He earned his Ph.D. in art history from the University of Michigan in 1980. He has written many articles on Chinese art, and is the author of two books.

Panelists discuss "Safe Intimacy at Williams"

by Stephanie Jones

AIDS, safe sex and abstinence were the topics of discussion at a panel last Sunday night entitled "Safe Intimacy at Williams".

Members of the panel were Dr. James Corkins of the Williams Health Center, Ray Paulsen of the Gay Men's Health Crisis in New York, Elaine Hantman of the Williams Psychological Counseling Center and Williams Chaplain Carol Pepper.

Corkins began the discussion by saying that any amount of risk of AIDS is extremely dangerous because of the fatal and incurable nature of the disease. "Voluntary testing is a wise personal choice and a wise public policy," he said.

Paulsen disagreed, saying that the test was for antibodies, so a person could have the virus and still test negative. He said that the safest way to have invasive sex was to know your partner's sexual and I.V. drug use history and to wear a latex condom with nonoxynol-9 spermicide.

"Typically an individual is not likely to believe he is susceptible to AIDS," Hantman said. She said that college students are unlikely to use precautions because of obstacles to obtaining condoms, reluctance to talk about sex and AIDS and a woman's fear of spilling the moment or offending her partner. "The media has made AIDS akin to the plague," she said.

Pepper talked of the need to be sure of wanting to have sex, saying, "In a way it's sad that we need AIDS to talk about being intentional." She added, "Abstinence is a positive value in that abstinence is saying, 'I know my value as a human being, and I know what it is to be loved.'" positive effort to have them up for an interview if they are in the pool of qualified candidates."

Because the pool of qualified minority candidates is so small, competition for qualified candidates among colleges and universities is intense.

There were in 1984, for example, only 31 black faculty candidates in the U.S. with doctorates in psychological fields other than clinical and counseling psychology, said professor Andrew Crider, chairman of the Department of Psychology. Those 31 candidates had 2000 to 3000 colleges in the country from which to choose an employer, he said.

Suggestions from the council's summary of faculty responses include: • "Hiring exceptional minority doctoral candidates who have yet to finish their dissertation and offering them a reduced teaching load in order to complete it while teaching at Williams." • "Bringing in visiting women and minority professors from other institutions."

• "Hiring a minority or a woman candidate even if it means not filling the subfield that most needs filling."

"Efforts are being redoubled," acting Dean of the Faculty George Goethals said. "We do all we can to make sure that every possible minority gets a very good look Efforts are being pushed to an absolute maximum."

Profile: Professor Jing-Heng Ma

by Ann Mantil

In the four years since Associate Professor Jing-Heng Ma joined the faculty of Williams, the school has seen the beginning of Chinese language instruction and the founding of the Department of East Asian Languages. The future of the program was so uncertain in 1984, however, that Ma's original status was that of Visiting Associate Professor.

Now there are three full-time instructors in Chinese and Japanese. Next year Ma, as chairman of the department, plans to offer a course in Chinese Literature in translation.

This Winter Study she will lead approximately twenty Williams students and alumni on a trip to China. She plans on taking the group to eight or nine different cities, as she did on a similar trip several years ago. "Last time the students didn't stop, not even to sleep!" she said.

Students who haven't taken Chinese are encouraged to go. Ma plans to divide the students into small groups, each with one student who has had some instruction in the language. Before the trip, participants will write reports on topics such as Chinese religion, art and history.

Ma is a native of Beijing, China, and lived there until she was a teenager. After World War II her family went to Taiwan for a visit and was not allowed to return to the mainland, because of her father's political work. She attended a teacher's university in Taipei, and there she began to teach Chinese to American Fulbright Scholars.

After she graduated she was hired as an instructor at the Chinese Mandarin Training Center in Taipei, sponsored by Cornell University. Three years later she moved to the Philippines with her husband and obtained a master's degree in education.

When she was in the Philippines, one of her former students in the Cornell program, a professor at the University of Michigan, wrote her about the expanded Chinese department and offered her a position as an

Clark Art Institute

Big-time art enriches small town

by Marilyn Germano

The average Williams College student could probably tell you that the Clark is a world-renowned art institute in Williamstown. Not many people know much more. It seems that, even though the Sterling and Francine Clark Art Institute is within walking distance from much of the college and everyone realizes that it is there, few people know of its history or the history of its founders.

Robert Sterling Clark, born in 1877, grew up surrounded by people who had a great interest in art and the means to collect it. His grandfather was the business partner of sewing machine magnate Isaac Singer. His brother Stephen's collection is now housed in Yale's art

Crafty capitalists compete on campus

by Whitney Merrill

Want to make money, set your own hours, and be your own boss? If you do, then you should consider joining the growing number of students at Williams who are going into business for themselves and selling their goods and services to the college community. All it takes is a little planning, some capital, and a little insight into the wants and needs of college students.

If you've seen people in Baxter selling T-shirts, tapestries or boxer shorts, you've seen this entrepreneurial spirit in action. Seniors Terry Huits and Wilbur Swan have been spending their lunch hours selling tapestries for $11 apiece. Like any aspiring entrepreneurs, Huits and Swan realized they had to keep costs down. In order to buy the quantity necessary to minimize overhead, they needed to obtain a State Tax License.

"The tax license is the key if you want to buy from big distributors and get good prices," Huits said. They initially ordered 60 tapestries and were thinking of placing another order as the paper went to press.

Capitalism in action

The sale of computer disks has recently become competitive enough to generate a price war. These computer paraphernalia peddlers have their customers place orders by phone or through an SU box and then send the disks back to the customers' SU boxes.

The business has been growing exponentially, and price competition has been fierce. At the start of school, prices were as high as $3 for a 3 1/2" disk. The increase in competition has forced the sellers to lower their prices to $2.50 and even $2.00.

In order to run a business on campus you must obtain a business permit from the Dean of the College. This entails filing a form with the dean's office and having it approved and signed by Associate Dean Mary Kenyatta. Regulations concerning student business are stated in the Student Handbook (pp. 71-72). A secretary at the Dean's Office, Joan Martin, said that it is not difficult to obtain a permit and approximately 30 people receive them every year.

Some students make money by sponsoring outside businesses that come to the school to

Artists carve 'Trays of Our Lives'

by Erik T. Burns

They are everywhere. Like fragments from a paranoid's worst nightmare, the words permeate your meal. Sometimes they are pleasant, sometimes gruesome. It is hard to eat off of a virgin tray in Baxter Hall. In most cases they have been deflowered by the witty hand of some would-be artist. These fine white etchings on a burnt orange sky provide a quick glimpse into the psyche of the etcher.

An imported tad

Tray etching, it appears, is not an original Williams idea. Just who began the practice here is a mystery, but theories abound. Like the aftermath of a terrorist attack, rival factions scramble to take responsibility. Most likely, all people's tales are true — tray art perhaps occurred contemporaneously around campus due to a cosmic gestalt.

The most solid story comes from a member of the class of 1990. (All participants in this activity spoke only to The Record after their anonymity was assured, to avoid, as one artist put it, "food service coming down on (our collective) head.") The sophomore artist claims that the practice began at Hampshire College where a roommate, visiting there for the weekend, observed tray etching and brought home to Williams tales of glory and splendor. Indeed it appears as though the majority of Baxter trays have been etched by a group of about six sophomores who lived in the same entry in '87.

Another story comes from a member of the class of 1988 who claims the practice began with a Vassar student named Timothy Stefanini. Stefanini allegedly carved the seminal tray, a "Tray of Death" (of which at least two facsimiles appear in Baxter) which led rapidly to a profusion of etching at Vassar.

The Vassar etchings, which include such gruesome epigrams as "Tray of Decapitation with Blunt Instruments" and "Tray of Life-Threatening Intestinal Disorders" resemble, at least in content, some of the more morbid Baxter trays ("Tray of Unfortunate Guillotine Accidents" and "Tray of Bloody Stumps").

"Ash Tray"

Another Baxter Artist claims that the skill first came from Bates College and embodied a kind of transcendental movement here on campus. "Our trays were carved with precision implements such as x-acto knives (and) embodied Kierkegaardian philosophies, zen, titles from books by Camus, and so forth," he said.

Some examples of this early school include "Tray of Migrated Ideas," "Tray of Guitarist shines in superb series debut

by Sean Timmons

Friday night in Brooks-Rogers Recital Hall, David Starobin opened this year's expanded Thompson Concert Series with a magnificent performance of music for the guitar. All of the pieces on the evening's program required a great deal of skill and dexterity, but the extra attention that their virtuosic sections required did in no way detract from the sensitivity of Starobin's interpretation of their slower, more melodic lines.

His capacity to effectively mix technique with emotion was most evident in his performance of the five pieces based on Russian folk songs played at the end of the concert. These pieces were not as technically demanding as some of the earlier works on the program, but Starobin made the melodies sing with a clarity and sensitivity that was breath-taking. At the same time, he achieved a delicate balance on his guitar by emphasizing the dramatic parts of the harmony while never letting them overshadow his subtle phrasing of the melody.

Two pieces that also highlighted the evening's performance were Elliott Carter's Changes, 1983, and Chase, 1987, a work by the composer's brother, Michael Starobin. The former used effects peculiar to the guitar, such as artificial harmonics and the tonal variations of the instrument that depend upon where and how it is strummed or plucked. Starobin's performance, however, kept these oddities from sounding like mere special effects and made the work into a stimulating and exciting piece of music.

In Chase, the performer is required to play along with a previously-taped synthesizer background. Despite the strict requirements of having to accommodate an unchanging accompaniment, Starobin played every phrase with great expression and made the work sound like an entirely live performance. Again, where the use of the tape could have

by Travis Pierson

Americans like to know. We prefer films that have answers over music or art that leaves us wondering. Mike Glier's "The Epidemic," the second phase of Wallworks, now on display in the Williams College Museum of Art, though, does not offer answers. Glier's sparse, roughly drawn and unfinished-looking mural leaves much room for the viewer's own interpretations.

The black and white work, occupying the upper two thirds of the museum wall, deals with AIDS. At a recent lecture at Williams, Glier explained his choice of topic as a conscious decision to do something for Williams' otherwise sheltered atmosphere that had an edge to it, as well as to deal with a subject that his work had previously ignored.

Glier, who received his BA from Williams before going on to receive his MFA from Hunter College, has been represented in many notable one man shows as well as group exhibitions, including 1982's important "Disarming Images: Art for Nuclear Disarmament."

Glier's main interests are large scale, temporary wall pieces. He explained that volumetric drawing is a particularly effective device because it hooks the viewer by emphasizing the here and now and by actually sharing the viewer's space, as opposed to a traditional painting which requires the viewer to enter its space. The work's temporary nature implies a connection with human life, for there is an implied death in these paintings.

The use of black and white in the majority of Glier's works has several purposes. "For one thing," he explained, "black and white reproduces very well, and since it is reproduced a lot by the time the work sells, it is in the media, and I'm very conscious of the media. Also, when you use black and white, you're making an abstraction from life. By leaving color out, it becomes apparent that your primary issue is not representation, but you issue becomes communication. Black and white also refers to newspaper, a media from which you are used to getting information."

The "wallwork" currently on

display at the WMCA is much more personal in its approach than some earlier works by Glier, but it still reflects the social awareness that is characteristic of most of his work. "The Epidemic" features a diagonally viewed scene of solitary arms and legs wrapped in white cloth and loosely tied together by grapevines. Four open-mouthed heads appear in the upper corner, and a small, empty room sits above everything else. Although the subject of "The Epidemic" is the very topical issue of AIDS, the painting's imagery deals directly with the abstract ideas of isolation and separation which are graphically realized by the detached arms and legs lining the museum's staircase.

At a recent lecture, Glier commented that the positioning of the arms is also supposed to make the viewer relate the painted limbs to his or her own on the stairwell railing. Glier explained the further significance of the arm as an image for his subject. "The arm is attractive and it's hard on one side but soft and vulnerable on the other," he explained.

The small room drawn above the figures resembles the actual windows and openings which surround it. According to Glier, the very simply-drawn space suggests an isolated room where sex could be taking place or where a sick or dying person is being kept. Also, its distance from the ground below suggests that if one were to try to leave the room he would fall to a certain death.

The four ghostly visages which appear in the upper portion of the mural are depicted in museum and at the Metropolitan Museum of Art. Sterling Clark's wealth and incredible knowledge and love of art led him to spend more than half of his life collecting.

Fallout shelter

In 1912, Sterling Clark bought his first painting, and he continued buying until his death in 1956. Mary Jo Carpenter, director of public relations at the Clark Art Institute, said that he had very definite ideas about what sort of art he wanted. "He was a man who knew his own mind and honed his own ideas, and he rarely listened to the advice of others," she said.

Clark's eclectic taste in art manifested itself when he bought paintings from two competing schools, the Academic and Impressionist, at the same time. After he married Francine, who was from Paris, he began collecting more French paintings.

Eventually, the Clarks decided they needed a place to house their artwork. Under the influence of Karl Weston, then director of the Williams College Museum of Art, they decided to build in Williamstown. Legend has it that one of the reasons they chose Williamstown was because, in the Cold War paranoia of the early 1950's, it was not likely to be attacked in the event of nuclear war.

While the Clarks' choice of a Williamstown museum site far removed from the big cities which would be the first targets of attack may have an element of truth in it, Carpenter said that their desire to be near Weston, the easy access to numerous intellectual resources, and the theory that their art would have more impact in a small town than in a big city already full of art were much more important factors.

Expansion

In 1955, the Clark Art Institute opened. In order to supervise the construction of the galleries and the shipments of their art, the Clarks kept an apartment in the building. Over the next 20 or so years, the Institute expanded twice. The first time was in 1963-1964, when an art conservation lab was built behind the main galleries. Then, in 1973, another building was erected in response to the creation of a graduate program in Art History. This building houses the Institute's library, an auditorium, staff offices, and five galleries for various exhibitions.

There are no Clark heirs involved in the management of the Institute. In fact, the Clarks' initial decision to house their art permanently was because there were no descendants to whom they could leave their collection. "It's too bad," said Carpenter, "because it would be nice to think of a family member still involved." Instead, the management of the Institute's affairs is the responsibility of a Board of Trustees. The Clark collection, said Carpenter, has grown and expanded in ways that Sterling Clark probably did not foresee. Although it is difficult to predict when expansion will again be necessary, the museum will eventually need more room. Carpenter does not foresee any major expansion on the near horizon.

states ranging from a fairly solid head to a vaporous one which seems to dissipate before the viewer's eyes. The racial identity of the most clearly-defined face is unclear, an artistic choice that suggests the cross-cultural effects of AIDS. Their placement in the composition is unobtrusive, as if their pain has somehow been banished to the outskirts, but they remain nonetheless, which suggests that the suffering is quite real.

Glier's reasons for leaving the wallwork in a relatively unfinished state may be clarified by his remarks concerning some earlier works in an interview with Sarah McFadden for Art in America in 1982. "It [rough painting and drawing] has a very tactile sense that is appealing right now — a reaction instructor. In 1963 Ma accepted the job and came to the U.S.

"I started to teach full time with two kids, ages one and two, and my husband was in school. I also started taking one course at a time in linguistics," she said. That "one course at a time" led to an M.A. in applied linguistics and an eventual Ph.D. in Chinese linguistics in 1983. Soon after that, she learned of the opening at Williams.

"I was really impressed with the college and with the people who interviewed me. I like the small size of the college—it's so different from the University of Michigan, where there are 40,000 students."

Her husband remained behind at the University of Michigan. He is still a librarian there, specializing in contemporary Chinese collections. Ma is only able to see him on long weekends and holidays. "The time when I'm here, I just concentrate on work, with no disruption, no household. Then when I go there, I just enjoy." She has managed to spend the last two summers in Michigan, working at the university on research for computer-assisted instruction in Chinese.

American students

Although Ma's life is now based in the U.S., she has visited China at least once a year since 1983. Last summer she was involved in a workshop there for high school Chinese teachers, and she also attends the annual International Conference in Chinese Teaching.

"Education in China is still centrally controlled. Definitely, here you have more opportunities and challenges — you can try new methods." Ma also says that some differences between American and Chinese education are not due to the teacher. "Students in China work very hard, but tend to just listen to what the teacher says. They don't question whether the teacher is right. Here it's more fun; the teacher can grow along with the student."

against the too-slick, modernized, alienating society we're all too familiar with." So, in this way, the sketchiness of the mural creates a drama and shocks our senses in a way which would have been otherwise absent.

A single message from the imagery in "Wallworks" remains elusive. Glier explained that this ambiguity is necessary, reasoning that if an artist creates a picture that can be completely understood too quickly, the work loses a dimension. By using looser and more opaque imagery, he creates a more poetic and eternal statement.

In this way, "The Epidemic" goes beyond the historical and functions as a statement of dislocation and isolation for all humans. At the same time, it is not without the seed of hope—the strength of the limbs and the grace of the Roman drapery suggest the presence of an ultimate humanistic triumph.

Unquestionably a fine team effort, the casual observer was at moments wont to call the B-side triumph a one man show. Steve Felix '90 scampered to an unassisted try, pressed two field goals through the uprights, and converted two kicks for a total of 13 of the team's 17 points. Junior flanker Bob Goldstein added the final try after a keen pass from classmate Julius Yang. Again, however, it was Felix who set the stage, kicking the ball to Yang who laced through two opponents before dealing the ball to a lumbering scrummmie.

Meanwhile, 40 minutes to the west, in bucolic Hanover, the men's lower sides reaped mixed results from perennial rugby super-power Dartmouth. The C-side forfeited two first half tries before yielding to the D-side for second half relief. The D's played supple defense allowing only one Dartmouth score.

On a still brighter note, the Eph E- and F-sides combined for a 3-0 victory over Dartmouth's fifth team, with the margin of victory provided by a first half field goal off the foot of fullback Phil Jack '90. The E-F tandem smothered the Dartmouth attack, repeatedly frustrating the "Big Green's" offensive efforts.

The White Dogs next try for the jocular as they host Little Three and inter-conference rival Wesleyan, Saturday on Cole Field.

commented, "Our quick goal (Schaen's direct kick in the 1st 25 minutes) and thorough defense seem to have let them down." The sophomore half-back line of Lynne Brenner, Kelly Collins, and Susie Piper effectively outstretched Smith's defense for the whole game.

Earlier in the week, against Skidmore, Christine Boddicker '88 and Piper scored second half goals to propel the Ephwom to a 2-1 victory. Boddicker's goal was a beautiful shot fired from 18 yards away and Piper's was an easy conversion off a ball assisted by Boddicker.

The team is scheduled to play at Middlebury today, and travels to Wesleyan on Saturday. Both teams are good, but Madden expressed confidence saying that the prescription for success will be to "work further on the things we did well this week."

sell items like sweaters, posters and jewelry. Any student or group that sponsors a business receives a 10% commission on that business's sales. Since businesses cannot sell their merchandise on campus without student sponsorship, they will often call the head of the Student Activities Council (SAC) and ask the SAC to sponsor them.

SAC Chairman Matt LaPointe '88 said that he has even called businesses and invited them to sell their wares on campus. Any student can sponsor an outside business with the approval of the Dean's Office. Student sponsors must reserve the space in Baxter by making arrangements with the Head of Food Service, Jim Hodgkins.

The key to success

Some of the best selling items on campus are classic anti-Amherst paraphernalia. T-shirt slogans like "Amherst Lite — 1/3 the education of a regular college" and "US News and World Report - 1) Williams, 2) Swarthmore — Where's Amherst?" are consistently great money makers.

Wherever there's an inventive idea, there's money to be made. If you've got an idea for a product or even a new T-shirt slogan — try it out. After all, Amherst can never be degraded too much — or too often.

Trays

False Perceptions" and "Tray of Ineffable Consequences." He stridently downplayed the work of copycat scribblers, saying they used "sloppy instruments like forks" and etched "obscenities and cliches such as Ash Tray." This particular artist is presently disillusioned with the tray movement. "I don't eat at Baxter often now," he says, "I don't like to pick up a monstrosity like "Tray of Incest."

"Tray of Nocturnal Emission"

It is difficult to ignore the significance of the platter off of which food is eaten, and it is disheartening to arrive at the breakfast table and see the "Tray of Bad Karma" or the ubiquitous and ominous "Tray of Death."

Some trays, such as the "Tray of Summer" or the "Tray of Flowers", can brighten up the day. Others, such as the "Tray of Nocturnal Emission" or the "Tray of Langorous, Coagulating Sex on the Floor of the Breakfast Nook on a Warm Sunday Afternoon after Church (Tray of Narrative)" can evoke a lascivious smile. One of the original Baxter Artists likens the trays to fortune cookies: "If you get the Tray of Death you know you're in trouble."

Another artist, based in Greylock, described his own travails with a different sort of tray art: last year he embarked on a mission of vanity — to inscribe his initials into every tray in Greylock. By the end of last year he estimated that he had etched three quarters of the Greylock Trays and was expecting to finish this year. Food service pulled the plug on his artistic endeavor, however. Over the summer they replaced all of their trays.

According to one source etching was in full swing during the off-season as well. "A small, embattled group of Williams students conducted guerilla warfare in the dining hall against various clueless tennis campers, nicotine-laden theatre apprentices and half-blind elderhostel types. Thus were born etchings of the "Tray of tennis camper dismemberment" school." It is, in fact, believed that the majority of the etchings were done by this summer crew during their stay on campus.

Whatever the actual origin of the art of tray carving, it is obvious that the practice has the potential to become a part of the much touted "Williams experience." As long as etchers stay away from poor puns ("Tray of 1990" or "Tray of Sage A") and stick to rudimentary grotesqueries ("Tray of Easy Decapitation") and highbrow thoughts ("Tray of Cosmic Irony") the art in Baxter will continue to transcend graffiti and vandalism and will enlighten and entertain diners.

that had not met at all. In addition, she said that some of the students who were on the student-faculty committees were not attending meetings.

Melcher said that regular meetings between the liaisons and CC officers will help the council make sure that the committees are meeting and that students are attending the meetings.

Because liaisons will be appointed from within the student-faculty committees, Melcher said, the liaisons will be students who are respected by the other members of those committees.

College Council is also taking measures to increase the accountability of the Freshman Council (FC) to the college council, according to Secretary Trace Blankenship '89. He said that the freshman council liaison to the CC will be making a report on a weekly or a biweekly basis.

Blankenship said the CC would like to use the Freshman Council in a committee capacity, and the regular reports of the FC representative will facilitate this. He added that CC will be trying to use FC to work on various projects that relate to the freshman class.

One area for potential cooperation is the Junior Adviser evaluation questionnaire, according to Blankenship. He said the FC might provide input for questions and might help with the questionnaire's distribution.

"We want freshmen to use the Freshman Council as a service-oriented leadership body within their class," he said.

"It was such a bizarre day," said Kennedy. "Everything we did seemed to go wrong." The quarterback's words were all too accurate. When Kennedy threw a good pass, it was all too frequently dropped. And if his aim strayed, the ball was intercepted rather than incomplete. Each Williams drive seemed to self-destruct, either because of a turnover or a mental mistake.

Yet the loss was definitely not the fault of any one player, an opinion offered by Sophomore center Brian Stevens. "We lost as a team. We will win as a team. No one is to blame but all of us."

Williams shines

Despite the loss there were several bright spots for the Ephs. The entire defense played very well, especially sophomore defensive back Rich Williams who had two interceptions and a fumble recovery to go along with his four tackles. With defensive back David Willey out due to injury, Williams could see more time in the coming weeks.

Middlebury scored once more to make the final margin of victory ten points. But the final score was not indicative of the contest. Only the turnover statistics were. As Williams heads into this week's contest at Hamilton, it almost definitely will not duplicate the debacle of Saturday's game. Yet to win, it must beat a much better team than the Panthers. Clawson seems to think they can.

"We dominated them in the Goldstein said she hopes IPECS will encourage faculty members in all departments to look at the subjects they teach more broadly and from a cross-disciplinary point of view.

Goldstein said the program will also seek to find ways to encourage students to be more active in the classroom.

first half," he said, "We should have been ahead two, maybe three touchdowns. But we had a few bad breaks. I, and I think the rest of the guys choose to look at it as a fluke. We'll bounce back; and as tough as Hamilton is, we can beat them. Last year Tufts lost to Wesleyan in week one and finished 7-1 on the year. We can do that. But we've got to get a win first."

Male ruggers antagonize Anselm's in 28-0 laughter

by Andy Harris

Surviving a playing field from a landscape architect's nightmare and the combined forces of local and state traffic enforcement authorities, the Williams Rugby Football Club's crusade to St. Anselm's College yielded nothing short of divine results. The A- and B-teams cavorted through a brilliant New England fall day, romping easily to victory.

The playing pitch was a design masterpiece, replete with a telephone pole sunk clearly within the boundaries of play, a gravel path meandering through one end zone, and an out of bounds line running continuous to a rambling tree-line.

Propelled by dominating ball-control scrum play and paced by three first half scores, the A-side overwhelmed hapless St. Anselm's 28-0. Junior Chas Benedict, straying smartly from his hooker position, scored what was to prove to be the winning try on a 20 meter scurry. A Johnny Hollenberg '88 conversion left the score at 6-0, and Williams never looked back as scores from Brad Roegge '88, Austin Kelly '88, Andy Harris '88, and Bryan Balrd '89 completed the victory.

Arrowsmith finishes 27th at Mt. Hope

by David Nadelman

Saturday, September 26 was a perfect day: blue skies, a slight breeze, and cool temperatures; a perfect day for running that is. Accordingly, twelve varsity cross country teams from the New England area converged upon Mount Hope Farm for the second annual Williams Invitational.

The course at Mount Hope was developed two years ago by Coach Peter Farwell and Julius Tonnelli '86. Despite that short existence, it is now known as one of the most challenging in New England. It provides runners with every type of terrain possible, including an uphill start and a downhill, road-race finish.

In the final team scoring, Westfield State, Bates and Hamilton were the top three, with Williams finishing eighth. Due to the fact that a number of the teams did not bring their top runners, "It is difficult to tell exactly what these results mean in our overall standings," said Gil McCabe '89 who placed second for Williams and 26th overall.

with a time of 28:12

First for the Williams team was co-captain Ted Arrowsmith

'88 who ended up 23rd overall with a time of 27:55. Arrowsmith ran a strong race, and hopes to have a memorable senior season, having missed large parts of the past two due to injury. Dale Johnson '90 also ran valiantly, going out hard and finishing as Williams' third man in 28:37. Dave Sprague '88 had an excellent race, considering it was his first of the season, as he came in with a time of 28:52.

The other finishers for Williams were Dwayne Davies '90, John Tuxill '90, and Brian Fields '89, all of whom according to Farwell show much potential for the later, more important meets of the season. Due to injuries and a special rotational system, some key members of the varsity were not present. Said Farwell, "We're looking toward the end of the season, at meets like NESAC and Little Three. Consequently we won't have our top seven running together till then." The coach also added that he thought the results showed promise for the team later on in the season. "Today's race demonstrated that the team is in shape and that they just need a little more racing sharpness to put it all together."

The team will next take to the trails on Saturday at the Amherst Invitational against many of the same teams it competed against this past weekend.

The next concert in the Thompson Concert Series is Fritz Magg's cello recital which will be held on October 6 in Brooks-Rogers Recital Hall.

Aided by optimal weather conditions, the women's cross-country team placed a strong second out of fifteen teams at the Williams Invitational, held Saturday at Mount Hope Farm. The top three scorers were Springfield (a Division II team) with 24 points, Williams with 71, and Smith with 84.

The Ephwomens' performance was most impressive in its close group finish; the top five Williams runners were all in the top twenty overall slots. First on the Williams team and tenth overall out of over 130 runners was freshman marvel Anne Platt with a time of 19:54.5, followed closely by captain Sarah Pierce '88 with a time of 19:55. Ann Dannhauer '90, Ingrid Wessel '90, Jennie Garrett '89, Sarah Hams '89, and Cathy Cocks '89 completed the top Williams seven.

Cocks remarked that, "we beat Amherst, and Wesleyan has lost four of its top woman runners. Our prospects for the Little Three race look good." She also noted that Williams beat much of its future NESAC competition on Saturday, including Smith, "a traditionally strong team," according to Cocks.

The woman's team emerges from its top performance to face many of the same teams this Saturday at the Amherst Invitational.

W. Rugby

The WWRFC went to Burlington this weekend to play the green mountain girls of the University of Vermont — and green indeed they were, being a newly formed team. Despite the early morning hour and arctic conditions, the A-side played a strong game, capitalizing on Vermont's penalties and dominating the scrum downs.

In the first half, quick-thinking scrum half Kerry Kilander '89 took advantage of a key penalty call near the try line and carried the ball in to score before the UVM women had time to set up a defense. Windy conditions hindered fullback Lauren Boechenstein's '89 conversion kick attempt, but the A-side went into the second half with confidence in their superior scrum strength and the trusty foot of hooker Carolyn O'Brien '88.

The line came alive in the second half, led by senior line captain Annie Cordova. Finding herself inches from the try line and in a penalty advantage position, Kilander sacrificed her body once again, throwing herself into the midst of the UVM women to score. Williams hung tough for the remainder of the game, aided by the bone-crunching tackles of Amy Asadourian '88 and the impressive passes of Raquel Holmes '90. The final score was 8-0.

The B-side, coming off an outstanding week of practice, won their game 4-0. Bally Sue Pitcher '90 sacked the full back and anyone else who was unfortunate enough to come in her path. And wing-forward Ingrid Dankmeyer '89 executed her own version of the famous "Snausage" play and broke off of a five-yard scrum to run the ball in, scoring the only try of the game.

The women will next play Yale at home this Saturday at 11:00.

—Cecilia Malm

Tennis

The women's tennis team, now 1-3 on the year, dropped two matches this week to Skidmore and Smith. Sophomore number one seed Amy Davidson's leg injury factored into the losses, as did the team's inability to win a doubles match in either contest.

Against Skidmore a week ago, Davidson won at singles, as did Mary Montgomery '88 at number three and Missy Crouchley '89 at number four. With the score tied at 3-3 after the singles competition, the Ephs had a chance to beat the strong Skidmore squad but dropped all three doubles matches and fell 6-3.

Against Smith on Saturday, Davidson was injured, and as a result, each player was moved up one spot in the lineup. The result of this shuffling was a 7-2 Smith victory.

The two victories for the Ephs came at the number four (Katherine Stearns '91) and number six (Lisa Brayton '91) singles position respectively. Stearns took a three set match after losing the first set, and Brayton used a consistent baseline game in her match to win in two sets.

Today the netters played Mount Holyoke and will travel to Wesleyan on Saturday.

—Jim McDermott

W. Volleyball

The women's volleyball team came off two disappointing losses last Tuesday to Smith and Amherst to score an important sweep of Saturday's tri-match between Williams, Skidmore, and Hamilton. The Skidmore match proved to be an easy one as the Ephwomens breezed to 15-3 and 15-1 wins.

Hamilton was next for the Ephs, and the Continentals proved to be a much tougher match. Earlier in the year, Hamilton had downed the Ephs but a repeat performance was not to be. Buoyed by the powerful serving of Shelley Welpton '90 and Kathy McConnell '90 the team won the opening game 15-4. The Continentals then rallied however, to win the second game 15-10 setting up a pivotal third game rubber match.

According to tri-captain Maureen Brand '88, "The third and final game was really tough. We had to come from behind at 7-12." At this juncture, McConnell and Laurie Hartsoe '91 who had five and three kills respectively, stopped the Continentals cold. The Ephs ran off eight consecutive points and won 15-12.

The victory upped the team's record to 5-3 as it prepares to meet Harvard in a home match tonight at 7:00.

From the Locker Room

by Al Mottur and Marc McDermott

Football strike? Owner collusion? Cocaine addictions? Steinfelds? Corked bats and scuffed balls? Sports today are riddled with ridiculous and embarrassing scandals that, through their enormous media coverage, are polluting the minds of today's average athlete and fan.

It seems that all too often the attention given to athletics today is not directed towards the action between the white lines but towards the use of other white lines. Athletes are overpaid, overzealous, and remain unbearably greedy. You might say "We've heard this all before." Well maybe you have. But the recent NFL strike has pushed us past our limits of tolerance.

These players are making close to three times what they made in 1982, yet they find reason to complain. The major contention of the players union is that of free agency. And although that right was once theirs, they themselves traded it away in a legally binding contract with the owners in exchange for certain contingency fees and assorted concessions.

The other player requests — such as pension and player protection changes — are all legitimate but secondary to the free agency issue. Until they accept the consequences of their earlier contractual misdealings, the owners needn't bother with this group of contentious renegades.

Moreover, the union is no where near united. Several key players such as the Jets' Mark Gastineau and the Cowboys' Randy White have vowed to cross the lines. How long it will be until others follow? Fights have already broken out between scab players and NFLers and we shudder to think of the treatment the Gastineaus and Whites will receive from fellow players once the real games resume.

Unlike baseball, where the nature of the game allows for freer movement of players, free agency can threaten the very foundations of professional football today. NBA players recently demanded abolishment of the draft and a complete open market. This is but an extension of what Upshaw and his cohorts are bargaining for. Owners, in all sports have got to regain control of their players and teams.

In hockey, the owners have concrete control over the league. Perhaps this is only because national television networks haven't captured this sport and subjected it to inhuman commercial pressure. Regardless, the NHL system works. Owners in the NFL need to take a cue from their hockey counterparts. Let the players strike all they want. Shove scab players in their faces if necessary. But don't give in. If Upshaw gets his way, it will be just another step in the overall deterioration process of sports from the pride of the team to the pocket book of the player.

Middlebury blanked 3-0, soccer slides

by Ted Ruger

Rarely in the course of an athletic season does a vitally important game come this early in the year. Last Saturday's men's soccer contest against arch-rival Middlebury, however, was a huge test for the Ephs as they sought to remain undefeated and increase their growing regional and national acclaim against the defending ECAC champion Panthers.

To the delight of hundreds of fans at Cole Field, the home squad dominated play and drubbed Middlebury by a convincing 3-0 margin. The victory was the third in three games for the Ephs, who remain undefeated upon this season. With the win, the squad figures to improve upon pre-game rankings of fourth in New England and nineteenth in the national Division III polls.

After a few minutes at the start of the match when, according to coach Michael Russo, "Middlebury took the play to us," the Ephs asserted themselves offensively. Within a span of just twelve minutes, they virtually put the game away with three quick goals.

Masters connects

Junior All-American Mike Masters started the scoring at 17:21 of the first half when he beat the Middlebury goalkeeper to a pass off a fine run down the wing by Johnny Walker '90 and directed it into the goal. Just three minutes later, Doug Sophomore sweeper Dan Calichman fights for the ball in the men's soccer team's pivotal contest with Middlebury. Calichman won this battle as did his teammates, 3-0 over the Panthers.

(Scala)

Brooks '90 added another tally. Teammate and classmate Dan Calichman '90 chipped a free kick into the Middlebury goalmouth, and when the Panther keeper failed to handle it cleanly, Brooks was there to hammer it into the back of the net.

The sophomore says his experience playing with Calichman was a key factor in the goal. "Whenever Danny takes a free kick, I know exactly where the ball will be," he said. "If you pressure that area there's always a chance the keeper might drop it."

After the Brooks goal, freshman Rob Lake helped seal the victory when he headed a cross by Masters into the Middlebury goal midway through the first half to give the squad its final 3-0 margin of victory. The Eph defense, in conjunction with keeper Rob Blanck '89, kept the visitors from scoring the rest of the way.

Mo Flaherty '90 skirts the Skidmore defense in her teams' victory one week ago. Senior captain Lisa Tenerowicz looks on intently.

Tenerowicz tallies two, field hockey rolls to 3-0

by Marc McDermott

With a swarming offense and an airtight defense, the Field Hockey team steamrolled last week's opponents from Smith and Skidmore 5-0 and 3-0 respectively, raising its season record to a perfect 3-0.

Senior co-captain Lisa Tenerowicz scored the game-winner against Smith with alert and opportunistic play. With Tenerowicz coming in hard towards the goal, the Smith netminder missed the clear. The Williams captain capitalized immediately, swooping in behind to tip the ball in for a 1-0 lead.

The Ephwomen were to rip the nets four more unanswered times as sophomores Kristin Fredrickson and Judy Fleishman both scored before Tenerowicz again dented the net on a penalty corner. Kirsten Nuese '89 finished off the scoring with her third goal of the season.

Defense dominates

The offensive outbreak did not overshadow excellent defensive play, however. Shining for the Ephs was Amy Honingfeld '91 whose outstanding def-

Ten turnovers pave way for 17-7 Panther victory

by Al Mottur

Last year Williams was the best team in New England Division III football at minimizing its turnovers while maximizing those of its opponents'. This past Saturday, it was most definitely the worst. Giving the ball away ten times, the Ephs displayed uncharacteristic sloppiness in a disappointing and stunning 17-7 loss to Middlebury.

The team beat the Panthers in many important aspects of the game: rushing yardage, first downs, and time of possession. And to observers, it was readily apparent that Williams' offensive and defensive lines got the better of their Middlebury counterparts. Nonetheless, for the first time since 1982 and for only the fourteenth time since 1906, Middlebury defeated the Ephs.

When the Panthers turned the ball over on their own 31 after an unsuccessful fake punt on their first possession, the Ephs marched towards the end zone behind the electrifying running of tailback Mo Holden '90 (114 yards on 23 carries). And, even though junior QB Scott Kennedy fumbled the ball on the four yard line, it seemed as if Williams was set to dominate Middlebury.

Ephs take lead

Following a successful defensive stand and an eighteen yard Dave Clawson '89 punt return, the Ephs were once again threatening, this time at the Middlebury 27. Nine plays later, sophomore Neal Chesley burst into the end zone for what would prove to be the only Eph score of the day.

After the Chesley plunge, things started to slowly erode for the Ephs. Despite the fact that the score stood at 7-3 at the half, the feeling of confidence that presaged the game, had all but vanished.

The key play of the contest came early in the third quarter. It was a play that Williams had scouted in pregame strategy sessions, and a play that many players claim they anticipated in the huddle just before it happened. It also was the play that broke the Ephs back. On third and three from the Panther 43, Middlebury running back Jim Hackett took the ball from quarterback Tim Ostebo. Hackett, who quarterbacked the squad last season, then threw a spiral over a confused Eph secondary to a wide open Chris Wood for the game-winning touchdown.

'Bizzare Day'

Trailing by three, the Ephmen responded with a convincing 64 yard drive that ended one yard too short. Behind Holden's 25 yards rushing and a key 19 yard Kennedy strike to senior tight-end Lewis Collins, Williams was poised to score, the ball resting on the Panther ten. On the next play, the junior quarterback rolled out to his right and gained nine yards, but in his attempt to extend the ball into the end zone he had it jarred loose and Middlebury regained possession.

Record improves to 3-2

Women's soccer beats Skidmore and Smith

by James Lee

In a triumphant display of teamwork and determination, the women's soccer team registered two impressive victories against Skidmore and Smith raising its record to 3-2 on the year. The victories were the team's best efforts of the season and were impressive in view of the fact that the defeated opponents are two of the best teams Williams will play all year.

A team the Ephwomen had not beaten the past two years, Smith was nationally ranked and unbeaten previous to its 1-0 loss to Williams. Lori Schaen '89 who scored the game winner against Smith, attributed the victories to the excellent teamwork that began to surface last week after the two defeats of the previous week. "Last week, the individual play was too pronounced," Assistant coach Sarah Madden agreed. "These two games are the first evidence that we are coming together as a team."

With teamwork came concentration according to Schaen who said that, "We thoroughly outplayed them both. Our concentration on passing and shooting after last week's two defeats paid off."

Defense also played a large role in the upset of Smith. "They came out expecting to win, but throughout the game we tracked and stuck them with our assigned players. We completely shut down their offense," said Schaen. Consequently, Smith let up as the game progressed. Madden

Senior Kim Hatch fights with her Skidmore opponent for possession of the ball in her teams' 2-1 triumph.

A New Dorm?

Town and gown look at off-campus housing

by Stephanie Jones

The college is considering building a new dormitory within the next couple of years in order to relieve overcrowding, college officials said last week.

The announcement comes at a time when Williamstown is reassessing its zoning laws and an increasing number of residents are voicing complaints about students renting houses off-campus.

The Williamstown Planning Board set up a committee at its meeting last week to look into the town's residential zoning laws and possibly to recommend a change.

Town Planner Barbara Bashevkin said the committee will research the present zoning laws in Williamstown and other college towns to see if the Williamstown laws are sufficient.

J. O'Brien Locke, a selectman and the chairman of the Town-Gown Committee, said that it was possible that the town would try to eliminate off-campus college housing.

Locke said that the problem with off-campus housing seemed to be spreading, as evidenced by the complaints two weeks ago about students renting a house on Thomas Street. "There's more concern than in the past; it's no longer just Hoxsey Street," he said.

Locke said he had spoken to representatives of the college about the problems and thought that they could be solved through communication. "I think we can all put in more of an effort. Students have a right not to be harassed, and other people in the neighborhood have a right not to be harassed."

College Treasurer William Reed said that the college has no specific plans to eliminate off-campus housing, although it has been looking into it. He said that the college is also looking into the possibility of building a new dormitory.

Winthrop Wassenar, the director of the physical plant, said that although no definite plans have been made yet, such as architecture or location, a new dormitory will probably be built in the next couple of years. He said the main reason for the new dormitory was overcrowding.

Wassenar pointed out that some living rooms in Mission Park are being used as student rooms, some rooms intended to be used as singles are being used as doubles, and some basement rooms are being used. Wassenar said a new dormitory would also allow the college to make renovations on student housing which would take longer than a summer to complete.

Did these Mills house residents violate the open container law at a tailgate during the football game against Middlebury? Chief of Police Joseph Zoito says yes; college officials say no. (Ward)

Zoito disagrees with college on tailgates

by Paul Kwon

Despite crowding and the threat of arrest, students and alumni participated in traditional tailgates at the September 26 home football opener against Middlebury College at Weston Field.

In a letter to the Williams community distributed prior to the game, Athletic Director Robert Peck said that although alcohol would be permitted in the tailgate area, kegs of beer would not. The letter made no mention of Williamstown's open container law.

The open container ordinance prohibits the drinking or possession of an open or partially consumed container of alcohol "while on, in or upon any public way, or public place to which the public has a right of access." Conviction is punishable by a fine of $10 to $50.

The college consulted its lawyers this year in reference to the tailgate policy, according to Peck and Associate Dean of the College Mary Kenyatta.

Kenyatta said that the tailgate area is college property and is exempt from the ordinance. "It's not a public way like a street," she said. "It is a public place in that people are invited in. Alcohol has been permitted by the college at tailgates for many years."

Williamstown Chief of Police Joseph Zoito said, "A public way is a place where the public has a right of access or is invited in." He then asked rhetorically, "Now, can I buy a ticket to the game?"

"So long as students and adults do not take their containers out into Latham Street, then it's okay," Kenyatta said. "Technically, he (Zoito) could define the field as a public place. In some ways it is a public place in that people can pay and get in. But it is college property."

Zoito said, "No matter what the college says, it doesn't make it legal."

Under the law, the Williamstown Police have the right to arrest students without a warrant for possessing an open container of alcohol. But, according to Zoito, nine out of 10 times, subpoenas are issued.

Zoito said he was concerned about other offenses that may be related to tailgates, including drinking by minors, providing alcohol to minors and selling alcohol without a permit.

Zoito, who last year said that he would send plainclothesmen down to the tailgate area, was more ambiguous about his plans this year. Asked if he would send policemen, he said, "It would be foolish to let you know, wouldn't it? We like to keep a few surprise parties ready."

If he were to send policemen to the tailgates, Zoito said that

Early snowfall causes damage

A strong snowstorm caught the college by surprise Sunday, dumping as much as 14 inches of snow in parts of Berkshire County. Much of Williamstown, including large parts of the college, lost electricity, and the campus was strewn with fallen trees. Parts of Routes 2 and 7, among other roads, were closed, delaying four members of the reaccreditation team which is on campus this week. Williamstown public schools and North Adams State College cancelled their classes Monday, but the college did not. It was the earliest and heaviest October snowfall of this century, according to the Berkshire Eagle. Three deaths have been attributed to the storm, the Eagle reported Monday.

College Council passes budget in 35 minutes

by James Lee

The College Council approved the budget proposal submitted by the finance committee to allocate the Student Activities Tax to student organizations in 35 minutes last Thursday.

Also considered at the meeting were a tentative proposal to establish a quiet 24-hour study area on campus and plans to create a sub-committee to examine the problem of Division III departments that do not offer serious introductory courses for non-majors.

Treasurer Mark Ralsbeck '88, who chairs the finance committee, reported to the council about the 1987-88 budget. The money for the budget comes from the $82 dollar Student Activities Tax paid by each student.

Ralsbeck said that the finance committee's policy was to base its allocation on the facts and figures found during its appraisal of the needs and the financial conditions of each organization. "If last year's budget was well-spent, a similar budget would be approved," he said.

Ralsbeck said that the council incurred a surplus of approximately $25,000 from last year, and he announced that the sum is still open for new requests. Council President Carter Zinn '88 suggested that the council use part of the money to invite prominent guest speakers to campus.

Turning to other matters, the council discussed a proposal from the newly-established Idea box to create a 24-hour quiet study place on campus. Zinn said the entire student body is encouraged to use the box to raise issues that are of concern to the community.

Lighting: where is it?

Last January, the college community was shocked by reports of the rape of a freshman woman. That rape and the media attention that it received brought home to this campus one of the harsh realities of modern American society. The ivory tower that students had for so long taken for granted was swiftly and abruptly revealed to be an illusion.

Shock, however, quickly led to action. The administration initiated a series of institutional responses that sought to address the major issues raised by the rape. That these responses came only following a high-profile attack is unfortunate; the college should not need to be prodded by tragedy to address problems it might well have foreseen.

One of the most basic and important initiatives was a comprehensive re-evaluation of the campus lighting situation. The current system is ineffective and, in many cases, not properly maintained. What we live with now is a haphazard assortment of lighting fixtures that light a few areas well and many not at all.

The administration has acknowledged these serious flaws in lighting and a major overhaul is underway. Administrators reaffirmed their commitment to improve lighting at class meetings this fall, and a set of sample light fixtures are being tested to determine which might best solve the practical and aesthetic problems involved.

Criticism, then, should be directed at the sluggish pace of institutional response. The alleged rape — and the resulting effort to improve lighting — is now almost ten months old. For whatever reason, significant improvement in lighting has not been achieved in that time. The Dean's Office, which listened to students complaints, and the Buildings and Grounds department, which in the end must act on them — plus any other administrative offices involved in the process — cannot escape the blame for this delay.

Clearly the college is trying, but trying is not enough. If the administration were being graded on its lighting program, it might rate an A for effort, but it couldn't swing better than a C- with lateness penalties.

Knechtle talk on Christianity, faith ought to help our spiritual learning

To the Editor:

Today will be the second day that Cliffe Knechtle, the open-air Christian speaker, will have spoken in Chapin Circle. Knechtle is here by invitation of the Williams Christian Fellowship and his visit will have stirred up, no doubt, some amount of controversy. A few comments on the matter seem appropriate on the subject here.

In the first place, let us be clear about what it is that Cliffe is saying. He is saying to us, the members of the community, "Take a look at the person of Jesus Christ, consider his claims and ask yourself what your response is." He is saying and his hosts are saying, "Let us place Jesus Christ in the public arena of our marketplace of ideas and let us talk with each other."

Secondly, let us be clear about why Cliffe is saying this. He is obviously a man of deep convictions and some passion. He and his hosts are saying this because their belief in Jesus Christ is vitally important to them.

Let me suggest, very strongly, that so long as what is being said is said with sensitivity and respect, such dialogue — and it is dialogue that we desire — is a good thing. There are few more appropriate places for this kind of dialogue over who we are and why we are than in the middle of a liberal arts college!

Let us be frank. There is much disagreement, vehement disagreement, about Jesus, God, and you and me. Let us also consider this: tolerance and indifference apathy are two different things — but, unhappily, only subtly so. Courageous tolerance will not avoid a conflict but will engage in it with vigor because it is motivated by concern and respect.

In the days and weeks to come let us not hesitate to address conflict and collision — with sensitivity to be sure, but let us address it. Soren Kierkegaard said in his journal, "It harms Christianity in a high degree and alters its very nature that it is brought into an artistic remoteness from reality, instead of being heard in the midst of real life...."

Attacks on efforts, not attention to principle, guide GOP critique of AI

To the Editor:

Campus debate has been hindered in recent years by the fact that there has been no serious conservative voice. If conservatives, however, are not only opposed to doing anything new, but also are opposed to saying anything new, then they would be better off not wasting their own valuable time and the Record's valuable space.

I refer specifically to last week's Op-Ed piece by Republican Club President Michael Barbera '89. Barbera criticized the left in general, and the leadership of the Williams chapter of Amnesty International in particular, for what he considers their double-standard with respect to international human rights abuses. The most striking feature of this letter is that it mimics the arguments made last year in both a Record Op-Ed by David Rakonitz '88 and an answering letter by Christopher Nealon '89 (April 28, May 5 Records.)

Nealon then pointed out that the type of debate which is encouraged by Barbera's style of argumentation is morally careless and self-indulgent. The "your country is worse than my country" approach does a disservice to those people who are suffering at the hands of repressive governments (rightist and leftist) throughout the world. Conservatives shift the focus of the debate away from human rights. They are more interested in criticizing the motives of compassionate individuals than in ending human rights abuses.

Barbera apparently lacks basic information about the activities of the

Williams chapter of Amnesty International. The Williams chapter is not responsible for determining which countries will be addressed at its Baxter tables. Amnesty International sends the leaders of the Williams chapter information about one nation every two weeks, and the table is set up for the purpose of addressing the abuses in that country, regardless of its form of government. Nealon pointed out that anyone who was not familiar with this system could attend a meeting of Amnesty. Barbera, apparently, would rather publicly attack the leaders of the Williams chapter of Amnesty than follow Nealon's sound advice.

While I believe that most leftists in this country are appalled at human rights abuses throughout the world, there are some reasons why we choose to focus our attention on some rather than others. The first reason is that we can count on the United States government to use its enormous resources to publicize human rights abuses in some countries. I submit that virtually every American knows that the Soviet Union violates human rights. But most Americans do not even know who Augusto Pinochet is, much less his record on human rights.

Furthermore, the United States government and other conservatives have a particular motivation to downplay certain violations of human rights. It is downright embarrassing for the Reagan Administration to admit that nations and groups which it supports are composed of individuals who are murderers and rapists.

I support fully Barbera's right to criticize the Soviet Union and other nations for their disregard of the basic human rights of their citizens. I feel my time is better spent publicizing and fighting the human rights violations which the government of this nation intentionally hides.

Andrew Seligsohn '89

Al co-presidents rebut charge that group weighs ideology in protests

To the Editor:

As co-presidents of Amnesty International, we were astounded by Michael Barbera's lack of information in his article on human rights protests on campus. He asks, "Why is there such selective interest in the preservation of human rights?" We would like to assure him that on the part of Amnesty International, there most certainly is not (such selective interest). Our Winter Study Film Series was meant to inform the Williams community of human rights abuses in Greece, Iran, Poland, and Cuba as well as South Africa. Over the spring we focused on the death penalty in the United States. In fact, we still have a very prominent display in Baxter.

As a campus group of Amnesty International, we must subscribe to all of the ideals of the larger group. We are non-partisan; our sympathies lie with neither the left nor the right. Our letter-writing tables in Baxter have not concentrated on any particular country. We are not given the responsibility of deciding the subjects of the complaints; they are chosen by the national network.

Barbera's article shows a great deal of interest in human rights. If so, he is welcome to join Amnesty International and help us to continue to work against human rights abuses everywhere.

Soviet emigre couple speaks on getting out

by Scott O'Callaghan

"General Secretary Brezhnev once told his Prime Minister Kosygin, 'Alexei, what do you think if we permit Jews to leave the country?' I think only we two will be left," Kosygin replied, 'Oh no! Only you!'" Thus Leonard Ozernoy described the current state of Jewish emigration from the Soviet Union.

Ozernoy, an astrophysicist with Harvard University and the Harvard-Smithsonian Center for Astrophysics, and his wife Maryann, a poet associated with the Wabach Museum of Art, spoke last Wednesday on the topic "Jewish Emigration from the Soviet Union and How We Got Out."

According to the Ozernoy's, their case was typical of Jewish emigrants from the Soviet Union. They applied to emigrate in 1979, "but were refused for inexperience from the state point of view, a typical Soviet excuse."

They wrote letters and met with officials to no avail. Last year, the Ozernoy's applied for a peaceful protest with three other families just before the 27th Communist Party Meeting. The prosecutor denied them permission and cited the Soviet Constitution as only granting the right to protest to organizations. Yet, the Ozernoy's discovered that the Constitution extends "the right to demonstrate to citizens and their organizations."

Since their letter was never addressed, three of the four Soviet families called a press conference on the eve of the 27th Party Meeting. At the press conference they proclaimed, "We are unable to defend our civil rights." Ozernoy said, "Afraid to have a great noise before the 27th Party Meeting, they allowed two of the four families to leave." Now, according to Ms. Ozernoy, "Our aim is to help numerous friends still there."

Speaking on glasnost, the new feeling of openness heralded in Soviet press, Ozernoy said, "It allows higher officials permission to discuss, but not for all and not for everyone...It is like George Orwell said, 'All animals are equal, but some are more equal than others.'"

Speaking on US-Soviet relations, he said, "The next summit between General Secretary Gorbachev and President Reagan could improve the situation to the best."

In response to a question following the lecture, Ozernoy spoke of what concerned Americans can do to help refuseniks, Soviets who have been refused exit visas, "Intervention, from Americans especially, for refuseniks not only gives moral support, but is sometimes extremely effective."

Ms. Ozernoy said that letters from Americans gave her strength to resist: "It's hope, letters from unknown people."

The Ozernoy's suggested that people write to government officials both in the Soviet Union and here in America, and to write to the refuseniks themselves, to support them officially as well as personally.

In conclusion Ozernoy said, "I don't think they're ready to open the Iron Curtain at all."

ACSR to continue disinvestment advocacy

by Todd Owens

The Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibility (ACSR) began its tenth year with a meeting last Thursday. The committee will be chaired this year by Donald R. Dubendorf '75, a local attorney.

At its meeting, the committee voted against a proxy against Proctor and Gamble on the use of laboratory animals in testing.

During the 1986-87 school year, the committee's time was spent largely on discussing and recommending ways to implement the disinvestment advocacy policy, which was adopted by the college in September 1986. In practice, the policy means encouraging companies in which Williams holds stock to withdraw from South Africa. In the past two years, a total of 135 companies have withdrawn from South Africa. According to Dubendorf, "South Africa has not been seen as the place to stay."

$14.9 million in South Africa
As a result of these withdrawals, Williams College now has $14.9 million invested in companies with operations in South Africa, down from $31 million in July, 1986. Because of an increase in the value of the endowment, this means a percentage change from 13.1 percent to 5.2 percent of the total endowment.

This year the committee plans to continue to suggest methods of implementing the policy of disinvestment advocacy, Dubendorf said. The committee also hopes to pursue important related topics, such as what "withdrawal" means in actual terms. There has been a "fairly steady stream of evaluations of what it means to disinvest," Dubendorf said.

Other issues to be discussed include what is the most appropriate method of transferring assets in South Africa and a determination of who is buying the assets of American companies that have withdrawn.

The committee agreed to send letters to companies that have not yet left South Africa. The letters will be written and sent out by College Treasurer William Reed, who is secretary to the ACSR. The letters will express the college's continuing concern and interest in what each company is doing, if they are not withdrawing, to help end apartheid. If the company is currently planning to withdraw, the letters will ask when and how.

Cruelty to animals

The ACSR will also continue to discuss a variety of other shareholder issues besides withdrawal from South Africa, including nuclear power issues, the use of laboratory animals in drug and substance testing, SDI participation and others.

At the meeting, the ACSR voted on a proxy for Proctor and Gamble, a company in which the college owns stock. "The basic concern is that Proctor and Gamble uses animals for testing, causing pain to the animals - and this is not good," said Reed.

The committee voted against the proxy 6-0.

"I think the committee felt that the proxy went beyond what government regulations and control provided for and was unrealistic," Reed said.

Reed said he reported the ACSR's recommendation on the proxy to Charles Mott, the Chairman of the Finance Committee of the Board of Trustees (Fincom). Mott approved the ACSR's recommendation.

Fincom makes final decisions on how the college will vote on proxies, but Reed said that Fincom goes along with ACSR recommendations 99.9 percent of the time.

Reed added that in cases such as the recommendation on the Proctor and Gamble proxy, where the ACSR votes for management, the recommendation does not usually become an issue with Fincom.

Yale Law School Representative to Visit

On Thursday, October 15th, Associate Dean James A. Thomas of the Yale Law School will talk with prospective law students.

You may attend a session with Dean Thomas at 9 AM or 10:30 AM. Please contact the Office of Career Counseling for details.

Admissions material will be distributed at the sessions.

UVM

A picture of University of Vermont student Peggy Brady reclining on a hammock will be featured in a story on "The Women of the Top Ten Party Schools" in the October issue of Playboy. Controversy erupted at UVM, which is listed as the fourth biggest party school in the nation, when Playboy photographers visited the campus last fall in search of models. "I would have been personally disappointed with myself if I didn't go in there and try. I wasn't going to do anything about it... then I said, 'Gee, I've always wanted to be in Playboy,'" Brady said. According to an article in The Burlington Free Press, a summer aerobics class is the only credit Brady has earned at the university.

Wesleyan

Students are protesting Wesleyan University's policy of surprise fire inspections, complaining about the lack of advance notice and suggesting that the procedure might be illegal. "The purpose is to eliminate the hazards, not police the students," said Middletown Deputy Fire Marshal Paul Rashe. The raids have led to a crackdown on items such as hot pots, frayed extension cords and wall tapestries, which Rashe said "can inflame an entire room in a matter of seconds." Wesleyan students, however, don't share Rashe's enthusiasm for the inspections, calling them an invasion of privacy. One student said, "I don't like the fact that no warnings are given. The last time this happened I was in the shower."

Wesleyan Again

Is Wesleyan overcrowded? Many students are complaining that their classes are too large, and some professors agree. While some students have no problem with their big classes, others said they are disappointed because one reason that they came to Wesleyan was to enjoy small class discussions. English professor Joe Reed agreed, saying, "I think it is a mistake for the admissions panel to inform prospective students and their parents that the teaching in the University is always taught in Socratic dialogues, because it is not."

Kent State

Williams is just one of the many schools struggling with a new party policy and stricter alcohol regulations. Alcohol is now prohibited at parties and other social events in underclass student dormitories at Kent State University, and tailgate parties were banned last year. As of next fall, alcohol will be permitted only in upperclass and graduate student housing. Kent citizens are also trying to control alcohol consumption, claiming that the bars are generating too much noise. Kathy Foster, manager of a Kent bar called "The Stuffed Mushroom," argued that, "As long as there are college kids here, there is going to be noise. If they want to get rid of the noise, they have to get rid of the kids."

HighCroft students have structured schedule

by Stephanie Jones

Perhaps you have noticed the HighCroft School while jogging on Gale Road. HighCroft is a private school which was founded by its headmaster, David Milne, in 1978. Milne said he started the school because, "There had to be a school for the student of average or above-average ability who was not well served by a regular private or public school."

Milne described HighCroft's typical students as under-achievers, many of whom have poor self-images. He said that he believes HighCroft helps them gain more confidence in themselves.

Isolated

Removed from the center of Williamstown, HighCroft is even more isolated than Williams. Enrollment is kept at a maximum of 86 students. When it first began, the school was all-male, but it went co-ed two years later and now has a male/female ratio of two to one. Most students are between ninth and twelfth grade, but the school takes some students as early as fourth grade.

Milne said he wanted to avoid having a large number of students go home every weekend, so he purposely sought to find students from outside New England. Students come from all over the world, representing several foreign countries and all parts of the United States, including Alaska. Nearly every graduate of HighCroft has gone on to college, he said.

Structured

HighCroft emphasizes a structured and disciplined environment. Faculty members live in each of the dorms. During the week, students get up at 6:00 a.m. and must have their lights out by 10:00 p.m. They are assigned to faculty tables in the dining hall. Seating arrangements are switched frequently to allow them to eat with a variety of people, and students take turns waiting tables. The school's dress code requires a coat and tie for boys and a dress or skirt for girls. Any student caught using drugs or alcohol is automatically expelled, but Milne said the school no longer has much of a problem with drugs or alcohol.

HighCroft students have a full schedule. The school has a traditional curriculum, and six of the seven courses a student takes each year are required. The seventh class can be chosen from a variety of electives including languages, art, drama, computers, or anything the students and faculty are interested in, such as psychology or economics.

Most classes contain about four students, who are matched according to ability rather than age. Conferences are held every two weeks to insure that the students are in the proper classes. Upper level classes contain six to eight students, and make greater use of lectures. After their classes, students must participate in two hours of athletics and spend two hours in study hall.

Faculty cope with long distance marriages

by Rob Welsberg

Assistant Professor of Economics Padmanabhan Srinagesh has driven the 106 miles to Worcester to visit his wife, who is a resident at the community hospital there, almost every weekend since they were married three years ago. He is just one of a number of Williams faculty and staff members who have resigned themselves to being separated from their spouses because of career conflicts.

"It's a serious disruption," he said. "There's obvious personal sacrifice involved in being apart. But my wife wants to be a resident doctor, and Williams-town doesn't have that opportunity."

He also said that having to commute every weekend interferes with his professional responsibilities at Williams. "Joint work is very difficult, because I can't keep up the interchange with other professors that I'd have on weekends. And if I forget to bring some papers or something with me, I have to come back Sunday, taking away from the time I have with my wife," he said.

While Srinagesh said he considers his true residence to be in Worcester, Associate Professor of Philosophy Rosemarie Tong, whose husband teaches at Glassboro State College in New Jersey, said her family's real home is here, where her two children have been raised. "We've been commuting for nine years, and my husband does it all, because it became too hard to cart the kids to New Jersey every weekend." Also, she added, her job at Williams has more responsibilities and obligations than her husband's position.

"I get the benefits of having the children with me, but I also must shoulder the burdens of their day-to-day problems," she said. "The saddest part of all is that the boys will be gone before my husband and I stop commuting." But, like Srinagesh, she and her husband both wanted careers and had difficulty finding jobs in the same place.

Compromise

It doesn't help that the place is a small town like Williamstown, according to Srinagesh. "In general, it's difficult to work families into a small town — it lacks diversity... it's difficult to find opportunities to work in families here," he said.

This lack of opportunity forces a great deal of compromise as far as careers are concerned, said Assistant Professor of Economics Lynn Stuart, who sees her husband, a professor at Vassar College, on weekends. "We don't feel either of us can say, 'This is what will happen no matter what.' Accommodating two careers is important to a marriage," she said.

Resignation and rhythm

Tong said that the desire to continue both careers has resulted in a certain resignation about the present situation. "I'm resigned that this is the way it has to be," she said. "We've made the best of the situation. I won't say, 'This is the way to live!,' but over the years we've adjusted." Indeed, she added, the family adjusted to this rhythm of live after the first year.

"I believe I am well-adjusted, although it's easier if you're

Leaf people fall in for Berkshire foliage

by Keko Torres

Have you noticed that lately you've been waiting an extra minute or so on the side of Route 2, watching a countless stream of cars go by? Have you wondered about those cars as you sprinted through a narrow opening in the traffic?

The people in those cars have come to see the Berkshires dressed up in colors ranging from a deep red to a brilliant yellow. They are sometimes called "leaf people." When asked where all these tourists come from, Lorrie Richards, front desk receptionist at the Orchards, said, "They come from California, Texas — everywhere."

Obviously, these leaves are a big deal to attract people from as far as the West Coast, and as you might expect, people from the Northeast come in even greater numbers. "Most are from New York, New Jersey, Connecticut, but you see a lot of bus tours from the South," said Dan Keegan, bartender at the River House.

Sarah Campbell of the Cow Bell said that the most exotic tourists she has met were from Australia, although, "I thought they were from Britain."

The peak period for these tourists runs from the last week in September through the middle of October, according to Bergen Chrissos, maître d' at the Mill On The Floss. When asked how business increases during this season, Chrissos said, "It picks up for everybody — everybody."

"It's wonderful"

In order to get an idea of what a leaf person does, some tourists were informally interviewed on Spring Street. Norene Sauz of Miami, Florida, said that he and his wife come to the Berkshires two to three times per year. During their fall stay, the Sauz's enjoy driving up Mount Greylock and taking pictures. Sauz said that, at one point, he pressed leaves in a book to retain the wonderful colors.

Ann Hallmark of El Paso, Texas, offered this opinion of the Berkshires and the fall foliage: "It's wonderful!"

Croft. The school belongs to the Taconic League and competes with eight other schools. Strong sports include lacrosse, soccer, volleyball, tennis and girls' softball. In the winter, students go skiing three afternoons a week and hold an invitational competition. HighCroft also offers other programs, such as riding, swimming, weight-training, CPR and aerobics.

One benefit of the school's small size is that it is easy for a student to get a program started. The wrestling and karate programs began this way.

Collection boasts best of big band boss

by Eric Hanson

The Roaring '20s are alive and well in Williamstown. Nestled in the basement of Stetson Hall is a one-of-a-kind collection of music and memorabilia from the era of famous big band leader Paul Whiteman. Boasting over 3,700 arrangements of dance tunes and orchestral works, hundreds of records and about 400 hours of tapes from radio broadcasts, The Whiteman Collection stands alone as the definitive source for music and information relating to Whiteman and his time period.

Donated to the College in 1935, the Collection was not completely organized and catalogued until some 15 years later. Roy Lamson, professor of English and jazz clarinetist, was given the dubious honor of coordinating this monumental task as the Collection's first curator. Professor Irwin Shalman followed him in 1954 and remained in the position until 1974, at which time former stockbroker and journalist Carl Johnson, the current curator, accepted the post.

Circumstance and convenience were the major factors accounting for the donation of such a prestigious and valuable collection to such a small and secluded liberal arts college. Logic seems to be unable to explain a connection between Williams and the famous concert violinist turned big-bucks band leader. Nevertheless, a connection developed.

Mid-way through his career, Whiteman, whose credits include the "discovery" of both Bing Crosby and George Gershwin, recognized the need to relocate the mounds of sheet music and other items that were accumulating in his home.

In 1935, Whiteman presented this problem to his lawyer, David Pollack, who was a favorite among famous show business figures. The shrewd Pollack knew his stuff. According to Curator Johnson, "He figured that if Whiteman made it [the music and memorabilia] a gift to an educational institution, he wouldn't be stuck with the work of inventorying and cataloging the collection." A college also has the library staff that is necessary for such a big job, Pollack reasoned.

Still, the question remained as to which particular college to choose. Strangely enough, it was the hospitality shown to a vacationing Pollack by three young Purple Valley professors that put Williams at the top of the list. "He was treated so nicely by these fellows," Johnson recounts, "that he told Whiteman, 'Why not give it to Williams?'" Whiteman liked the idea. "You are sitting in the middle of what happened," Johnson told this reporter.

Crucial combination
The Whiteman Collection combines world-wide recognition with small-town accessibility. Johnson receives inquiries from around the globe that range from simple requests for bits of information (that have included demands for trivia such as the size of Whiteman trumpet Bix Beiderbecke's mouthpiece) to orders for orchestral arrangements to be either performed or recorded. He recently completed work on an historical reconstruction album released by the Musical Heritage Society entitled "Paul Whiteman's Historic Aeolian Hall concert of 1924" and conducted by Maurice Peress. The album is a hopeful candidate for a Grammy Award nomination.

But the Collection also caters to those with more casual interests. Curator Carl Johnson is amiable as well as knowledgeable and is eager to show off the contents of the impressive collection. One need not be a hardcore Whiteman fan in order to appreciate and benefit from the Collection's offerings, either.

The Collection also contains recordings by other jazz and popular music artists from Whiteman's era and beyond, as well as Johnson's personal disc

Everything is not enough for sax quartet

by Michael Erard

10 years ago, they were young men with a dream: they wanted to play saxophone in a quartet. They wanted to make a living doing it. People told them they were crazy.

Today, the Amherst Saxophone Quartet, composed of Salvatore Andolina, Michael ragtime piece, and perhaps some Duke Ellington. "There's no string quartet playing jazz," said Rosenthal.

Rosenthal's own serious musical interests range from the broad spectrum of classical music to a lot of jazz to an occasional Top-40 tune that he might catch while in the car.

He jokingly encouraged musicologists to figure out why Beethoven, Mozart and Bach had never written for the saxophone.

Rosenthal said of young artists with dreams: "The person who says 'I know it's foolhardy and impossible, but I don't want to do anything else' has the best chance of succeeding." One must be able to take rejection, he said, but through that rejection one gets better.

Gigs aplenty

Now a professional full-time quartet, The Amherst Saxophone Quartet will play over 40 out-of-town concerts and over 50 concerts in the city of Buffalo through their joint residences at Buffalo State University and with the City of Buffalo itself. The number of performances they do a year is always on the rise, Rosenthal said, so there is rarely time for performances outside of the Quartet's regular responsibilities.

"Down the road, we'd like to inspire and commission the greatest composers to write sax quartets for us," he said, "and then perform and record them." When asked who the "greatest composers" were, Rosenthal replied there were 300 to 400 of them. The best composers by reputation are booked for several years, he explained, but the Quartet consistently asks young and unknown composers to write pieces and even considers unsolicited pieces. In this way, he said, the Quartet hopes to be playing the compositions of composers who may someday be great.

The Amherst Saxophone Quartet will perform Friday, October 9 at 8 p.m. in Brooks-Rogers Recital Hall. Admission is $4 or free with a Williams I.D.

The Amherst Saxophone Quartet will get crazy this Friday at 8 p.m. in Brooks-Rogers Recital Hall. Admission is free with a Williams I.D.

Nasclmben, Stephen Rosenthal, and Harry Fackelman, is perhaps the most active and most successful saxophone quartet in the world.

Stephen Rosenthal described the quartet as a "string quartet with saxophones with no limits."

"It's exciting to play a range of music," he said. A typical concert might include a Baroque piece, three or four saxophone quartet pieces that the traditional chamber musician would recognize, one or two recent saxophone pieces, a

"It's important to listen to everything. You get influences from everywhere," he said.

The saxophone is a relatively young instrument, Rosenthal explained, that has evolved little since its invention in the 1840s by Adolph Sax. The first music for a saxophone quartet was written in 1857.

"There are now over a thousand quartets written, but there are so few professional quartets playing them that the average concert-goer has never heard of them," he said. "Many musicologists haven't even heard of them."

thinking it's not going to go on forever. For now, though, we have the routine down — the disruptive part is packing and unpacking every weekend," Stuart said. The weekly trip, she continued, is easier because she was not assigned classes on Friday, as she requested.

The professors agreed that departments tried to arrange their schedules to accommodate such problems as commuting. They cited this as an example of the college helping professors adjust to this difficult situation. Srinagesh said, "The administration is receptive to the problems of its professors, and they generally go out of their way to help, even though they can't always do so."

Networking

According to Assistant to the President Nancy McIntire, there is no specific college policy regarding commuting professors. However, she added that the college is aware of the problems of spouses finding jobs in the Berkshire area. "Through the Personnel and Career Counseling Offices, we will send a spouse's resume to all local businesses and agencies that could use their skills... this networking has always been a college practice."

Dean of the Faculty George Goethals agreed that the college is generally sensitive to the problems of finding two jobs in the area. He added that this problem seemed to be prevalent among the Williams faculty, more so than at most other colleges, because of the size of the community.

Taken for granted

Stuart agreed, noting that, "It's almost taken for granted. I was considered relatively fortunate that my husband and I are only 100 miles apart."

Of the future of this situation at Williams, Goethals said, "I sense that it is increasing as more and more people become involved in dual-career marriages." He said that he sees no change in college policy — just a continuation of being sensitive to the strain on the couple because of the area.

Dorothea Hanson, director of the Weston Language Center, said that liking Williamstown has been part of her family's decision to make it their home for almost 30 years. When her husband left a departmental chair here to become director of the Advanced Placement Program in New York City, they decided that he would commute to and from Williamstown. She said, "We would not be happy in Manhattan with four children. Williamstown is a much better place to raise a family than New York City or the suburbs."

Supportive community

Tong agreed. "Getting a part-time job nearer to my husband wouldn't be as attractive, because the children wouldn't have the same environment. Williamstown has good schools and a friendly, supportive type of community," she said.

Still, each of these professors said that, at first, they did not expect their respective situations to work out this way. Tong said, "Our initial thought was, 'Oh well, we'll do this for a couple of years, then we'll be together.'" But other job offers weren't as attractive and the areas just weren't as nice as Williamstown, she said, so she stayed here.

Srinagesh's situation was much the same. "We figured that something would come along. We knew there was a prospect that we would be apart, but it was a distant one," he said.

While they all enjoy their present careers, there was some regret mixed in with the resignation and compromise. Srinagesh said, "Once you've been there, being together may be a better option." And Tong said, "Even with the adjustment, there's still an emotional deprivation. Many of the reasons you marry and have kids is to be together and to enjoy being together."

he could get down all the names of the students violating laws or he "could call up 10 fellows and get them to round everybody up."

Kenyatta, when asked if the college is concerned about what Zolto might do, said, "We're always concerned about Chief Zolto."

Zolto stressed the need for cooperation between the college, the students, and the police department. "Don't think I haven't met with college officials... I'm no stranger to you fellows. I've been in this police department for 32 years."

Due to the construction of the all-weather track, the tailgate area has been severely restricted. In his letter, Peck requested that students try to hold their tailgates someplace other than the designated tailgate area in order to allow more space for guests and alumni.

Peck said the decision to ban kegs from Weston field was made because "there was just too much beer flowing down there" and also to cut down underage drinking at the tailgates.

Zolto questioned the presence of alcohol at tailgates. "A tailgate was originally like a picnic... someone forgot the food and started packing the booze up."

At last—a generation has found its voice.

Two years ago, Bret Easton Ellis's first novel, Less than Zero, became a nationwide sensation. Hailed as "electrifying" by Publishers Weekly and "exceptional" by The Los Angeles Times, it established its twenty-year-old author as a major new voice in American fiction.

Now that voice speaks again, even more compellingly than ever in The New York Times Book Review, Scott Spencer describes THE RULES OF ATTRACTION as "maybe the first exposé of what really goes on in the coed dorms we've heard about."

On Saturday evenings, there are often dances with other schools. Students must be accompanied by a parent or faculty member when leaving campus.

"The best thing about the school is the caring atmosphere where a lot of attention is paid to the individual and individual needs," Milne said. He said that he had originally thought that HighCroft would prepare students to return to more traditional schools, but many students liked the environment and decided to stay until graduation. "If we have any goal, it is to enable these students to be as strong, academically and socially, as they have the potential of being," he said.

The women harriers once again demonstrated their talent and depth in taking second place at Saturday's Amherst Invitational meet. The Ephs finished behind only Smith College and beat five other teams, including NESCAC contenders Trinity and Amherst.

For the Ephs, senior captain Sarah Pierce placed sixth overall, followed by Ingrid Wiesel '90 in 10th, and Anne Platt '91 in 11th. Sophomores Sarah Hams, Jennie Garrett, and Cathy Cocks placed 12th, 14th, and 15th respectively, and Susan Gray '90 came in 21st to complete the varsity top seven.

With only some 40 seconds separating the top five runners (the scoring members of the team), the Ephwomen are in good shape to do well at the big meets, in which pack running is most effective. The team currently boasts about nine or ten runners who can compete for the top seven spots. This depth allows them to rest members of the varsity without decreasing their competitiveness.

Expecting Ann Dannhauer '90 back from such a rest, as well as continued improvement by the team as a whole, it is natural to look forward to a strong performance at the NESCAC's in two weeks. This weekend the team will travel to South Hadley, Mass. to compete in the Mount Holyoke Invitational.

Women ruggers beaten by Beantown

Williams women's scrum goes up for the ball on a line out versus Beantown this Saturday. The A-side lost 20-0. (Chan)

by Cecilia Malm

Unable to play at home this weekend owing to stale Yale's unfortunate lack of driving expertise, the women's rugby club went en masse to Boston instead, to battle a recent national champion, the Beantown's Women's club. Despite the fact that they were only facing Beantown B's, the women suffered a bloody defeat, discouraged by the superior size and strength of the Beantown team.

The dismal final score of the contest, 20-0, does not, however, reflect the tenacity with which the A's faced the Amazon Beantown queens. Handicapped by early injuries to both scrum-half Kerry Klander '89 and prop Jody Skidd '88, the startled A's floundered through the first half, allowing three breakaway tries.

In the second half, however, the women woke up and made many fine defensive plays, although they were still unable to score. Club President Noreen Harrington '88 exhibited extraordinary stamina, always being first there to support the line in the rucks and mauls. Prop Cathy Paper '89 was also to be feared in the scrum downs with her bloodthirsty enthusiasm.

The B's and C's joined forces to play the next match. Although they too were unable to score against Beantown, they came heartbreakingly close when a Katie Carr '91 place kick bounced out near the Beantown try zone. The B's and C's fought their way through several line outs and scrummages near the try line, but a punt by a Beantowner spoiled the scoring drive.

Among the star players of the day, were Jackie Graves '90 and Rebecca Matson '90, who both Tomorrow the squad takes the three hour trip up Route 7 to take on the Panthers of Middlebury. On Saturday, it will travel to Trinity to round out the road trip.

Tennis improves to 3-3, edges Wesleyan on Sat.

by Jim McDermott

The women's tennis team won two distinctly different matches this week. The netters trounced Mount Holyoke by an embarrassing 9-0 score last Tuesday, and then squeaked out a 5-4 victory over Wesleyan on Saturday. Both wins — which put the team's record at 3-3 — came on the road and without number one player Amy Davidson '90, who has a groin injury.

The match against Mount Holyoke marked the first time any doubles squad had won in three contests. None of the nine matches went to three sets, and all were easy compared to previous contests. Said captain Anne Shulman '88, "Everyone played well and Holyoke was not very strong. Some matches were over in half an hour."

Against the Cardinals, the Ephs took four out of the six singles positions and won at number three doubles to procure the 5-4 victory. As Davidson was unable to play, coaches Sean Sloane and Ed Grees shuffled the line-up. Freshman Katherine Stearns played at number four singles and produced a straight set triumph. Missy Crouchley '89 won at number three and Mary Montgomery '88 won at number two. Both victories were three set matches.

Shulman won her number six singles match after being down 0-6, 0-3. The captain won the next six games of the second set and took the final set 6-3. Her

5-0 field hockey rolls past Cardinals

by Marc McDermott

After the first half of its Saturday game against Little Three opponent Wesleyan, the Field Hockey team found itself trailing by a goal; a situation it had not yet experienced this season.

With their undefeated season and the first leg of the Little Three championship on the line, the Ephs rallied for three goals to dominate the second half and pull out their fifth victory of the year. Sophomore Kristin Frederickson drew first blood for the squad scoring off a Mo Flaherty '90 assist.

Having tied the score, Williams caught fire, not allowing the ball out of the Wesleyan zone until the Ephs finally broke through. Flaherty was again instrumental, as her shot rebounded off the Wesleyan netminder's pads to the charging Kirsten Neuse '89, who tipped the ball to sophomore Amy Kershaw who ripped the nets for the go ahead score. Judy Fleishman '90 finished off the scoring to seal the 3-1 win.

Senior Captain Lisa Tenerowicz was ecstatic after the game. "This is the gutsiest team I've ever played on. Last year's team would have given up after being down, but we don't choke anymore."

Earlier in the week, Williams defeated Mt. Holyoke 3-0 on the strength of goals by Frederickson, Kershaw and freshman Anne Marie Marvin.

Williams hopes to continue its undefeated skid this week when they take on Middlebury and Trinity, both away.

With a superb effort, co-captain Dave Glendon '88 led the men's varsity cross country team to third place in the team standings at the Amherst Invitational this Saturday. "Just when he looked as though he was going to die, he sped up," said coach Pete Farwell, referring to Glendon's spectacular last half mile in which he out-kicked two runners, one from Amherst and one from Westfield. Glendon finished sixth overall, with a time of 27:23, one minute behind the winner, Tom Evans of Amherst.

Following Glendon for Williams was Dave Tewksbury '89, who came in sixteenth overall in 28:40. Tewksbury led a pack of four Eph runners, all of whom finished within a period of twenty five seconds. The other three were Dale Johnson '90, Steve Brody '90, and Dave Sprague '88. Coach Farwell was pleased with how well the team ran as a pack, noting that with the addition of co-captain Ted Arrowsmith, Gil McCabe '89, and Dylan Cooper '91, the team's prospects for Little Three look much better than they did in the beginning of the season.

This Friday, the runners will face Trinity, and R.P.I. and North Adams in a four way meet, hosted by the Bantams.

WUFO

The Williams Ultimate Frisbee Organization returned undefeated from a tournament at Wesleyan last Saturday. This latest victory brings the team's record to 8-1 and establishes it as a force to be reckoned with in New England College Ultimate. The first match of the day was against University of Massachusetts who had lost to WUFO a week ago. Once again the Ephs dominated the entire game, leading 8-5 at the half, and going on to win, 15-11.

The real test to WUFO's strength was the game against the host team, Wesleyan. Eph-Cardinal matches are traditionally tight battles, but this one began with a 5-0 Williams spurt. Then Wesleyan answered with a scoring blast of their own to pull ahead 8-7 to end the half. From there the score saw-sawed until Wesleyan pulled to a 14-12 lead and the Ephs faced double game point.

At this point, WUFO came alive with lightning offense and intense diving defense, taking the lead and finally finishing off the Cardinals with a long toss by Chris Jones '88 that was pulled down in the end zone by Jim Adams '90 for a 16-14 victory. "Wesleyan raised themselves to a new level of play to come back from 5-0, then we upped the ante once more to win it," said Jim Hartnett '88, reflecting on the intensity of the game.

The last game of the day was a test of WUFO's endurance. The exhausted disc-tossers had to fight off a well rested Columbia team. The game was a struggle and was tied at 17, at which point it went into sudden death. Columbia had possession, but Professor Dave Levine stuffed the thrower, and Chris Page '89 picked up the disc to hit John Bellwoar '89 for the win.

In a rain-soaked mud trench, that might be likened by some to a rugby pitch, the Williams men's A-side rugger fundered for 65 minutes against a hard-hitting, panther-quick Middlebury squad that stunned the White Dogs, 6-4. The Ephs never truly got on track, despite scrum play that left one Panther rugger describing it as the proverbial "immoveable

All game long, Mead frustrated the Middlebury hooker by stealing the ball as the Panther scrumhalf put it into play. But Williams was unable to provide the consistent offensive drive of past weeks that has piled up the points, and the Ephs went scoreless in the first half.

Coming off a pair of penalty kicks, Middlebury took a 6-0 lead early in the second half, but WRFC scrumhalf Kurt Oeler '88 kept things close as he plunged across the Middlebury tryline with 25 minutes remaining in the game, cutting the margin to two points. Although the White Dogs controlled the momentum for the rest of the match, with the line play continually stifled by the Middlebury defense and the kicking game faltering in the face of foul weather, the Williams A's could not produce the score to win.

But the pride of the WRFC, the ever indomitable B-side retained some Doggish pride, triumphing on a last minute penalty conversion off the foot of sophomore wing Steve Felix. The kick, a feat of heroic proportion, spanning nearly 40 meters against a driving, rain-sodden wind, gave the killer B's a 9-8 victory as they raised their season mark to 3-0.

The B's had jumped out to an early lead as Chris A. Michaels '89 broke through the Panther line from his inside position, but after a late second half score, Middlebury led 8-6.

This week, A-siders travel to Pittsfield for the Berkshire Annual Rugby fest, while the other sides mount up for the treacherous mountaineering trip to Bates College in Maine.

the long bus ride. Teamwork somehow did not show up well. But, luckily, we were able to hold their offense off fairly well. But Middlebury certainly was able to penetrate our defense a lot more than Wesleyan was," explained Boddiker.

Melendy said that the squad learned from the tie with the Panthers and applied that to its Wesleyan victory. "We tried to be more creative in our offense after the tie against Middlebury. Knowing that Wesleyan had beaten Middlebury last week, we knew we had to play better."

The team, now 4-2-1 on the year, will conclude its two week road trip today at R.P.I. and Saturday, at Trinity, a team Melendy called Williams' equal.

From The Locker Room

by Stewart Verdery

In a recent column in Sports Illustrated, author Jack McCallum declared that since the United States has been slowly losing in the international sports scene, we should schedule a number of football games between NFL teams and squads from around the globe — i.e. Denver vs. Denmark or Bears vs. Bangladesh — to restore U.S. pride.

Indeed, while this problem doesn't match arms control or AIDS as a national concern, it is very frustrating to American sports fans to see us losing golf's Ryder Cup and tennis' Davis Cup, having weak international hockey and soccer outfits, and losing in hoops to Brazil. The only 'world' titles we seem to win are the 'World' Series and the NBA 'world' championship, hardly global events at all.

To recap recent history in a few sports — Golf's favorites are now the Europeans, Seve and Bernhard, or the Aussie, Mr. Shark, not the top money winners on the PGA tour, Americans like Paul Azinger, Curtis Strange and the like. But at least Americans win some golf tournaments; in tennis, we win nothing. Our best players are a 35-year old, a crybaby husband, and Brad Gilbert, who seems to be defeated 6-0, 6-1, 6-1 every week by Lendl. Chris Evert (Lloyd?) still makes the semifinals almost each event, but how much longer will that happen?

I won't go into our latest showings in hockey, soccer, amateur boxing, or Little League baseball — (hint, they're not good), but I would like to propose a couple ways to prove to the rest of the world that U.S. athletes still are number one. Take the two team sports, baseball and basketball, where so many of our good athletes compete, and challenge the foreigners. If Russia wants to send their skaters against the U.S., where only part of the country cares about the sport, then make the communist hoop team play against Jordan, Bird, Magic and friends in the Olympics. Bolivia can come, too, if they dare.

Then after Moses dunks Sabonis, round up the best of the Japanese, Nicaraguan, Mexican and Taiwanese baseball players for a quick round-robin against a U.S. all-star team. And especially invite the Cubans, who seemed really excited after beating an American amateur team in the Pan Am games. Throw them against a lineup of Raines, E. Davis, Mattingly, Murphy, Schmidt, Parrish, O. Smith, Whitaker and Clemens and watch Castro wince.

S.I. had the right idea with Giants vs. Guyana, but there is a real way to get the same point across. Our pro leagues in baseball, basketball and football provide fans with the best sports competition in the world, but they also drain talent away from sports that everyone else plays. The country needs to do what it can to restore American prestige in international sports, whether it be the Olympics, Wimbledon or the links. Thus, I say that we should demand that all pros be eligible for competition: we should not be defeated, just because we have professional sports.

9-3 Volleyball rides six game win streak

by Ted Hobart

Continuing an impressive six match winning streak, the women's volleyball team upped its record to 9-3 as it captured three victories this week, without dropping a single game.

After a no-show by Harvard on Tuesday night, who turned out to be the Ephs' luckiest opponents this week, the squad travelled to South Hadley to rough up Connecticut College, and host Mount Holyoke. Conn. College fell first, 15-4 and 15-8.

The Mounties were the Ephs' next victims as they were unable to return Williams' ferocious serves effectively, especially those of senior tri-captain Laura Wefling. Even when they were able to keep the ball in play, the tenacious middle-blocking of Kathy McConnell '90 and tri-captain Jenny Aulse '88 shut down the attack. The Ephs dispensed with Mount Holyoke in two games as well, 15-2 and 15-3.

In action on Friday, the team took its winning streak to Hanover, New Hampshire for a best of five game match against Dartmouth. The Green came out strong in the first game, staking a 5-1 lead before Laurie Hartsoe '91 took over, serving seven consecutive points and leading the squad to a 15-6 win.

The second game started out in similar fashion with Dartmouth jumping out to a 6-0 lead. This time it was the Eph's defense that tightened to stop the Green and turn the tide. Again, the team came from behind for the slim 15-12 victory.

The squad continued on a roll in the third game, closing out the match with a 15-11 victory. Coach Nancy Roberts was exhilarated with this week's games, especially because of the consistent, strong play by the entire team and good communication among players.

The Ephs next take the court Wednesday night at Lasell Gymnasium against Springfield and Saturday at the Connecticut College tournament.

Mike Masters '89 moves in on the North Adams goaltender in his team's 1-0 victory over the Mohawks. Masters didn't score here, but he added a goal and an assist this weekend against Clark.

Guns for Dartmouth tomorrow

Men's soccer undefeated

by Ted Ruger

It had to happen some time. This past Saturday, after over four full games and almost 400 minutes of match play, Clark became the first opponent to score on the undefeated Williams men's soccer squad this season.

The Clark penalty kick goal however, was of little significance in the final score as the Ephs won 3-1 and extended their record to an unblemished 5-0, having beaten North Adams earlier in the week.

Williams wasted no time getting on top after travelling to Clark, jumping up 2-0 in the first twenty minutes of play. Midfielder Ambler '90 scored in the first minutes of the match as he headed a free kick cross from Dan Calichman '90 past the Clark goalie. Several minutes later, Kurt Schroeder '88 fed Mike Masters '89 with a brilliant 'killer' through ball into the box. Masters beat the Clark keeper to the ball and directed it accurately into the net.

Blanck beaten

Soon after, the Ephs committed the handball infraction in the penalty area which enabled the Clark shooter to break the squad's unscored upon streak with a penalty kick.

Shortly before the end of the first half, Doug Brooks '90 rounded off the final 3-1 score. Brooks took a pass from Masters and chipped it over the keeper's head and into the goal from eighteen yards out.

Despite the convincing tale of the scoreboard, Eph captain Nick Nachamkin '88 felt the team could have played a better game. "Overall, the play was pretty even. The main difference between the two teams was Clark's poor back four. They made some mistakes and we were able to capitalize," he said.

Dartmouth next

Williams faces a major test tomorrow afternoon when they play host to undefeated Division I power Dartmouth. The Ephs, ranked 3rd in the New England and sixteenth in the national Division III poll will host the Big Green at Cole Field. "I'm very optimistic going into the Dartmouth game. Before the season started, I didn't expect to be 5-0 at this point, and I've been pleased with the way things have worked out," said Coach Michael Russo.

"Dartmouth has a lot more pressure (on them) than we do. We really don't have as much to lose against a Division I team as they do against us," said Nachamkin.

Punchless football loses 17-6 to Hamilton

by Al Mottur

Failing to score after the end of the first quarter for the second week in a row, the football team fell to the Continentals of Hamilton on Saturday by a 17-6 score. The loss drops the Ephs' record to 0-2 and indicates that players' preseason predictions of a winning season and a Little Three Championship might be a bit premature.

The game, played in Clinton N.Y., was "won by the better team," according to head coach Richard Farley. "They were bigger and stronger, and that showed in the second half. They physically wore us down," said the rookie skipper.

Taking a quick look at the game stats proves Farley's assessment accurate. Hamilton ran twenty more plays than Williams, and outgained the Ephs by more than a two to one margin on the ground (280 yards to 121). And although quarterback Scott Kennedy '89 threw for more yards than his Continental counterpart, the Eph passing game was not any more effective.

Teams trade scores

Hamilton struck first in the game, as star running back Rob Feighan evaded the Williams defenders for a 55 yard touchdown run with nine minutes gone in the first quarter. That jaunt was one of two long gainers for Feighan on the day, who amassed an amazing 173 yards against the traditionally strong Eph defense.

Not to be outdone, Eph sophomore Maurice Holden worked some magic of his own to bring Williams back to within one. With less than two minutes to play in the first period, the Ephs had the ball on the Continental 30, fourth and four. Holden, who is rapidly becoming an Eph phenom, powered for four yards and the first down. After a Lars Hem '90 one yard gain, Holden scampered for 25 yards and the apparent tying score. However, the point after failed.

Option works again

The teams then traded ineffective drives for almost a quarter before the Continentals scored with 40 seconds to play in the half. For the second week in a row, the Williams defense was beaten by a running back option pass. Although this play, a three yard Continental TD pass, was not as big a gainer as last week's 57 yard bomb by the Panthers, the result was the same: seven points.

Unfortunately, the squad could not seem to get back into the game after the half, as penalties and failed third down conversion attempts stymied the Ephmen's efforts. Once again, Kennedy was relatively sharp. However, costly dropped balls made for unattractive passing statistics, (7-21, 92 yds.) and unfinished drives.

Junior receiver Rob Gotti was the single bright spot in the receiving corps, as he hauled in a 42 yard pass for his first reception and the team's first big pass play of the year.

Gotti said that the Continental cornerbacks were not respecting the Eph receivers, because "they knew we were dropping the ball." As a result, the running attack that was so potent against Middlebury as well as during the first quarter on Saturday, was shut down by the opportunistic Continental defenders, who keyed on that aspect of the Eph offense.

Consequently, the team failed to reach double figures in points for the second time this season and the third straight game (counting last season's 10-7 loss to Amherst). Hamilton, meanwhile, added an additional TD with ten minutes to play to ice the win.

Looking toward this week's game at undefeated Trinity, Farley pointed to the passing attack as the obvious key to victory. "We're going to be in ball games like these for the next six weeks. We're not going to dominate anyone. Let's not kid ourselves. We've got to be able to throw the ball consistently (to win). And we're still looking for the right combination. Until we find it, people are going to gang up on us."

Women's soccer routs Redbirds by 3-0 score

by James Lee

A combination of excellent offensive play and stellar teamwork led the women's varsity soccer team to an impressive 3-0 victory in its game against Wesleyan, the first Little Three opponent of the season. Previous to last Saturday's win over the Cardinals, the team managed to secure a tough 1-1 tie against Middlebury.

The Wesleyan conquest was fueled by offensive fireworks which coach Lisa Melendy called our "best offensive play of the season so far. Offense was really connecting well and passing was excellent."

Co-captain Christine Boddiker '88 shined throughout the game, scoring a breakaway goal during the first half and making an assist to Lori Schaefer '89 during the second half. "The teamwork was really great during this game, though against Middlebury, we somehow didn't play together well as a team," commented Boddiker. The Eph's other score came off the foot of Elise Phillips '88, co-captain along with Boddiker.

After that score, Wesleyan still couldn't mount any offense against Goalie Joyce Rogers '88 and the Williams net. The Ephs pounded their Cardinal foes, however, sending 25 shots on goal to Wesleyan's four. "Their offense was in fact so weak that our defense wasn't tested," said Melendy.

The squad's tie with Middlebury was in part a result of fatigue after a long bus ride up Route 7. "We had a problem getting excited and motivated after

by Erik T. Burns
and Bill Savadove

"Jesus Christ: Don't wait for the movie..." said posters across campus announcing a colloquium with noted Christian speaker Cliffe Knechtle last week. In addition to the colloquium, Knechtle held a worship service and fielded questions from students at three open-air afternoon sessions in front of Chapin Hall on a wide array of topics, from Apartheid in South Africa to pre-marital sex.

Knechtle, who works for Inter-Varsity Christian Fellowship, an international campus-oriented Christian organization, led lively debates with anyone willing to step forward and ask a question or make a statement. The Williams Christian Fellowship (WCF), which sponsored the colloquium, is associated with the Inter-Varsity organization and has roughly 100 active members.

Scott Rigby '88, a member of the WCF executive committee, was responsible for bringing Knechtle here. Rigby said he had seen him speak in New York City and at Brown University. "The Christian faith is frequently viewed by an intellectual community in a negative light, as intellectual suicide. We (WCF) wanted to make Jesus Christ an issue, we wanted to get people to consider the Christian faith," said Rigby.

"Not a soapbox"

Rigby said the administration was wary of allowing Knechtle to conduct open air forums on campus because of the belief that it might offend other religious groups. "We had to convince them that Knechtle presented an open forum, not a soapbox preaching session — that Christ is examined on an intellectual level. We even showed them videotapes of Cliffe," he said.

The administration limited Knechtle's open air time to four hours, which is about two hours less than he said he usually receives, and would not let him talk from the top of Chapin steps.

Knechtle rejected the idea that he is an evangelist. "I steer away from that word because of the negative stereotypes associated with it," he said. "Television evangelists are ego-tripping, money-snatching showmen." Knechtle's total pay for the week was $820, including expenses and food. The money was paid by WCF.

"My desire is to introduce people to the closest friend I have, Jesus Christ," Knechtle said. He has been visiting cam-

Acting Dean of the Faculty George Goethals has issued a formal reprimand to Associate Professor of Philosophy Rosemarie Tong for her failure to attribute a section of a speech she gave at Greenwich High School in Greenwich, Conn., on September 29.

Tong said that she inadvertently did not attribute the quotation, because she was under severe time constraints and had been assisted in compiling the notes for the speech by an associate, who had included the quotation among Tong's own notes.

"I have nothing to hide except that I did a careless, shoddy, slipshod job," Tong said.

The Stamford (Conn.) Advocate reported in a front-page article Thursday that some teachers in the audience recognized a section of the speech, which focused on Allan Bloom's The Closing of the American Mind, as part of a review by Louis Menand which had appeared in the New Republic.

Greenwich High School Headmaster John Curtin called her the day after the speech, Tong said, and told her that some teachers had recognized parts of Menand's review in the first three pages of her speech. Tong said she compared her speech to the review and found parts that she had not attributed.

Because she had overcommitted herself, Tong said, a friend in the math department had offered to arrange her notes and make an outline. In doing so, he mistakenly included parts of the review with Tong's own notes. "It (the lack of attribution) was due to the fact that someone was helping me and messed it up," she said.

She declined to name the faculty member involved.

Tong said she returned Curtin's call and explained what had happened. "He was satisfied with the explanation and told me that he would give

Tauber interprets Gaudino legacy

What does it mean to be charged with fulfilling the legacy of Robert Gaudino, a man who has been called a 20th-century Mark Hopkins?

"First of all—the standard is a very high one," Professor Raymond Baker, the first Gaudino Scholar, said. "Gaudino didn't live up to it himself. He was incredibly self-critical."

By publishing a report on the proposals and activities of the Gaudino Committee and Gaudino Scholar from 1984 to 1987, Professor Kurt Tauber, the second Gaudino Scholar, has fulfilled Gaudino's legacy of critical-self examination.

Tauber, who has been Gaudino scholar for three years and will be stepping down at the end of this year, has tried to invent and support ways of keeping the Gaudino legacy alive on campus.

Tauber said he thought the spirit of the Gaudino legacy is that there is no education without emotional change.

"The liberal arts speaks to your existence," he said. "The spirit of the legacy calls for the kind of intellectual and emotional effort that speaks to your passions and priorities."

Broad and narrow legacy
According to Tauber, the legacy has a broad and a narrow aspect.

The broader aspect places an extraordinarily high demand on intellectual excitement and the centrality of meaningful student discussion.

The narrow aspect, Tauber said, is Gaudino's emphasis on experiential learning.

In keeping with the broader aspect, Tauber said he created a student-faculty committee in 1984, the Gaudino Committee, to help him come to an understanding of what is crucial about the liberal arts. "I wanted to talk to thoughtful students about what they thought they ought to be doing here," he said.

He said that the committee asked, is the ideal definition of the liberal arts what is happening at Williams? "We found that this was not necessarily the case."

Three barriers

Tauber said the committee found that three barriers to a true liberal arts education at Williams are the problems of compartmentalization, passivity and dysfunctional socialization.

Compartmentalization, he said, involves the concept that "Ideas are not allowed to affect your life.... (It means) confusing an education with academics."

"We're not saying that there should be a keg in the classroom, but that there should be non-trivial conversation around the keg." A liberal arts education, he said, is something that "raises fundamental questions that connect academics with life."

According to the report, the passive view of education "involves playing it safe, apathy, and regurgitation, while it discounts risk-taking, passion, and active or creative thought."

Dysfunctional Socialization, according to the report, plays a causal role in the passivity and compartmentalization which Williams students adopt. To study, to initiate non-trivial discussion, to be passionate about intellectual, cultural, or artistic matters, to take academic risks, are all thought to be 'uncool', according to the report.

"Keg culture"

"I now believe that there is a keg culture," Tauber said. "I think we're in a cultural phenomenon. So much reference and so much concern into the initiation of a totem. We are inducting pre-freshmen into a tribe. Alcohol seems to be playing a role on campus. Alcohol is not just a social event. I find that highly problematic."

In order to combat compartmentalization, passivity and dysfunctional socialization, the report said the committee proposed a series of changes in the that explanation to his faculty at their next faculty meeting," she said in a statement to Williams faculty and students.

Before Curtin explained the situation to the faculty, an anonymous teacher notified the local newspaper. "It was somebody who was truly mean and didn't wait for an explanation," Tong said.

At this point, Tong said, she notified college officials. She said Curtin told her he would not lodge a complaint with Williams. The Record was unable to reach Curtin for comment.

"I went to Frank Oakley," Tong said. "He said, 'I thank you for your candor. As far as we can see, the matter is resolved. If the high school is satisfied with your explanation, leave it at that.'"

Goethals conducted a formal investigation, and then issued a formal reprimand, Tong said.

Tong has resigned her position as chair of the faculty Steering Committee. She said she made this decision of her own accord.

Punches not pulled

Over the weekend, many students spent a good deal of time strategically planning the arrangement of the five course choices they had to list on the Winter Study registration form. Common sense about enrollment limits, combined with memories of negative experiences last year (when there were only four choices to list) have taught students that they must carefully arrange the choices or risk getting into none of them.

But did students share information on how to fill out the form? Did they question the system which set up the form? Most importantly, did they consider what, if anything, the process means for their education?

Unfortunately, the answer to all three questions is probably no — they generally did not.

Perhaps more so in matters of curriculum than in other concerns of campus life, students all too often internalize their gripes, fears and doubts. They pull their punches.

A committee of students and faculty members, sponsored by an endowment set up in memory of the late professor Robert Gaudino, has been charged with doing just the opposite. In a report completed in August, the Gaudino Committee shows it is living up to its mandate.

The study is entitled "Report on the Proposals and Activities of the Gaudino Committee and Gaudino Scholar, 1984-1987," and is ostensibly a look into the past. The 83-page report reviews the ideas formulated by the committee over three years, and it details the work of Gaudino Scholar Kurt Tauber, a professor of political science.

But, as the authors also indicate, the report is meant to challenge the college to consider its future: Williams is not doing enough, they write, to achieve the education of the whole person.

The Committee says that broad education in the liberal arts is hindered here by three factors: the "compartmentalization" of students' lives; our "passivity" toward our own educations; and an indoctrination into a social system where self-directed education and an interaction with ideas often are judged undesirable.

The proposals collected under the heading "Changes in the Classroom" form a coherent argument for making self-directed and interdisciplinary education more visible and more accessible. The report urges the faculty to take an active role in informing students about the under-utilized options they have to shape their own educational programs: independent study, the contract major and student-initiated courses.

The Committee offers a number of excellent suggestions beyond the realm of the classroom. We support the call for a campus activities director. We agree that a set of three campus-wide lecture-events could promote greater intellectual discussion. We agree that students who work and study on campus during the summer should be welcomed, and their numbers allowed to grow.

Unfortunately, the report's influence has been limited by its small circulation. Faculty members, administrators and the trustees of the Gaudino endowment have received copies. But so far only a handful of students have read it; perhaps a majority have never heard of it.

We therefore recommend that the Gaudino Committee quickly learn the science of Office Services and art of the Daily Advisor — advertising the fact that copies are available to students who ask for them.

Quotation of the Week

"You have clearly expressed the feeling of a typical Williams student, that it's a waste of time, that a high G.P.A. or a party is more important than to search for God."

WHERE THE PURPLE COWS ROAM

by Rich Gardella

Letters

Tong offers an explanation for lack of attribution

Dear Faculty, Colleagues and Students:

It is with a heavy heart that I write this letter to you. On September 29th, I gave a talk on Allan Bloom's The Closing of the American Mind, a book that I had used during an alumni seminar I taught this past July. Due to an ever-increasing number of personal and professional responsibilities and pressures, I could not find the time to work on the talk until late September. I was forced to rely on some last-minute assistance. Eventually I asked a friend to organize the type-written and hand-written notes I had used during the July seminar, that a third person had transcribed for me from Bloom's book, and that I had taken from all the major reviews. With the dead-line for the talk three days away, I dove into the re-organized tumble of notes and did a very fast cut-and-paste job, adding and subtracting sentences here and there, splicing and dicing in ragged fashion. The friend who had organized my notes then took the cut-and-paste job and typed the paper for me. So harried was I, trying to meet my other responsibilities, that I did not even bother to read through the talk. I skimmed it, deciding that I could read it "cold" since I was so familiar with Bloom's book.

On the day of the talk, I drove the three and a half hours to Greenwich and met the headmaster of the high school who said that everyone had been reading not only Bloom's book but also the reviews. I was pleased the audience was so well-prepared. My talk got off to an awkward start with a quote from a review article. I was so obsessed and embarrassed by the fact that I couldn't remember the reviewer's name, that I fumbled into the next line neglecting to cite the name of the review journal as a "second-best" attribution on my part. By then I was over my cold start. I went through the rest of the talk happy as a lark, quoting Bloom and several of his reviewers here and there and, indeed, more and more "extemping" as I went on.

The next day the headmaster of the high school called and said that several of his faculty members were upset because I had failed to attribute some material to a reviewer that I should have. After a moment of puzzlement, I remembered my awkward start, and told the headmaster that it was first-paragraph jitters and not the will to deceive that had caused me not to attribute what I should have. The headmaster said that he would not be calling me over such a trivial issue. The issue was one of several paragraphs! I was extremely surprised, upset, and at a loss for an explanation. Pressed for time, I told him that I did not know what he was talking about, and that I would get back to him once I had a chance to look into that matter.

Very late that night I pulled out the paper as well as the cut-and-paste job from which it had been typed. After a search, I found a copy of the review in question. Suddenly, I realized what had happened. As a result of my last minute helper's organizational blitz and my hasty cut-and-paste job, sections of a review article became entangled with my own lecture notes (I have a habit of writing out not only my own lectures but also crucial passages from references). Everything that wasn't typed on yellow pieces of paper — and in gathering the material over time, I had not always put full annotations on every sheet of yellow paper. This carelessness on my part caused me to read several paragraphs of a review article as my own. (Not only did these paragraphs look like mine they sounded like mine since they were rehearsing very standard history of philosophy, similar to the one that I had covered at the July seminar).

After I figured out what had happened, I felt miserable not because I had intended to deceive anyone, but because I had presented such a lousy, last minute talk — something I don't do, preferring to stay up all night if that's what it takes to get the job done in the manner that it's supposed to be done. I called the headmaster and told him what had happened. He was satisfied with the explanation and told me that he would give that explanation to his faculty at their next faculty meeting. I offered to give him names, the text, and so on. He refused, saying that was all unnecessary. I also told him that, should he deem it necessary he should feel free to contact Williams College officials since I would be making an appointment to see them. Once again, he declined this offer since he felt that my explanation was a satisfactory one — i.e., one that would assure his faculty that, even though I had

by Mike Caljouw '88

The Democratic presidential field has now fallen to six candidates. The recent withdrawals of Hart, Biden, and Schroeder have finally allowed the candidates to focus on real questions of policy. The Six Dwarves are now beginning to define their candidacies and, with an occasional toss of mud, illustrate their differences. Here is the latest Williamstown line:

Massachusetts Governor Michael Dukakis, the latest to gain dubious distinction front-runner status, was also the latest to be wounded. His campaign chief John Sasso had to be quickly axed after releasing a video showing Joe Biden's penchant for free speech. The loss of Sasso's strategic ability will hurt Dukakis. Yet ratings in Iowa and New Hampshire have remained consistently high. Success in these two early contests could boost Cool Hand Duke going into Super Tuesday. Dukakis, more importantly, has shown some ability to win over Southern Democrats on Super Tuesday. He has played down his liberal past and emphasized his role in managing the "Massachusetts Miracle." While asserting support for traditional Democratic virtues like Social Security, Dukakis has been quick to point out his state's low unemployment rate, the innovative job retraining program, and yearly balanced budgets. This can only broaden Dukakis' future appeal.

Missouri's Representative Richard Gephardt is leading all polls in Iowa. Gephardt has spent considerable time in Iowa working for a decisive victory to propel his campaign into high orbit. Yet

Gephardt has been unwilling to take any political chances beyond his 'take me to the altar of protectionism' creed, insistently echoing strict Democratic doctrine. The Iowa caucus is important (just ask John Glenn) but Gephardt must also establish name recognition in the South. He has shown no ability to distinguish himself from the field. He must beware a New Hampshire early-round KO.

One candidate who has distinguished himself is Senator Al Gore, Jr. from Tennessee. In last week, Gore has distanced himself from every other Democrat on foreign policy and defense. He has supported President Reagan's flagging of tankers in the Persian Gulf and made strenuous calls for a strong national defense. These positions may not reflect Gore's Senate voting record (18 of 20 votes against contra aid) but rather a new attempt to capture rightist Democrats in the South. Gore's planned move to party conservatives could backfire if he fails to survive Iowa and New Hampshire. Gore has given his opponents the opportunity to call attention to the discrepancy between record and rhetoric; Gore's response will determine if he can become a successful national candidate.

The campaign of Arizona former Governor Bruce Babbitt is in the most trouble. Babbitt's troubles began with a poor performance in the first Democratic debate. Since that point, he has yet to achieve any real gains in opinion polls. The stalled campaign is also in financial straits. Babbitt has had to take hefty bank loans in recent weeks which bring his campaign debt to a half million dollars. Babbitt remains in the race but it is

by Dave Kane '88

There are those who do not think that the Marine Corps should be allowed to recruit at Williams. Last spring, Marine advertisements were photocopied, defaced, and then posted. The signs demanded the end of Marine recruiting on campus. Such narrow-mindedness is worrying. It reflects an illiberal tendency to suppress groups because of what they believe. Consider the case at hand:

Self-professed homosexuals cannot join the Marines. Williams, however, does not discriminate against homosexuals. According to the liberals, this means Williams should not allow the Marines to use Baxter for recruiting. For reasons of fairness, philosophy, practicality and logic, the liberals are wrong. The Marines belong at Williams.

Fairness: students like me are interested in what the Marines have to offer. We have as much a right to information on military careers as would-be bankers and social workers have to information concerning their future. To take that away is to infringe upon our rights.

Philosophy: while Williams does not discriminate against homosexuals, it also does not discriminate against people who discriminate against homosexuals. The admissions department does not discriminate against fundamentalist Christians who believe that homosexuality is a sin and who will have nothing to do with homosexuals. The College as an institution disagrees with these beliefs but does not refuse admissions on the basis of this disagreement. In an exact parallel, the College should not refuse a minimum use of its facilities to an organization (the Marines) whose policies it disagrees with while simultaneously allowing other, less objectionable organizations (Merrill Lynch, the Peace Corps) to use those same facilities. The standards for judging acceptable organizations should be the same as for those for judging acceptable students.

Practicality: where do those liberals — who think that the homophobic Marines are too repulsive to be allowed on campus — propose to draw the line? What about prohibiting SMU (no homosexuals) or Jerry Falwell's Liberty Foundation (discriminatory policies unclear) from recruiting on campus? Where is the line and who decides what organizations fall on the acceptable side of that line? My answer is that any organization that appeals even slightly to any Williams student is acceptable. If the Marine-bashing liberals have a better answer, now is the time to give it.

Also, remember that the Marines have reasons for discriminating against homosexuals. Note, however, that these reasons have nothing to do with an individual homosexual's skill at firing a rifle or taking a beachhead. I see no evidence that sexual orientation is correlated with those attributes that make for a good Marine. Despite this, however, most Marines — like many Americans — remain strongly anti-homosexual. I know this from having spent ten weeks at Marine Corps Officer Candidate School. This experience leads me to believe that placing a homosexual into a Marine platoon would destroy the fighting efficiency of that unit. Marines, like everyone else, do not work well with people they dislike, no matter how irrational the reasons for that loathing may be.

My answer is that any organization that appeals even slightly to any Williams student is acceptable.

difficult to predict any kind of success for a campaign that has yet to get off the ground.

Senator Paul Simon of Illinois has surprised all analysts with his success to date. Standing on a very liberal platform, Simon has steadily climbed the polls in Iowa and New Hampshire. Aided by his characteristic bow tie and his less-than-good looks, Simon has carefully cultivated an image of a candidate concerned with policy and not image. He claims, "If you want a slick, packaged product, I'm not your candidate. If you want someone...you can trust, I'm your candidate." His strategy revolves around basic Democratic issues which cater to the lower-middle class, poor, and old-time unreconstructed liberals. This approach has worked in economically troubled Iowa. Yet the questions remain. More importantly, can he shed the image of other traditional Democrats who have lost? Simon definitely does not want to be another addition to the Mondale-McGovern graveyard of liberal dinosaurs.

The wild card in the whole political contest remains the Reverend Jesse Jackson. Jackson has conducted an extremely well-run campaign thus far. Attempts to woo labor groups and build a broad-based coalition of all minorities have been fairly successful. His debate performances have been strong. Most importantly, the Southern Democratic strategy for aligning primaries to form Super Tuesday and assert their conservative agenda may play right into Jackson's hands. Jackson has molded a strong political organization in the South. The campaign's ability to mobilize Southern minorities could give Jackson an enormous Super Tuesday victory.

Meanwhile, in the wings, Mario Cuomo awaits.

The logical place to demonstrate is Capitol Hill, not Baxter Hall.

Any one of the reasons should be sufficient, but the most important point is that Williams College, the WBSU, and the Marines discriminate against white professors, against white students, and against homosexuals, respectively. They each do so for a reason, namely to increase the diversity of Williams, to give black students a place and organization away from the white mainstream, and to maintain present standards of battle readiness. The cases are analogous. If discrimination is absolutely wrong, then it is wrong in all three cases.

In fact, if anyone has cause for complaint, the Marines do. Why should they suffer their deserved reputation as a completely color-blind organization by recruiting at a College that, for whatever praiseworthy reasons, practices reverse discrimination? A question worth pondering.

FRS to be assessed

The Freshman Residential Seminars (FRS) experiment will conclude at the end of this academic year, and its evaluation committee is accumulating data and impressions in order to appraise the success of the two-year experiment.

College President Francis Oakley appointed the committee last fall. The committee is chaired by Dean of the College Stephen Fix, and its members are David Booth, Vice Provost of the College; Suzanne Graver, assistant professor of English; Thomas Parker, associate director of admissions; and Kenneth April '88.

The group will look at "the degree to which the program meets its stated goal," according to Parker, who added that the goal of FRS is to alter the current practice of encapsulating intellectual life into the classroom setting.

Fix said that the group will be looking for "the long-term impact on the way students looked at their education."

He said that committee members attended special dinners of the FRS faculty and students approximately every six weeks during the previous school year, and will continue to do so this year.

Booth said that although the committee has not yet met formally, it has collected essays from last year's FRS students on how the program helped them in their first year at Williams. He will be analyzing the results of those essays. The committee will also consider the course evaluations filled out by the FRS students as well as the opinions of the FRS professors.

Fix added that all committee members have been in close touch with the program and that individual members have chosen to sit in on several classes, although the committee will not be doing that as a group.

Because it was designed as a two-year experiment to be followed by a formal evaluation to be presented to the faculty, there will be no FRS next year. Fix said the committee will be making a recommendation to change, continue, or eliminate the program, but that the recommendation may come as late as next fall.

When asked about the program's success so far, Fix would not offer an interim report, but did say "it is an interesting experiment." Parker said he is very pleased with how the program has been going and hopes it will continue in the future.

WBGLU marches in D.C.

Forty-one Williams students, five faculty members and some alumni marched in Washington D.C. last Sunday for gay and lesbian civil rights.

A special committee comprised of members of the National Gay/Lesbian Task Force, the National Organization for Women and other smaller organizations has worked for the past year and a half to organize the six-day event, according to Katie Kent '88.

The event included two days of lobbying, a memorial service Sunday morning for people who have died from AIDS and a march and rally on Sunday. Participants planned to occupy the Supreme Court today to protest the nomination of Judge Robert Bork to the Supreme Court. The slogan for the march is: "For love and for life, we're not going back."

The flyer sent out by the March on Washington committee presented the following demands: the passage of a congressional lesbian and gay rights bill, an end to discrimination against people with AIDS and those perceived to have it, money for AIDS instead of for defense spending, repeal of all laws that make sodomy between consenting adults a crime, a Presidential order banning anti-gay discrimination by the federal government, legal recognition of lesbian and gay relationships, reproductive freedom, an end to racism in this country and apartheid in South Africa.

The New York Times reported last week that the march organizers were expecting an estimated half-million participants.

Some of the Williams alumni attending the march were members of the gay/lesbian alumni association formed last spring.

Council allots more $

College Council unanimously approved 12 late budget requests, including one for a new literary magazine, at its meeting Thursday.

The requests, from groups including the Christian Fellowship, the International Club and the Williams College Jewish Association, were submitted to council Treasurer Mark Raisbeck '88 after the original budget had been printed.

Debate on the additional requests was limited, except on the issue of Route Two, a new literary magazine. The magazine requested $3,356 for printing and publicity costs. The council finance committee recommended an allocation of $1,688, which was approved after some discussion. Several council members expressed concern about whether or not the campus makes use of the two literary magazines already available.

The debate sparked discussion on the much broader issue of the college council budget system. Some fear about the ease of obtaining money from the council was voiced.

On the subject of opening a 24-hour study room, council President Carter Zinn '88 reported that, "the idea has generated a lot of talk. Many people have come up and talked to me (about the study hall)." Baxter, Jesup and Griffin halls were suggested as possible locations.

Several other topics were brought up for consideration, including campus lighting, the promotion of women's athletic teams and access to summer storage areas. Zinn mentioned that the Daily Advisor, which the Council publishes, has been late several times and that steps to correct the problem were being taken.

Accreditation team visits

Despite the snow at the beginning of last week, the members of the reaccreditation team arrived by Monday. Only three of the seven members were able to arrive by Sunday night as had been scheduled.

During their three-day stay, the team members met with an estimated 80 people in a total of 16 formal meetings, according to Dean of the College Stephen Fix.

Aaron Lemonick, Princeton's dean of faculty, chaired the team, which included Barbara Bryan, a librarian from Fairfield University; Francis DeToma, a professor at Mount Holyoke; Katharine Hall, the registrar at Brown; Frank Laycock, a professor at Oberlin; Natalie Marshall, vice-president at Vassar; and Robert O'Meally, a professor at Wesleyan.

Lemonick, who decided with whom the team would meet, said he felt that the team had met with a wide sample of the Williams community, including the chairs of the focus committees, junior and senior faculty, administrators and students.

Five students, two professors and one administrator attended an open meeting held last Monday afternoon as an opportunity for members of the Williams community to voice concerns about Williams to the visiting team.

"I was surprised that there were so few people," Lemonick said. "People either didn't know about it or just aren't that discontent."

The meeting was announced in the Weekly Calendar and the Daily Advisor. Fix also sent a letter to all members of the Williams community dated September 21, but the mailroom has no record of that letter being distributed.

Before leaving Wednesday, the team gave President Francis Oakley a preliminary report of their evaluation. Lemonick said the exit interview would give Oakley an idea of what to expect in the final report and would give him a chance to correct any factual errors in the report.

"If we found that one of your buildings was falling down, we'd say, 'One of your buildings is falling down,'" Lemonick said. "Then we'd shake hands with him and go home."

Lemonick said he will write a draft of the evaluation by mid-November and send it to the team members and to the college. In December, he and Oakley will appear before the Commission on Institutions of Higher Education of the New England Association of Schools and Colleges.

THE WILLIAMS RECORD

Graduate life at an undergraduate college

by Daniel Drezner

For many Williams students, lunch frequently consists of waiting in line at Baxter for 15 minutes and then eating quickly in order to get to class. There are other students, however, for whom lunch is a completely different affair. It starts when a little bell is rung. Then 16 students file into the kitchen, serve themselves and eat in a meeting room filled with posters of places like Pakistan and Malaysia.

A secret eating club at Williams? Not quite. These diners are graduate students at the college's Center for Development Economics (CDE), the intensive one-year masters degree program. The program, which began in 1960, enrolls 15 to 25 fellows, ranging in age from 25 to 40, from underdeveloped nations in Asia, Africa and South America.

'B' average

Fellows must take four required courses during the first semester; during the second semester they take two courses and a research seminar, and they write a thesis. A 'B' average is required to obtain a Master of Arts degree in Development Economics.

Most of the fellows live in the C.D.E. building, a former fraternity house located at the corner of Route 7 and South Street. It contains a dormitory, kitchen, dining room, classrooms and administrative offices. Married students occasionally live off-campus.

Bangladesh and Botswana

The 16 Fellows in the Class of 1988 come from places as diverse as Ecuador, Bangladesh, Botswana and the Philippines. All of them have worked in their respective governments on problems of economic development. For some, this is the first time that they have been in the United States for an extended period of time.

As can be expected, there are a few differences between C.D.E. fellows and Williams undergraduates. "Undergraduates have stronger preparation, because they are still in school, while the fellows have been out of school for five to ten years," said economics professor David Ross, the C.D.E. Research Director. "These people have been out of school for several years, and have risen to authority... In their own countries, and are being groomed for top positions by coming here," said Ross.

These years out of school do affect the fellows' behavior in the classroom. "The fellows often have a more direct appreciation for what they are learning (than undergraduates). On the other hand, they will reject out of hand what they do not accept," said Ross.

Language barrier

The language barrier is also a problem. Sandra Egues-Ponce, a fellow from Ecuador, said, "There is a lot of work, and it is doubled because English is not my native language." This is true for most of the fellows.

Culturally, there are some obvious contrasts between the fellows and the undergraduates. For example, Egues-Ponce had never seen snow before last week's storm. "When I looked out of the window, I thought it was great. Then I tried walking outside."

The current N.F.L. players strike also proved something of a mystery to the fellows. When squirrels well," said Michael McDougall '88, "when caught in a logical inconsistency he is good at getting out of the inconsistency by walking out of the subject or using dubious logic."

"I can't agree ultimately with the kinds of things he's saying," Phillip Culhane '88 said. "But I think it's an honest effort to address concerns. He does, to some extent, try and sidestep questions. I think he has a pretty strong agenda that he tries not to waver from."

"He has a microphone and no one else does," said listener Russell Werkman '89, "so obviously he is going to be heard. I'm impressed that this many people sit down and listen to him."

Over the next five weeks, the Christian Fellowship will be holding informal discussions to address what was said.

Knechtle spoke at the University of New Hampshire the week before he came here. Next, he will be speaking on Wall Street in New York City. Rigby said the Christian Fellowship is hoping to have him back next fall.

Brown

The dean of freshmen and sophomores at Brown University was arrested and charged with "open lewd and lascivious behavior" on Tuesday, Sept. 15. The Massachusetts State Police stated that Bruce Donovan, a 1959 Brown graduate, "solicited an undercover male police officer in a rest area where homosexuals hang out." Although Donovan is currently on an indefinite leave of absence from the University, the faculty and the student body have expressed support for his return. Donovan, who has received the senior citation award (given by the graduating class in appreciation of a faculty member) for the past four years, has been placed on one year probation by the Middleborough District Court.

Wesleyan

A female student at Wesleyan University managed to single-handedly restrain a thief who was trying to escape. Jennifer Rush '90, upon seeing a strange man wearing an Amherst sweatshirt coming out of her room with one of her sweaters stuffed in his shirt, grabbed and pinned him against a wall. While successfully preventing him from escaping, she yelled for someone to call Public Safety. When the man tried to struggle free from her grasp by fighting back, she unbuckled his pants and grabbed his penis in order to restrain him. When Public Safety arrived five minutes later, the intruder was handed over to the officers. Witnesses described the man as about 5' 7" and "not very intimidating." Some said that he seemed to be under the influence of drugs and was very slow in movement.

UVM

The University of Vermont's weekly student newspaper, The Vermont Cynic distributed 5000 condoms as part of a "safe sex" package in its Oct. 1 issue. The New York Times reported that the issue disappeared quickly on campus, as students grabbed five to ten free copies each. The newspaper purchased the condoms with the blessing of the university administration after an unsuccessful search for a corporate sponsor. "This is great," said senior Will Zorn.

"It's excellent to bring up the issue of Christianity in this institution since so often people consider themselves so intellectual that they don't even consider Christianity. This is the epitome of liberal arts — to consider the possibility of God." — Bill White '90

"He has a right to be here, but I find it difficult to listen to him because I fear the kind of thought he represents. I think he is going to cement people's bad feelings about Christianity. I think it's bad that someone is making the kinds of judgments that he is making." — Katie Kent '88

"I'm amazed with his rock-solid idealism. He is especially interesting because he's never wrong. People could fire at him for hours and his own ideas would never buckle." — Nick Loizeau '91

"I do agree with him that most of the people on this campus are apathetic towards religion in general and don't set aside enough time for God. They try to justify their own beliefs without trying to understand what the bible really says." — Rod Cunningham '88

Flux festival presents art form's finest

by Travis Pierson

Williamstown is currently in a state of flux.

The town is in the midst of a "fluxfestival" featuring "flux-exhibitions" and "fluxartists" performing "fluxpieces" in "fluxconcerts" — all of which are part of the events surrounding "Fluxus: 25 years," an exhibition opening November 6 at the Williams College Museum of Art. The Fluxus celebration began Friday and Saturday with two concerts at the Clark Art Institute.

It is difficult to place a firm label on the entity known as Fluxus, which originally developed in the 1960s. Its artists, who work both as performance artists and traditional makers of static objects, refuse to classify it as a movement or style, reasoning that Fluxus never had a prescriptive program or specific goal, as did 20th century movements such as Dada, futurism, and surrealism. Most agree, however, that there are more than a few characteristics necessary for a work to be considered Fluxus.

tion to the art/life dichotomy, minimalism, impatience, inter-media, ephemerality, playfulness, and specificity are all important to a fully-developed Fluxus work. These criteria, which were presented by Clark Visiting Professor of Art Dick Higgins in his 1987 essay Fluxus: theory and reception, may not all be present in any one fluxwork, but the more that are included in a single work, the closer that work is to the heart of Fluxus.

The performances which took place at the Clark Art Institute provided a sampler of both old and new works by noted Fluxus

Sankai Juku masters movement in concert

by Heidi Zimmerman

The internationally-acclaimed Japanese dance/theater group Sankai Juku performed "Kinkan Shonen," (The Kinkan Seed), subtitled "A Young Boy's Dream of the Origins of Life and Death" last Tuesday night to a full house at the Adams Memorial Theater.

The performance was powerful and complex, and yet the emotions it communicated are necessarily basic and common to all people. The music that accompanied the performance reflected the complex yet basic character of the performance, ranging from Jimi Hendrix and Miles Davis to Irish bagpipe music.

The group leader Ushio Amagatsu's choreographing of the piece is based on the Butoh dance technique which empha-zizes the distinction between relaxation and tension. In Butoh, dance is as much a mental exercise as it is a physical one. The dancers must be subconsciously aware not only of one another, but also of the empty space around them. This consciousness allows them to perform and interact without relying on sight.

The performance empowered the most simple movements with a captivating energy. The straightening of a single finger from a tense, claw-like position had an elemental magnificence, and even the simple act of breathing had beauty.

Hiroshima

The opening piece seemed to depict a scene from the atomic holocaust at Hiroshima. Four masked figures began undulating as the panicky cry of sirens

Flux II

Similar to Friday's performance, Saturday's fluxconcert began with a lengthy modern work, in this case Knowles' North water song, before moving into primarily older and shorter works. Subtitled "for John Cage on his 75th Birthday," North water song feafaded and a young Japanese schoolboy disappeared off-stage. The masks appeared to represent people's faces that had melted as a result of the blast.

The movements of the dancers and the sensuality and rhythm of their bodies directly contrasted with the symbolic horror of their faceless heads.

A live peacock appeared in the second scene and added an element of chance to the performance. However, since it was in its molting stage at the time of the performance, the full effect of the bird's splendid plumage was missing. In a typical performance, Amagatsu whips the peacock from the crook of his arm to his shoulder, and the bird responds by spreading its tail feathers and wrapping its wings around his head.

The next dance group scheduled to perform is the Jane Comfort Dance Company, which will be in residence at Williams and at Bennington College from October 18-23. Comfort's style is unique in its combination of language and movement; Jennifer Dunning of the New York Times described Comfort as "a postmodernist pioneer in the use of verbal material in dance." Besides offering several workshops to both dancers and writers, Comfort's group will appear at Lasell Gymnasium October 22.

tured Knowles at a microphone, alternating between speaking very free verse and creating sounds from beans, baskets, paper, and other objects. Concurrent with this, two white-clothed assistants hung light-permeable objects such as thin branches, cellophane, and objects with holes cut in them on a metal screen placed in front of projected slides, which were continuously focused and unfocused.

The piece successfully worked as multi-sensory poetry by appealing to all of the senses: sight, sound, smell, touch, and even taste. The latter two of these senses were aroused by the slides of fruit and textural objects and by Knowles' almost tangible sound effects.

Following Knowles' work were Dick Higgins' pieces, which, reflecting his background in both music and English, explored the musicality of words. Particularly effective were the excerpts from his Constellations, in which Higgins, acting as a conductor, instructed the performers to say a word while his arms moved through a formation. He then performed several variations on the original piece, asking the players, and then the audience, to make different sounds in response to his lead.

Completing Saturday's performance were three pieces by Yasunao Tone. Particularly outstanding was his Molecular music, an assemblage of projected Chinese text and photographs of China combined with changing sonic tones. The technology and duration involved in this piece, which was written during 1982-1986, contrasted with Tone's simpler Clapping piece from 1963, in which the performers, in response to Tone's conducting, did exactly what was expected of them.

New Flux

Fluxus has changed over the last 20 years, and as the world has grown less straight-forward and more complex, so has the art which effectively reflects and affects it. Modern Fluxus has gained an emotional depth which is intensely contemporary, personal and ethereal.

Burns criticizes flaws in Presidential elections

by Jocelyn Shadforth

"We need to go back to a day when conventions were the decisive decision-making institution within the parties. It is a good system for choosing leadership," James MacGregor Burns said to a standing-room-only audience attending his lecture "A Heliuva Way to Elect A President: The Democrats, The Political Process and You," last Monday night.

Burns, a Pulitzer-Prize winning political historian and former candidate for the House of Representatives, is a Woodrow Wilson Professor of Government Emeritus at Williams College.

A former delegate to four Democratic National Conventions, Burns expressed his concern over the current Presidential selection process and the media's emphasis on personality and scandal which serve to trivialize the election and the candidates. "It is a kind of tragic and terrible way to deal with a group of able and competent people going through a terrible time," he said.

Burns called for a change in the current primary process which begins two years before the general election and is overwhelmed by excessive media coverage.

"I think back to how many of the great leaders of this country we would have lost if the media had treated candidates then as they do today." Burns also stated that, relative to other Western democracies, "The primary process in the United States tends to be the most exploitative, the most irrational, the most personal and the most trivial."

While he acknowledged the inevitability of a certain level of exaggeration, Burns said that the fundamental question remains whether or not the informed public would demand a consistent standard of accuracy in political media coverage. He also stated that an election "becomes a personality

DID YOU KNOW

There is a way to obtain a commission as a Marine Officer other than through ROTC called the Platoon Leaders Class (PLC).

The PLC program does not interrupt your academic career.

The PLC program is open to all qualified underclassmen.

The PLC program requires no special classes, uniforms or drills on campus.

The PLC program is totally voluntary with no commitment to full-time active duty unless you want it.

If qualified you can be guaranteed flight training as a Marine Officer.

Your starting salary as a Marine officer could be between $18,000 and $23,000 depending on when you enter the program.

If you would like more information about the PLC program, please contact the Marine Corps Officer Selection Office.

been careless, I had not been deceitful. Anyway, he added, it was clear to him, as well as to many others, that the preponderance of my talk had been entirely original.

I felt relieved, but I still knew, that for my own peace of mind, I had to give the relevant authorities here an account of what had happened at the high school. After all, I couldn't be certain how the headmaster's faculty was going to react to my explanation. As it turned out, before the headmaster could get the explanation to his faculty, an anonymous member of his faculty took matters into his/her own hands and reported "an incident" to the local paper in Greenwich. As soon as this happened, the headmaster of the high school called me to express his apologies and regret. I told him not to worry—that what I was worried about was his faculty's reaction to my explanation. Eventually, the headmaster did give my explanation to his faculty. The headmaster then called to tell me that with the exception of a few people, the majority of the faculty were satisfied with the explanation, expressing their regrets to me about the undue publicity which some of them deemed as "unfortunate" and others described as "unfair." The headmaster then told me that, as far as he was concerned the issue was resolved. I told him that I would be writing a formal apology to his faculty.

Despite the fact that no complaint was lodged with the College against me, I decided to be totally open with the relevant authorities at Williams College. I knew that whatever I was not guilty of, I had certainly not served the College well by embarrassing it in the way I had. My carelessness had imperiled not only my own reputation but that of the College. After all, wherever I go the label "Williams professor" also goes. After informally talking the matter over with me, the Dean of the Faculty concluded that he would have to conduct an official review of the matter. I voluntarily gave the Dean the name and documentation he needed to conduct his review. As a result of this review, which from my point of view was most exhaustive and probing, the Dean reprimanded me. Although it is within my right to present a case against the imposition of this reprimand, a black spot on what has up to this time been an exemplary record, I decline to do so. I accept the reprimand.

Why do I accept this reprimand? I accept it because this College prides itself on its excellence, and I acted in a less-than-excellent manner. To be certain, there are explanations for why I acted in such a careless manner. Most of these explanations have to do with my tendency to overcommit myself. What I have learned from this episode is that overcommitment is as much of a vice as undercommitment (remember Aristotle?). I tried to do too much for too many people and wound up disappointing the people who mean the most to me: my family and the Williams community (from the President right down to the youngest freshman). All I can offer you are my heartfelt apologues for being less than everything I should have been and my promise to never do less than my very best in the future. Finally, I am resigning as Chair of the Faculty Steering Committee. This is a decision that I have made of my own accord. To be Chair of the Committee is to be accorded an honor by one's colleagues. In my opinion, a reprimanded member of the Faculty does not merit such an honor. I will, however, continue to discharge my other duties with my customary energy.

Respectfully,
Rosemarie Tong

contest because they don't have a lot to debate."

Burns suggested specific changes, including the selection of presidential and vice-presidential candidates by the party leadership present at the national convention. He also advocated increased participation on the part of individuals at the local level, particularly since local grassroots politics is experiencing a significant decline in many communities.

Speaking about the levels of political participation, Burns expressed particular concern about voter turnout, and spoke of the need for a self-selecting process in political behavior.

"Any representative process is going to be faulty. But, it's not only the media that makes primaries faulty," he said. "The media only exacerbates the problem... People who don't vote, it's not because they don't have a car or because they're ill. It's because they don't give a damn."

The lecture was sponsored by the Political Science Department and the Williams College Young Democrats.

Tauber said that the proposals are minor.

"We are not asking for very much.... We know Williams is very conservative.... We've been pulling our punches. The things we propose are at most evolutionary, in no sense revolutionary."

The major committee proposals included the Freshman

Tauber said he tried to carry out the narrower aspect of the legacy by teaching two experiential courses: Williams in Williamstown (Fall 1984) and Social Service, Social Change (Fall 1985).

"The theory behind it (experiential learning) is a form of estrangement. Gaudino's theory was that the shock of confrontation opens you up to new ideas and perceptions."

But Tauber said the programs its deteriorating into show and tell.

Tauber said there will be a meeting of the Trustees of the Gaudino Memorial Fund in New York City on November 7. He said he will raise the issue of whether the Gaudino Scholar should be appointed annually. The President of the College appoints the Gaudino Scholar, but Tauber said the wishes of the Gaudino Board of Trustees probably carry considerable weight.

The chairman of the Gaudino Trustees, Jeff Thaler '74, participated in "Williams-at-home", an experiential learning program run by Gaudino. "I've stayed with the Gaudino fund, because I still am convinced that there's a place for experiential learning programs at Williams, and a need for it," he said.

A shared vision

"Both Kurt Tauber and Bob Gaudino have shown that it's not just what you're thinking but how you're thinking, and you have to live your life as an example for your students," Thaler said.

"I now believe that there is a keg culture. I think we're in a cultural phenomenon."

The newest member of the Gaudino Trustees, Ed Stein '87, said Tauber and Gaudino differed in political viewpoints, but shared the same passion for teaching and challenging students.

"I used to get calls at 1:00 a.m. from Kurt saying, 'I was thinking about what went on at the meeting.'" Stein said. "He really cares a lot about these issues, puts a great deal of thought and effort into it."

Tauber's commitment to fulfilling the Gaudino legacy was commented on by two people who knew Gaudino.

Baker said Tauber's dedication to the Gaudino legacy helped it flourish and influence people who never knew Gaudino. "I'm eternally grateful to Kurt. He's been absolutely essential from the beginning in keeping the ideas alive—that's his essential accomplishment. Within the legacy there are things that we fight about."

College President Francis Oakley said the very nature of the Gaudino Scholar would be uncomfortable for Gaudino. "The last thing Bob Gaudino would be sympathetic with would be some attempt to fossilize his insights," Oakley said. "He changed his mind across time. He would probably find (some of these things) rather comic."

"Obviously Gaudino was a very valuable colleague to Kurt," Stein said. "Gaudino's legacy did shape Kurt's thinking about these issues. I know he's not going to stop thinking about the Gaudino issues."

The President of the College appoints the Gaudino Scholar, but Tauber said the wishes of the Gaudino Board of Trustees probably carry considerable weight.

The chairman of the Gaudino Trustees, Jeff Thaler '74, participated in "Williams-at-home", an experiential learning program run by Gaudino. "I've stayed with the Gaudino fund, because I still am convinced that there's a place for experiential learning programs at Williams, and a need for it," he said.

A shared vision
"Both Kurt Tauber and Bob Gaudino have shown that it's not just what you're thinking but how you're thinking, and you have to live your life as an example for your students," Thaler said.

"I now believe that there is a keg culture. I think we're in a cultural phenomenon."

The newest member of the Gaudino Trustees, Ed Stein '87, said Tauber and Gaudino differed in political viewpoints, but shared the same passion for teaching and challenging students.

"I used to get calls at 1:00 a.m. from Kurt saying, 'I was thinking about what went on at the meeting,'" Stein said. "He really cares a lot about these issues, puts a great deal of thought and effort into it."

Tauber's commitment to fulfilling the Gaudino legacy was commented on by two people who knew Gaudino.

Baker said Tauber's dedication to the Gaudino legacy helped it flourish and influence people who never knew Gaudino. "I'm eternally grateful to Kurt. He's been absolutely essential from the beginning in keeping the ideas alive — that's his essential accomplishment. Within the legacy there are things that we fight about."

College President Francis Oakley said the very nature of the Gaudino Scholar would be uncomfortable for Gaudino. "The last thing Bob Gaudino would be sympathetic with would be some attempt to fossilize his insights," Oakley said. "He changed his mind across time. He would probably find (some of these things) rather comic."

"Obviously Gaudino was a very valuable colleague to Kurt," Stein said. "Gaudino's legacy did shape Kurt's thinking about these issues. I know he's not going to stop thinking about the Gaudino issues."

The Williams-Mystic Program offers a half-day opportunity to see the historic seaport of Mystic, Connecticut, and its surrounding maritime collection and library. Well equipped museum, laboratory, and diverse coastal environment. You take four 90-minute lectures, courses on history, literature, and geography on maritime culture and marine policy. You can also develop your maritime skills under the guidance of instruction on building, boat building, navigation, sailing, and celestial navigation. You spend ten days at the museum, on board a schooner, and taking in the sights and sounds of the historic seaport. The program is a unique opportunity to see the maritime world in a new way, and the opportunity to see the maritime world in a new way.

Male runners win at Trinity

by Dave Nadelman

On this past picture-perfect Friday at Trinity College, everything finally came together for the men's cross country team, as it soundly defeated Trinity, North Adams State, and R.P.I. The final score was Williams 32, Trinity 43, R.P.I. 56, and NASC 117.

Due to a special loop in the course, the lead runners had to cross the path of the slower runners in the race, causing a collision between co-captain Ted Arrowsmith '88 and a NASC runner. However, this did not slow the veteran down, as he finished second overall (first for the Ephs) in a time of 26:22.

Close behind in fifth place was junior Gil McCabe, who had his strongest race of the season. The rest of Williams' front pack consisted of Dylan Cooper '91 in sixth place, and co-captain Dave Glendon '88 in eighth.

Two more pleasing performances were soon to follow as freshman Evan Driscoll and Mac Hines '88 finished 11th and 12th respectively. Driscoll had been bothered by a knee injury all season. Consequently, this was his first varsity race. Coach Peter Farwell was very happy noting that performances such as his and Dylan Cooper's bode well for the future of the team. Farwell was equally happy with Hines, who ran one of the best races of his career.

Rounding out the varsity were Steve Brody '90, and John Tuxill '90, who finished 13th and 14th respectively. Farwell recalled that Tuxill, the team's eighth highest finisher, completed the race ahead of R.P.I.'s fourth man. This led him to express his general confidence in the team when he said, "Hell, if we had our top twelve guys here, they all would have finished ahead of R.P.I.'s fourth man."

To distant Maine travelled the balance of the WRFC, where the Band C teams were to challenge the top two sides that Bates College could field. Because of an information blackout ordered by the Bates Athletic Office, the wire services have been prevented from providing details of the matches, precluding their publication here.

Reliable sources, however, allow that the Bates first fifteen, traditionally a New England rugby standout, quelled the rebellious Williams B's. Better news has travelled the grapevine concerning the success of the C-men, who are said to have triumphed 14-11, paced by tries from Scott Brown '90 and Matt Conlin '91.

Rumors of laud and praise continue to circulate, immortalizing the defensive efforts of sophomores Alton Goldstick and Dan Foote, as well as the all-around battle hard play of J. Chapman Peterson '90.

The WRFC continues on the road to Amherst at home next week against Yale.

charging Ephs, 15-4, 15-5. Coach Nancy Roberts described the team's fine performance, saying they "had shown an awful lot of character up to this point. Throughout the day, we began our matches by losing the first few points, and then all of a sudden we'd wake up. Once this happened I could see the team move full force ahead."

Bantams spiked

And move ahead they did, rolling over Trinity in the championship match, 15-9, 15-10.

Hosting powerhouse Springfield in Lasell on Tuesday for a three out of five game match, the team put its six-game winning streak on the line. Springfield came out strong, but the excellent net play of tri-captain

Laura Wefing '88 and Laurie Hartsoe '91 made it a close game, an 11-15 loss. Surprising Springfield in the second game, the Ephs won 15-10 behind the superior serving of Shelly Whelpton '90.

The strong comeback did not last long into the third game, however, as Springfield won 15-7. The fourth and final game was a real fight, as hard hitting by senior tri-captain Jenny Aulse and Kathy McConnell '90 kept Springfield off balance. However, Springfield ultimately triumphed 15-12.

Despite the loss this week, the squad brings an impressive 13-4 record into the rest of its games, all of which are at home. Today, features a tri-match with Union and North Adams in Lasell, and Saturday will be the first official athletic contest held in the new Chandler Gym, the Little Three tournament with the Cardinals and Jeffs.

Field Hockey

Falling to a powerful and talented Trinity team in Hartford on Saturday, the field hockey team saw its record drop to 6-1 after a 3-1 win over Middlebury earlier in the week. The 4-1 loss to the Bantams marked the most shots and goals an opponent has mustered against the Ephs in all years. The Trinity attack was a persistent one, constantly keeping the ball in Williams' territory much of the game.

The lone goal scored by Williams was tallied by sophomore Kristin Frederickson at 18:28 off an assist from co-captain Lisa Tenerowicz '88. Meanwhile, the Bantams peppered Eph netminder Wynn Hohlt '89 with a barrage of shots, four of which found their way past the goalie, who throughout the season has done an excellent job of keeping opponent's shots out of the net.

Prior to the loss to Trinity, which has now won an astounding 30 games in a row, the squad beat Middlebury after taking the bus ride up Route 7. The 3-1 victory was the result of goals by McNulty, Mo Flaherty '90, and Tenerowicz. McNulty's tally came midway through the first half, and Flaherty's followed shortly thereafter. The Tenerowicz goal was off a penalty stroke, and put the Ephs up 3-0. The Panthers connected early in the second half to round out the scoring.

This week, the team will host Union on Thursday at 4:00. The game with the Dutchmen will serve as the prelude towards the Little Three Championship showdown with Amherst on Saturday. The Ephs will be defending their title.

W. X-Country

Even with four of its top seven runners sitting out of the race, the women's cross-country team placed a strong second out of five teams at the Mt. Holyoke Invitational on Saturday. The final scoring was as follows: Smith, first with 27 points, followed by Williams with 60, Mt. Holyoke with 70, and Trinity and Amherst with 96 each.

Leading the Ephpack was Ann Dannhauer '90, who finished sixth out of a field of 68 runners with a time of 19:45. The remainder of the Williams top seven were Ingrid Weisel '90, eighth overall, Stacey Smith '90, 13th, Jen Garrett '89, 15th, Susan Gray '90, 18th, and juniors Jen Morris and Gillian Ladd, who placed 22nd and 35th respectively.

Coach Larry Bell expressed his satisfaction with the team's performance, noting that, "runners like Stacey (Smith), who usually rank in the top 8-12 on the team, demonstrated remarkable improvement, allowing us to stay the same distance ahead of Holyoke that we were in the last week, even though we were missing four of our top seven this time." Bell rotates the runners so that at no race, excepting the NESAC's, will all the top seven compete. This system gives the runners a chance to rest.

The team is optimistic about its real test, the NESAC competition, to be held at Tufts this coming weekend. Captain Sarah Pierce '88, Sarah Hams '89, Anne Platt '91, Ann Dannhauer '90, Ingrid Weisel '90, Jen Garrett '89, and Cathy Cocks '89 will be competing in the race. If the team can avoid injury, as it has thus far, it has the potential to place very strongly.

Tennis

The women's tennis team played two strong matches this week, but came away with just one win and a 4-4 record. The team beat Trinity by a 6-3 score with healthy number one seed

Amy Davidson back in form on Saturday, and lost to Middlebury on Wednesday 5-4 after splitting the singles portion of the match.

The Middlebury contest was still in doubt as the two teams began doubles play. The Ephs had taken the lower three spots on the singles ladder in straight sets, while dropping numbers one through three. Amy Davidson played for the first time in two weeks, but was hampered by the groin injury she has struggled with all season, and lost at number one.

Katherine Stearns and Lisa Brayton, both freshmen, won at numbers four and six, respectively, and Missy Crouchley defeated her number five opponent, 6-2, 7-5. Crouchley came back from a 5-2 deficit in the second set to win five straight games, using an aggressive net attack. Crouchley said, "I just settled down and made fewer mistakes, and that was the key."

With the score tied 3-3, the Ephs dropped the number two and three doubles positions and continued a season-long pattern of doubles losses. Davidson's injury has been a major factor in this area. With Davidson back, the lineup should stabilize, according to team captain Anne Shulman.

Against Trinity the Ephs won five out of the six singles matches and again dropped two doubles contests at number two and three. Davidson won at number one singles by a 6-4, 6-0 score, and teamed with Missy Crouchley in a number one doubles victory. Mary Montgomery won a tough match at number three singles.

The team hosts a perennially weak Union squad on Thursday at 4:00 and a strong Amherst team on Saturday at 11:00.

Male ruggers trounce Berkshire Club

by Andy Harris

Powered by frothy play from the line and indomitable execution from the pack, the men's A-side ruggers rebounded from last week's loss to Middlebury with a 32-0 drubbing of the Berkshire Men's Rugby Club in Pittsfield on Saturday.

The A-side brought with them not only re-invigorated rugby, but also the sense that they had something to recoup after last week. On the wheels of winger Andy Harris '88, who broke free with nifty jaunts of ten and thirty meters, the ravenous Dawgs snatched an early 10-0 lead.

But the Williams third score was a marvel, the sort from which myths burgeon — the stuff that inspires epic poems and the songs of wandering bards. Taking the kickoff from the Berkshire scrum-half, the roguish White pack quickly surrendered the ball to the waiting line.

With precision passing, the band that would have colored the pages of the Aeneid had rugby been played in Virgil's Troy, frolicked down the field, dishing the ball first outside and then inside, until Captain Michael Sullivan '88 waltzed across the line of try with grace that defies description. Sullivan, seemingly smitten by the erstwhile success of senior line-mate Harris, was to respond with two more tries, allowing him a hat-trick for the game. William Mead '88, known in the past for his unrelenting barages of vocal enthusiasm and his wily and gulleful play from his prop position, rounded out the Williams scoring as he touched down for a try off a scrum-down deep in Berkshire territory. White Dog flanker Bill Smutlyn, exchange student from the University of New Zealand at Brisbane, had this to say, "Mead's a force in there. The kinda guy who gives it all he's got, and if that's not enough, blimy, he gives some more. He's always been an unheralded member of our pack, but the way he's come on in the last two weeks, well, jeppers, we couldn't be happier."

The B double and triple prime sides accompanied the A's to Pittsfield for a match against a time-hardened team fielded by Albany Law School, and for a time, it seemed that the Killer B's would triumph.

The 'RFC advantage was not to hold against the more experienced quasi-lawyers. And though they pressured throughout the second half, the White Dogs could not surmount Albany's eight point margin.

this Bud's for you!

W. Soccer

Looking forward to its pivotal Little Three championship game against Amherst this Saturday, the women's soccer team tallied its fourth shutout victory of the season, a hard-fought 1-0 decision over Trinity in Hartford on Saturday.

Upping its record to 5-2-1 on the season, the team displayed tenacious defense in clinging to the one goal lead amid intense pressure from the host Bantams who were trying to tie up the game. The last ten minutes of the game saw the Ephs in their own end, fighting to keep the ball from their goal, which was again ably guarded by senior Joyce Rogers, who faced eleven Trinity shots en route to another shutout.

That last phase of the game is not indicative of the flow of the rest of the contest, however. The game was marked by the back-and-forth play between the teams. The only goal of the contest came at the 33:00 minute mark, when sweeper Carl Cole '91 fired a direct kick into the Trinity penalty area where junior Lori Schaeen headed the ball past the Bantam keeper for the score.

In winning, the Ephs were outshot eleven to seven. Yet, the score might well have been 2-0 in the second half, had another Williams' goal not been disallowed because of an offside violation.

The scrappy play and tenacious defense, especially by junior Heather Martinez, that characterized this game should give the team added confidence going into this Saturday's matchup against Amherst at Cole Field. Having defeated Wesleyan 3-0 ten days ago, the Ephs can wrap up the Little Three Championship with a victory over the Jeffs.

Volleyball to host Little 3 at Chandler this Saturday

by Ted Hobart

Looking forward to moving into its new home in the Chandler Athletic Center this weekend, the women's volleyball team captured first place in the Connecticut College Tournament Saturday.

capturing all four of their matches in two games each. Winning the three team pool easily, over Colby-Sawyer 15-4, 15-0 and Roger Williams 16-14, 15-4, the squad faced host Conn. College in the semi-finals.

Suffers first loss to Dartmouth

Men's Soccer slams Trinity 5-0

by Ted Ruger

The 6-1 men's soccer squad was the beneficiary of an outstanding performance by Mike Masters '89 as it routed Trinity 5-0 in a road game Saturday. Masters, a Division III All-American last year, scored two goals and assisted on a third to propel the Ephs, who resumed their winning ways after falling to Division I power Dartmouth in a 3-2 thriller last Wednesday at Cole Field. The game against the Big Green was probably the last meeting between the two schools as Dartmouth has chosen to cut the Ephs from its schedule.

In Saturday's contest, the Bantams impressed their homecoming crowd by staying even with Williams for most of the first half. They even managed an excellent scoring shot which bounced off the Williams goalpost.

Trinity Mastered

Thirty minutes into the first period, however, Masters began to take control. At 30:11, he pounced on a bouncing ball in the penalty box and ripped a slide volley into the upper right corner of the net.

At 42:40, the junior forward added another tally on a free kick from twenty yards out. He bent the ball around the Trinity defensive wall and past keeper E.J. Woods inside the left post to raise the score to 2-0. This score stood for most of the game as Williams goalie Rob Blanck '89 (five saves) and the strong Eph defense corralled the Bantam attack.

In the last six minutes, Williams added some insurance goals. The first came at 83:54 when Masters passed to teammate Rob Lake '91 across the goalmouth, letting Lake knock it home. Just a minute later, Emil Mugnaini '89 scored on a breakaway set up by Peter Lyn '91. Geoff Igharo '90 rounded off the scoring with two and a half minutes left when he fired away a rolling ball in the goal area.

Coach Michael Russo did not feel the squad dominated quite as much as the score would indicate. "Trinity worked hard, was a decent team, and was really pumped to play us. It was difficult for us to go down there, but Mike's goals really gave us a lift for the rest of the game," he said.

Dartmouth downer

Last Wednesday's 3-2 loss to Dartmouth at Cole Field was almost the scene of a shocking comeback. Down 3-0 to the visitors late in the second half, the Ephs rallied on goals by Nick Nachamkin '88 and Dan Callaghan '90 and were pressing for the tying goal when the final horn sounded. Most people in attendance would probably have echoed Russo's assessment that, "If the game would have lasted five more minutes, who knows what would have happened."

Tomorrow the nationally ranked Ephs will play at R.P.I. before returning home to face Bowdoin at 10:30 on Saturday.

Sweeper Dan Callaghan '90 wins a confrontation with a Dartmouth player. The soccer team lost to the Big Green, but remains undefeated against Division III opponents this year. (Scala)

Football blanked by Bantams

by Al Mottur

Wins are not going to come easy for the 1987 Williams football team. In losing this past week to undefeated Trinity 28-0, the Ephs outrushed the Bantams by 40 yards and had one more first down (19-18). They maintained possession of the football for four minutes more than Trinity, and the special teams, aside for a missed field goal, outplayed their opponents for the third consecutive week. Nonetheless, Williams lost by four touchdowns, and its record now stands at 0-3.

"There is something intangible that's not clicking," said defensive nose-tackle and captain Don Aselton '88, when describing the reason why this football team cannot seem to overcome its foes. "We went into the game really high, and thought we were going to win. Even when we were going into the second half, we thought we'd win."

The Ephs lost in large part because the squad failed to capitalize on potential scoring drives, despite dominating the line of scrimmage in the early going. On its opening drive, the Ephs marched 90 yards on fifteen plays, all the way to the Trinity seven. But a crucial delay of game penalty on fourth and four, and a missed 30 yard field goal attempt left the Ephs with nothing.

At the end of the first quarter, Williams mounted another impressive drive, powering to the Bantam twenty behind the stellar running of Neal Chesley '90, who rushed for 88 yards on the day. Facing fourth and one, the squad parlayed it into fourth and six after a second delay of game penalty. On the ensuing play, Dave Clawson '89, who had been playing both offense and defense for the first time all year, took a reverse handoff and looked downfield to pass. However, under intense pressure, Clawson's pass fell incomplete and the Bantams had stopped another Eph threat.

Air Bantams

Trinity, however, did plenty of damage on its own. With Clawson out of the game, and probably the season with a knee injury, Bantam QB Kevin Griffin took advantage of an already injury-depleted Eph secondary and threw for 217 yards on a mere eight completions. Four pass plays accounted for 178 of those total yards. This aerial barrage stunned the normally dominant Eph defense, and set up or resulted in three of Trinity's four TD's.

Head coach Richard Farley called these plays pivotal to the outcome and said that the 28-0 score was deceiving as a result. "It really was a closer football game than that. Three big pass plays and two crucial penalties gave up all four scores. They're skill kids were apparently better than ours. But there was not that much a difference from an overall physical standpoint."

This Saturday, the squad will entertain Bowdoin at Weston Field. The Ephs will be without Clawson as well as nose-guard Clifton Wright '90, who will miss the rest of the season as a result of a cheap Trinity chop-block to his leg.

The Polar Bears are 3-1 on the year and have a dominating running game, led by Greg Bohannon, who rushed for 197 yards last week as the Bears upset Tufts, ending the Jumbos' nine game winning streak. Said Aselton of the contest, "Now we've got nothing to lose. There are still five games left in the season and we're trying to get coach Farley's first win. We're still plugging, and we're enthusiastic."

College President Francis Oakley opened last Wednesday's faculty meeting by addressing the incident in which Associate Professor of Philosophy Rosemarie Tong did not attribute part of a speech she gave in September. College's portfolio down by $40 million

by Debbie Snyder

The market value of Williams College's portfolio dropped 15 percent after last Monday's stock market crash, College Treasurer William Reed said at the faculty meeting last Wednesday.

College President Francis Oakley began the meeting by addressing the incident of Associate Professor of Philosophy Rosemarie Tong's lack of attribution in a speech given in September at Greenwich, (Conn.) High School. "The important thing now is to move forward, to focus on the future, on the continuing discharge of our responsibility as faculty," he said.

Chairman of the Commission on Campus Race Relations Timothy Cook said that the commission has been meeting weekly since the end of September, and it plans to institute a mandatory freshman assembly and a number of panels comprised of people inside and outside the Williams community.

Reed said the endowment had totaled $278 million at the end of September. "We've lost about $40 million of the value of our endowment in a five day period. That's a big number."

The college uses money from the endowment to help reduce the cost of tuition. It spent $10 million from the endowment this year, Reed said.

"In the short run, there will be no ramifications, because the amount taken each year is independent of market ups and downs," Reed said. "Over the long run, in two to three years, the amount we would take would be affected. It will certainly affect the college's sense of how wealthy it is."

The investment management firms Miller, Anderson and Shaerrerd and Hagler, Mastrovita and Hewitt handle two-thirds of the college's endowment, and Reed commended their performances. "Our managers have an outstanding record," he said. "Obviously, in hindsight, I wish they's sold everything a month ago."

Sprague offers its complex to Williams for Mass MoCA

by Scott J. O'Callaghan

The effort by Williams and the City of North Adams to create the Massachusetts Museum of Contemporary Art (Mass-MoCA) in North Adams took three major strides in the last two weeks:

- The college announced that Sprague Technologies, Inc., had approved a conditional agreement to donate its 28-building mill complex, the site of the proposed museum.
- A petition in support of the museum, sponsored by a local chamber of commerce, was circulated throughout the region, including the college's campus.
- Thomas Krens, the director of the Williams College Museum of Art (WCMA) and the chief planner of Mass. MoCA., said he had concluded a preliminary agreement for the long-term loan of the contemporary art collection of Charles Saatchi.

Meanwhile, the Ways and Means Committee of the Massachusetts House continued deliberations on a Convention Center appropriations bill which, Mass MoCA planners hope, will provide $35 million for the North Adams venture.

The bill does not specifically mention the MassMoCA project, the Berkshire Eagle reported Sunday. Many House members may oppose the bill because it would underwrite the debts incurred by the Hynes Auditorium, a Boston convention center which has been surrounded by controversy, the Eagle reported.

The bill will die if it is not passed by December 31.

Sprague's gift

Sprague Technologies formalized an "agreement in principle" with the college on the transfer of ownership of the company's Marshall Street plant.

"The agreement is subject to a number of conditions, including negotiation of the definitive terms and provisions for the transfer of the property, passage of the enabling legislation by the Massachusetts legislature and other approvals," according to a WCMA press release.

If the conditions are met, the 13.5-acre property, with its 28 buildings, will be transferred to the Northern Berkshire Cultural Development Corporation, a non-profit corporation which would own and operate the museum.

The value of the property and buildings was assessed at approximately $2.9 million for 1987, North Adams Assessor Robert Patenaud said.

North Adams Mayor John Barrett 3d said of the process "We're three quarters of the way there now." The missing piece, he said, is the funding for the project, currently before the Ways and Means Committee.

"Grass-roots" petition

U.S. News ranks Williams No. 1

by Paul Kwon

Williams College placed first in U.S. and World Report's third biennial survey of national liberal-arts colleges for the second time in a row.

Among the 125 liberal-arts college presidents surveyed by U.S. News and World Report, 92 responded by submitting a list of the top ten liberal arts schools on the basis of cohesiveness of curriculum, quality of teaching, relationship between faculty and students, and the atmosphere of learning fostered by the campus.

Sixty-six presidents named Williams, 65 named Swarthmore College, 64 named Carleton College, and 54 named Amherst College.

The U.S. News and World Report article accompanying the college rankings also named Stanford University the top university in the nation, followed by Harvard, Yale and Princeton.

The article featured a picture of Associate Professor of Philosophy Rosemarie Tong and quoted College Council President Carter Zinn '88.

"Always a pleasure"

"College and university presidents have been properly reluctant to attach great importance to these rankings, but it is always a pleasure of course to know that our peers think well of Williams," College President Francis Oakley said. "Among other things, it encourages us in our perennial effort to provide our students with a truly liberal education."

According to a September 23 article in The Chronicle of Higher Education, 65 college presidents, led by Middlebury College President Olin Robison, have complained to U.S. News and World Report about the nature of the survey.

Middlebury's Assistant to the President Kate Woodward said "I would agree that (the survey) is superficial. The presidents are asked to make comparisons and to draw conclusions that are really forced ones." Woodward, who was not speaking for Robison, said that the conclusions were forced due to the categorization of the colleges.

Circulating on campus this week is a petition in support of the proposed Massachusetts Museum of Contemporary Art (Mass MoCA), a project which originated with the college, specifically with Thomas Krens, director of the College Museum of Art (WCMA). The museum would occupy a converted North Adams mill, the now-empty Sprague Electric Co. plant.

By signing the petition, students are joining not only with the college and the City of North Adams, but also with the people of North Adams. By all indications, the majority of them support the idea.

In recent weeks, several pieces of the Mass MoCA puzzle fell into place. The most important development was the announcement by Sprague Technologies, Inc., that it would donate the Marshall Street plant for the project.

But the fate of the museum is by no means assured. The "agreement in principle" with Sprague expires on December 31. The museum also depends on an appropriations bill currently stalled in the Ways and Means Committee of the Massachusetts House. The legislation must be passed by the end of the calendar year, or it will die.

Once the funding bill, known as the Convention Centers act, is approved, Krens must apply to the Dukakis administration to obtain the $35 million in funds which he admits are essential for the project.

If those funds are not granted soon, the project will simply not go forward, Krens has said.

The conversion of the Sprague Electric plant carries with it a sense of sadness. Twenty years ago, the plant employed over 10,000. Four years ago, it employed less than half that number. In 1985, it laid off hundreds of workers, many of them veterans of 30 or 40 years, and moved its corporate headquarters to a Boston suburb. Earlier this month, the larger letters which spelled out the company's name finally came down.

The art museum which may occupy the plant will not even begin to address the problem of the unemployment which the Sprague layoffs represent. But the potential benefits make the museum a worthwhile project. It would infuse money into the local economy. It could be a symbol of the city's potential for development. It is likely to make a good return on the $35 million which the state invests.

Williams students can play a role, albeit a minor one, in keeping the project on track. The petitions being circulated are not limited to registered Massachusetts voters, according to WCMA staffers.

The Record often asks college administrators to listen to student initiatives and to make them their own. Now students have a chance to join a college initiative, and to help fulfill a North Adams dream.

Marine recruiting should not be allowed due to hiring ban

To the Editor:

Dave Kane's homophobic and racist article came as a shock after our exhilarating and empowering March on Washington for Lesbian, Gay and Human Rights. His inability to appreciate the function of affirmative action betrays both ignorance and underlying intolerance, as does his misinterpretation of the purpose of the Black Student Union. People of color and homosexuals are minorities and, as such, they are without power.

Kane, in his choice of vocabulary, asserts that they use some form of power to perpetuate discrimination and segregation. The existence of affirmative action and the WBSU are not attempts of a majority to assert power; they are attempts made by a minority to redress a power imbalance based in the racism of white society.

It has been historically proven that integration is a first step toward tolerance. Look at the example of black men's integration into the regular forces of the armed services. This change in attitude among the white soldiers came about only by mutual respect gained by close association. If the armed services had followed Kane's logic, blacks would have never been allowed into the forces.

Although both people of color and homosexuals suffer from prejudice, their experience of oppression is very different. Lesbians and gays could always enter the Marine Corps if they hid their sexual preference. While gays and lesbians can "play it straight," why should they have to? Also, people of color cannot, in most cases, masquerade as white. Nor should they have to.

But as minorities, we believe that there are some similarities in our situations. Yet, it is true that the college admits students who may profess specific prejudices. However, once they enroll, they become a part of a community that prides itself on diversity and acceptance of difference. It is our understanding that any overt expression of prejudice on their part would be condemned, not sanctioned, by the administration.

Furthermore, this is a different issue than that of who should recruit on campus. An organization that openly discriminates against people of color would not be given recruiting privileges here. It saddens us that Williams does not extend their non-discriminatory policy to such cases (ie the Marines) that pertain to homosexuals. If every college in the United States refused recruitment by the armed services, imagine the effect this would have on the struggle for homosexual rights.

Regardless of whether we march on Capitol Hill or rely on Chaplin steps, we deserve support and acceptance from all sectors of the community. As we chanted in Washington D.C., "We are everywhere and we shall be free."

WBSU outlines provisions of group, aims for organization

To the Editor:

In response to the article "Tell it to the Marines: false logic opposes campus recruitment" that appeared in the Record on October 13, we, the concerned members of the black community, wish to clarify the misconceptions presented in the aforementioned article.

First, as stated in the Constitution and By-laws of the Williams Black Student Union, the purpose of the organization and means of membership are among the following:

ARTICLE I

Purpose: WBSU's purpose shall be the following:

1. To give all its members an ethnocentric orientation and a group consciousness so as to concern itself with the execution of a necessary and energetic program keeping in step with black people the world over;
2. Concern itself with the curriculum and general atmosphere of Williams College; to make it more conducive to black students and the black community (curriculum changes, faculty recommendations and dismissals, administration, sponsorship of events, etc.) Any desire to alter the above description can be discussed at any meeting....

ARTICLE III

Membership: Membership shall be open to: 1. All interested black students at Williams College who are of African descent, or, 2. By invitation or request agreeable to the majority of the WBSU.

Allan Bloom at Williams: Are we suffering a mid-life crisis?

by John Canty '88

Have you heard the occasional yelps of pain I have heard around campus when the name "Allan Bloom" is mentioned? From A. Bartlett Giamatti at Convocation on down, the name conjures up disagreement, dread, and not a little anxiety among our residents in the Ivory Tower. In short, it seems that The Closing of the American Mind has hit a raw nerve in many circles of the Williamstown academic community and our student elite.

It should. The book fundamentally calls into question the fidelity of current academic practice and learning to the ideals from which they are supposed to arise. University of Chicago Philosophy Professor Bloom argues that today's colleges are suffering a crisis of self-confidence in which they no longer believe in the mission which they are called upon, in the education of students' moral and intellectual sensibilities, to fulfill.

But can't we dismiss Professor Bloom as just an ethnocentric slob who cannot understand other cultures? That currently is the popular way for many of our most chic to avoid with distortion and intellectual laziness the uncomfortable, yea, the challenging task of confronting Bloom's indictment: In abandoning the Note the derision we see among many for the spirit of democratic self-rule or, better yet, human rights. Nice for America, some of our fellows say with a self-important sense of realism, but is self-responsibility and freedom from torture really to be expected from other peoples? This kind of thinking is not just wrong, it is arrogant, and it is dangerous. It detracts from the reverence with which we all now view recent developments in the Philippines, in South Korea, in South Africa, i.e., the nobility of a people asserting their right to charting their own destiny.

Bloom's charge of paralysis-in-the-college finds support in an analysis of the Williams curriculum. Williams shies away from imposing the requirement of an experience with specific fields of knowledge. This abdication has had a dual result. First of all, it has corroded the spirit of the broadness of learning which animates the liberal arts. Instead, we have seen an increasing atomization of our curriculum, with no idea of how, for example, studies in modern corporate finance relate to individual ethics.

While last year's increases in divisional requirements intended to force a broader exposure, they beg the question by leaving the answer to the student. Are not there aspects of knowledge whose necessity for broad understanding is to be defined not by the student but by the college? We come to what I would call a Dialogue of the Deaf. In our discussions of our knowledge, we are losing common terms to the point where we do not understand each other. We are approaching questions with wholly different perspectives. Isn't diversity of views welcome, though? Certainly. But without a certain base of shared understanding, we have a limited ability to come to an understanding of each other's viewpoints.

A second result of this emptiness is a fundamental lack of cultural understanding. We are here in Williams College students of the world but children of Western civilization. It is that tradition (History 301 students will, I hope, bear me out), it is well to remember, which has sought to understand other cultures and from which Williams derives its origins. Williams students should leave this College with a fundamental appreciation of the achievements, from Aristotle to Michaelangelo to Augustine, of Western society. Such things as the censpirit of our tradition which lies, from Plato's Republic to Thomas Aquinas' Summa in embracing knowledge while recognizing the moral responsibility which it entails, we have opened ourselves to a judgementally self-paralyzing relativism which sees no one profound essence. It tolerates and accepts all ideas, even bad ones.

Article III thus emphasizes that all black students are invited but not required to join. The Constitution also provides for non-black students, who are sincerely interested in learning and contributing to the black community, to become members. Therefore, the WBSU does not "discriminate" against white students. Why has the WBSU been singled out when there are other minority organizations on campus with similar membership policies?

The basis of the Constitution is rooted in the history of black students at Williams College. A need was recognized by black students as well as the college administration for an "ethnocentric orientation and a group consciousness." This need arose from the complete exclusion of black students from enjoying the privileges of the mainstream campus social life (fraternities). They were denied the appreciation of their heritage by the absence of black faculty, interaction with black faculty, and curriculum geared toward black studies.

trality of the Judeo-Christian tradition, the reverence for learning, and what differentiates it from others, are things we should all know.

Should this exhaust the universe of what we should learn? Does this imply an "our civilization is better than yours" attitude? Both questions should receive strong no's. It is important to understand that a basic knowledge of one's own culture is requisite to an intelligent vision of others.

confidence reaches apotheosis and celebration in the philosophy so en vogue these days, deconstructionism. The idea behind deconstruction rests upon the premise that all statements have a multiplicity of values and meanings, that the purpose or wholeness of thoughts should not be considered. Implicit in this whole theory is a rejection of any one essence or absolute embodied in a statement.

My goal in this piece is to advocate a set of ideas and to generate some debate

A basic knowledge of one's own culture is requisite to an intelligent vision of others.

Two attitudes currently stand in the way of this. One is what could be called the "marketplace education." Like supermarket consumers, students, according to this theory, are the best judges of what their education should be about. This has a certain truth to it. The education that leaves nothing to personal choice stifles student creativity, it dulls intellectual curiosity. At the same time, most would agree that there are certain things an institution of learning should require of its graduates; this is its responsibility. A knowledge of our tradition is one such necessity.

In a second way, the crisis of self-over the debt we owe to our heritage and the reverence we show to it. It is this past (Yes, I am a history major!) which has given birth, out of war and tyranny and hardship, to a society which values and exalts the free mind. It is this past from which Williams arose.

We are, as U.S. News tells us, the outstanding college of our nation. The commitment of our teachers, the drive of our students, the dedication of graduates, all of whom have cherished the value of their own experience of learning, have made us so. It remains for us to uphold the truths of our past in our discovery of our future.

dangerous aspects of this article is its traditional justification for prejudice. The author asserts that if a "dominant" majority holds a belief, its verity should never be questioned because it is universally accepted.

Were not black soldiers excluded from the armed forces of the United States prior to World War I? Have black soldiers been proven to be a detriment to the American military?

Roll out the barrel; has a keg become a symbol of our time?

To the Editor:

While I am very thankful to Peter Balaban and Debbie Snyder for their valiant effort to evoke the spirit of Professor Gaudino's educational legacy within the scope of a brief article, I found one of the statements attributed to me (regarding the "keg culture") so garbled as to be almost incomprehensible.

What I tried to convey to the interviewers was my recently acquired suspicion (derived from students' own accounts) that drinking patterns at Williams involve far more than ordinary forms of sociability. The beer keg seems to have achieved the "cultural" centrality of a tribal totem. Unsurprisingly, then, a significant part of the early socialization of freshman appears to take the form of initiation rites around the totemic keg. Alcohol has ceased being merely the facilitator of conviviality. Instead, the keg is now called on to provide a collective identity.

To the extent to which these suspicions correspond to reality, I find it appalling. Serious discussion throughout the campus on the role of the keg in the life of the community, is badly needed.

Trustees plan for January meeting

by Todd Owens

The trustees focused on long-range planning and preparation for their next meeting in January, when they will approve the preliminary college budget, at their first meeting of this academic year on October 15 to 17, College Treasurer William Reed said.

At the plenary session on long-term planning, College Provost Neil Grabois presented various mathematical scenarios which addressed how the endowment and tuition would be affected by a variety of possible actions, including renovation and building projects, increasing faculty and staff and other major changes. The purpose of the demonstration, according to Reed, was to give the Trustees a sense of what the College could do.

The trustees met with student representatives from four student-faculty committees and the executive board of College Council to discuss current issues on campus at a dinner hosted by Alumni Trustee Hedrick Smith '55, who is chairman of the trustee Committee on Campus Life.

Each representative made a short presentation to the trustees, who "thought the meeting with student leaders was great. They were impressed by the representations of their organizations," Reed said.

The Trustees were also briefed on the subject of campus lighting and security, though "they would only get involved if they felt the college was not as concerned as it should be," Reed said.

The Project hired Pam Fillon, a social worker from Adams, to direct the Project. "I feel like a mother carrying an infant," Fillon said. "An infant is full of potential and viability, and it grows. And my role is to nurture that, and guide it, and provide some structure." As director Fillon oversees student involvement in the program. An average of about 15 people a day work at the Project, with ten coming from Williams.

Council stresses urgency in race relations

by James Lee

"We have to create a sense of crisis without an event," said College Council President Carter Zinn '88 with regard to the council's latest plan to raise Williams students' awareness of campus race relations.

The council also discussed course offerings for non-majors in Division III and the possibility of receiving physical education credits for alternative activities.

The plan discussed last Thursday consists of sponsoring a panel discussion on the issue with follow-up discussions in the dormitories afterwards initiated by house representatives to the council.

"The goal is to create a situation in which people can freely consider each other's views on the issue in a very open and frank environment," Zinn said.

Zinn, who acts as a liaison between the council and the Committee on Campus Racial Relations, said the plan was the council's response to the letter submitted to the Record last Spring by the Black Student Union. "Our goal is not to sponsor a pro-con debate on the letter itself but to create an open room in which people can challenge each other's feelings," he said.

The council discussed the possibility that not many students would attend the panel discussion and, subsequently, the interest in the issue not great. Marisa Reddy '89 said, "Even if not everybody is coming, people will be talking about it."

Chris Shorb '88 said, "I don't think it (the plan) will work at Williams. People won't open up their wounds in front of one another."

Nicole Melcher, the council vice-president, emphasized that the follow-up discussions in the dorms are up to the dorm residents themselves. "We are counting on you to push it through," Melcher said to the house representatives, who are responsible for initiating the discussion.

Incorporation and employee mark growth of Food Project

by Scott J. O'Callaghan

The Berkshire Food Project started last spring as a hot meals program run by Williams student volunteers that served lunch two days a week from the social hall of the First Congregational Church in North Adams. It is now a non-profit corporation with an employed director.

Much of the project's expansion was made possible after it received a $15,000 grant in June from ACTION, a federal program that gives aid to non-profit corporations. The grant, which was given to promote student volunteering, stipulates that the money must go to students, and could not be used for food.

The Project hired Pam Fillon, a social worker from Adams, to direct the Project. "I feel like a mother carrying an infant," Fillon said. "An infant is full of potential and viability, and it grows. And my role is to nurture that, and guide it, and provide some structure." As director Fillon oversees student involvement in the program. An average of about 15 people a day work at the Project, with ten coming from Williams.

week. "That would create dependency," she said.

Project Student Coordinator Bill Hoch '89 said they currently serve anywhere from 60 to 90 people in each sitting, people who generally have nowhere to go. "It's almost a place to go," he said, "At least it keeps them off the streets."

At present, the Project has a projected budget of $26,000, which covers food, Fillon's salary and general operating expenses. The Project, which uses to purchase food supplies from the College Food Service, now buys some supplies from U.S. Government surplus with the remainder coming from the Western Massachusetts Food Bank. According to Hoch, the decision to buy their own food was a practical one based on convenience.

Food drives also provide the Project with food. Last Saturday students from Williams and North Adams State College joined with members of the MassPIRG groups from both schools collecting canned food at Price Chopper and Grand Union.

The money that does not come from the grant comes from donations and fund-raising. One of the Project's main fund-raisers has been the meatless meals, a program run in conjunction with Food Service. Director of Food Service Jim

by Peter Balaban

The number of students attending Williams College Christian Fellowship (WCF) weekly meetings and membership in WCF Bible study groups has increased dramatically over the past few years, student members said.

Bryce Babcock, a lecturer in physics and an advisor to the WCF, said that the number of students attending Friday night meetings has jumped to 50 this year from 25 three years ago.

The organization moved their weekly meetings from Makepeace room in Greylock dining hall to Driscoll lounge this year to accommodate the increase in the number of students, Babcock said.

Scott Rigby '88, a member of the WCF steering committee, said the number of students in Bible study groups organized through the WCF has increased from about 15 three years ago to about 50 this year.

Steering committee member Dilip Nair '88 said, "We've made an attempt to make sure that people know we are here, but I certainly wouldn't say we've sat down and had a membership drive."

"There is an increasing level of commitment on the part of the students. They are making this a significant part of their lives. Over the last few years quite a number of people have come through with the desire to make this more than a friendly gathering," Babcock said.

"Having a group of students who take their faith seriously and put it into practice.... provides a challenge to others coming here who have some vague sense of a commitment to Christianity," he added.

The WCF is affiliated with the Intra-Varsity Christian Fellowship, a non-denominational, international, campus oriented Christian organization.

Charles Murray, the best-selling author of Losing Ground spoke last Tuesday about social policy. (LeBauer)

Author of Losing Ground discusses social policy

by Rob Ullman

Would a child benefit more from living with a poor family with a strict work ethic and a high regard for education or a wealthy family that would not instill the same values for hard work and schooling?

Dr. Charles S. Murray, Senior Research Fellow of Manhattan Policy Research Institute and author of the best-seller Losing Ground, brought this question along with many other issues concerning social policy to the attention of the Williams community in his October 20 lecture rethinking the goals of public policy.

For Murray the answer is simple, "I want a child to become a self-determining, autonomous, responsible adult and that's why I'd put him with the first family." Although the child will grow up in an environment often lacking the luxuries of life, he will become a responsible, educated adult, according to Murray.

Murray questions whether government welfare programs really help the poor. "If the government provides a family with food to the extent that a young man won't have to worry about feeding his child, would

"Our purpose is to provide our readers, which include prospective college students, with the most objective information we can to sort out the vast educational opportunities available in our country," the magazine's Editorial Publicity Coordinator Paul Vizsa said.

"There's no perfect way to conduct this type survey," Vizsa said. "We believe that university presidents appear to be the best judges of the relative merits of various schools. Each president is asked to judge schools that they are most familiar with."

One area in which Williams hopes to gain from the survey is in admissions. Associate Director of Admissions Tom Parker said that reprint of the survey would be useful in certain contexts, such as college fairs, which would help in increasing Williams' name recognition around the country.

Parker said that although speculations on the effect of the poll on admissions are "not scientifically based, we will take all the publicity we can get."

The demand for article reprints from U.S. News and World Report is very high, the Berkshire Eagle reported.

"The last time the survey came out we did not have reprints, but there was such high demand we gave in," the Eagle quoted magazine publicist Beth Kseniak. "The college and universities named all wanted lots of copies, to send to alumni and just pass around I guess."

Much-maligned Moo-cows march on

by Chuck Samuelson

"I got rhythm," you know what that word means?" shouted band director Francis Cardillo as his troops showed very little rhythm in last Friday's pre-game rehearsal.

"Got means possession," said sophomore Jay Hartley.

"We don't have possession of it right now," retorted Cardillo. Then, in response to Cardillo's prodding and assistance, the band found their rhythm and real music began to emanate from, among others, the Moo-cow Marching Band's four trombones, one flute and two tubas. Cardillo, who the band members affectionately refer to as "Papa," has been coaxing melodious tunes from the people who wear the funny hats to football games for the last 24 years.

Saddle shoes

When he started directing the band, it was composed of 40 men who wore matching blazers, pants and saddle shoes. After the college became co-ed, so did the band, which reached a high of 105 members in 1972, under the leadership of Rich Levy '74. It was sometime around 1972 that the hats first appeared, and they have been a fixture ever since.

For about five years in the late seventies and early eighties, Cardillo had what he called his "Halloween Band," — no uniforms. The Halloween Band was short-lived, in part because Cardillo did not like its sloppy image. "It's become a whole new band philosophy on my part," he said. On game days band members are now required to wear the official band windbreaker, dark pants and a purple cow tie.

The musicians in the band notice the change. Sean Timmons '89, one of the band's two co-leaders, said, "The quality of our music is steadily getting better. This year's band has a different attitude about it than the band in my freshman year."

"It's an excellent sounding band right now," Cardillo said. "For the time that we have, they do an excellent job. There are a lot of people in Williams-town who really enjoy the band parades and halftime shows."

"Safe Intimacy"

If there is a complaint that every band member seems to share, it is that not enough students watch their shows. Timmons said, "I think it would be nice, considering all the work we do on the show, if people would stay in the stands instead of going to the tailgates. It's nice having the alumni watch the show, but I'm always a little disappointed the students don't (watch it)."

Timmons said that the commentary for each week's show is really directed to the student

Word processors change the ways students write

by Ann Mantil

Most current Williams students weren't around in the days when word processing was all but nonexistent at the college. Walking into Jesup at midnight to frantically crank out a paper due the next morning is something we all take for granted. A scant five years ago, however, typewriters were the norm and word processing was still a somewhat scary mystery for most people.

In 1980, the college joined the world of microcomputers with the purchase of nine Commodore PETs and a few Apple computers. The "computer center" was then located in the basement of Weston. "The purchase was made primarily because the computer science department wanted more than just a big machine to work with," said Lawrence Wright, Director of the Computer Center.

After a year, the computers were moved to the basement of Bronfman because Weston was too remote to give students the help they needed. "Kids seemed to be able to pick it up fairly quickly. The microcomputers were used by students right away," said Wright.

This enthusiasm led to the purchase of ten Deckmate II micros for Sawyer Library. Formal instruction was offered for the first time, and the demand was so great that students were restricted to only two hours a day on the Deckmates. "We had sign-up books, and monitors who enforced the time limit," said Wright.

In 1984 came the decision to buy about fifty Apple MacIntoshes and fifty IBM PCs. Jesup was reopened as the new computer center, and word processing became almost a way of life for Williams students.

Grad art students are a breed apart

by Ellen Drought

"Yes, we're isolated from the undergraduates, but it's not a big deal because there's a lot of us in the program. Also, since many of us have taken time off between college and coming here, there's a big age difference — most of us are around 22 or 23, while a freshman is 17." So said Laura Gelfand, a first-year student at the Williams College Graduate Program in the History of Art, of her experience as a graduate student at a predominantly undergraduate institution.

The two-year program, which leads to a Master of Arts degree, began in 1972 and operates in conjunction with the Sterling and Francine Clark Art Institute. This year there are 26 students in the program: 17 are in their first year and nine in their second.

Italy

The students attend seminars at the Clark and take language courses on campus. They go on a trip to Italy during their first Winter Study Period and must complete a major project during the Winter Study Period of their second year.

Of the 17 first-year students, 13 live in Fort Hoosac, an old fraternity house located near the Clark. The rest of the students live off-campus. "We're just not on campus a lot, aside from Weston. I haven't even seen a large portion of the college yet," said Gelfand, explaining how the graduate students feel cut off from the undergraduates. Becky Nanovic, also a first year student, agreed: "We're based at the Clark Art Institute; we're not even based at Williams."

The students living in Fort Hoosac are given large single rooms and a kitchen and dining hall for their use. "We all cook our own meals. We could've been on the meal plan, but it didn't make sense since we're so rarely on campus," Nanovic said.

"Competitive"

One problem the students identified stems from the fact that so many of them live in the same building. "It's hard to live with people you eat and go to classes with," Nanovic said. Gelfand agreed, adding, "The worst thing is that we're all really competitive."

Gelfand said the Winter Study trip to Italy, which will be led by program director Samuel Edgerton, was a major reason for her choosing the Williams program: "I saw that Williams offered time abroad, so I applied. I found out afterwards what a good program it is."

"The Williams program is becoming better known. Its graduates are really well represented in museums all over, such as the National Gallery," Nanovic said. "The Clark Library is really famous too — it's a wonderful library," said Gelfand.

Utah and Arkansas

Nanovic said she saw the diversity of the students as another strength of the program: "It's a really small program yet it represents people from all over — Utah, California, New England, Arkansas and the Midwest."

"About one-third to one-half (of the program graduates) go on to Ph.D. programs right away, and one-half to two-thirds go on to museum or curatorial work of some kind," said Karen Kowitz, the assistant to the program director. Of last year's graduates, four are employed in museum work, one is acquiring a private gallery and two are pursuing Ph.D.s, according to a newsletter written by Edgerton.

"A lot of people want the M.A. as their final degree and then go on to museum work from there," Kowitz concluded.

Gelfand said, "I plan to go for a Ph.D. and teach, but I think a lot of us will wind up in museums and galleries."

Library innovations prep Sawyer for 21st century

by Rob Weisberg

After several years of preparation, Sawyer Library's new computerized catalog, the TOMUS system, has now become available for student use. "We now have 24 terminals in Sawyer and one more at each of the satellite libraries. In time, we hope to have many more terminals spread around campus, and even to let individual computers in the dorms access the system," said College Librarian Phyllis Cutler.

Cutler explained that TOMUS is a more versatile form of the card catalog. Students using the system can locate books and other library materials using not only the author, subject, and title information, as with the card catalog, but also by using a "key word."

The library has also added on-line literature searching, which allows the reference staff to generate bibliographies on certain subjects, Cutler said. This allows a student to get the titles of all the magazine articles written on that subject, as well as the general content of the articles, she added.

The college library began preparing for TOMUS back in 1983, Cutler said, by entering new items on the catalog database; but only one-third of the College's 600,000 volumes can be accessed through the system. "This is the only major drawback so far to TOMUS, and the only present source of student complaint," Cutler said. The library staff is continuing to update the system, so that within two to three years all materials should be on file, she added.

The College hopes that the card catalog will eventually become obsolete, she said. "Since all changes on the card catalog must be made manually, and updates to the catalog are a common occurrence, maintaining the file requires a great deal of labor."

Safe books

TOMUS is not the only modernization project the library has begun. The next step, Cutler said, is to barcode all the books to automate circulation. "This way, we will be able to keep track of all the books much more easily, and we'll be able to send out overdue notices much more quickly," she said that this process will

Tartuffe entertains but lacks spark

by Travis Pierson

A self-serving swindler, flying the flag of religious salvation, invades a family's home in order to hoodwink the sanctity-seekers out of their money and possessions. It may all sound relatively unremarkable, except for the fact that this is not the latest in the contemporary run of Orin Roberts/Jim Bakkeresque comedies of another rebirth in theatres across the nation.

The Williamstheatre production of Tartuffe opened Thursday at Adams Memorial Theatre. Directed by Tina Shepherd, it is a faithful and entertaining rendition, which, however, might have benefited from some more dramatic zest.

The self-proclaimed holy man Tartuffe (played by sophomore corruption, but rather the plot of Moliere's Tartuffe, a play first performed in 1664.

As history continues to demonstrate, the themes of lust, deceitfulness, power and greed, revealed in the name of God, remain ever-topical. Tartuffe, a pioneer in straight-forwardly dealing with this crooked side of religion, has enjoyed constant revivals for the last 300 years, becoming one of the best-known plays of the 18th and 19th centuries. And, due in part to the recent televangelist scandals, it is currently in the midst of

R. Philippe Heller) has completely overtaken the glib mind of Orgon Pernel (James Elliott '88), who has grown so infatuated with Tartuffe that he moves the pious fraud into his house and shuns his wife, Elmire (Mary Richardson '91), in favor of Tartuffe. In this respect, the production is quite successful, quietly creating an ambiguity in the nature and depth of the Orgon-Tartuffe relationship.

But when Orgon decides that his already-engaged daughter Mariane (Barbara Elliott '91) should break her previous commitment and marry Tartuffe, his family resolves that they can no longer remain silent. Here begins the series of misunderstandings, attempted seductions and deceptions which eventually lead to Tartuffe's exposure.

Lacked tension

Tartuffe's incorporation of numerous subplots necessitates the keeping of a dramatic tension between and energy within the play's scenes. Unfortunately, some of the performers in this production have difficulty maintaining the spectator's interest in the longer and potentially mesmerizing soliloquies. This inability has the undesirable effect of temporarily setting the audience free from the rope of interest that should be pulling them through the various scenes to the play's conclusion.

Also hindering the play's total success is the untapped potential of some of the characters. While competently acted, they sometimes lacked any clear direction which would have made their presence much more rewarding to the audience and the structure of the play. The daughter Mariane, while appropriately ditz, is made too spineless, subsequently lessening her comedic potential.

Likewise, the stepmother Elmire seems somewhat blanch and devoid of the spirit which would drive Tartuffe to try to seduce her.

Energizers

Some other characters, however, are given much more focus and manage to sustain the play's energy. Elliott's Orgon is full of comedic expression and life, ranging from the boisterous to the blundering. Heller's Tartuffe is likewise well-drawn, and his slow, deliberate speech is both funny and purposefully annoying. He creates a layered character, both hilarious and maddening, and manages to

Pullen/Adams Quartet puts it all in and it comes out jazz

by Eric Hanson

After the death of legendary jazz bassist and band leader Charles Mingus in 1979, a European agent called pianist Don Pullen and asked if he would like to go on tour with tenor saxophonist George Adams and drummer Dannie Richmond, fellow members of the late Mingus's band. Pullen accepted the offer and headed abroad, accompanied by bassist Cameron Brown, who had been working with him in 360-degree Experience, a group co-led by Pullen and drummer Beaver Harris.

"We all considered it to be a one-shot deal," Pullen recalled in a telephone interview from his home in New Jersey. But something about the group made them reconsider. "It really clicked, especially because we were playing our own music," he explained. "That was the determining factor." The four men had a meeting and decided to remain together. "And the rest is history," said Pullen with a laugh.

Many styles

Eight years and nine albums later, the Don Pullen/George Adams Quartet is not only one of the longest-standing groups in modern jazz, but it is also quickly becoming one of the most well-respected in the field. Much of its appeal is due to the breadth of influence that its music encompasses. Playing a brand of jazz that is inspired by dozens of different styles (and seems to be inventing a few of its own), the Quartet has caused critics and fans alike to take notice.

Fresh

The common denominator of the Quartet's music, that is, the feel that is at the root of practically everything that it does, is unquestionably the blues. But the blues is just the beginning. "We are a modern group," said Pullen. "Our music encompasses different styles from different time periods. We do a little bit of everything." This formula serves as a guarantee of freshness for the group's music. "It keeps the door open for newness, for freshness," he explained.

As is true with most jazz, the Quartet's music is at its best when heard live. The recent release of two albums recorded live at New York City's Village Vanguard club has awakened many to the excitement of the group's live performance. "There is something [in playing live] that doesn't happen in the studio," Pullen insists. "There's such a big difference."

Visual effect

The difference is not only in their music, Pullen explained, but also in the group's overall effect on the listener at a live performance. "We are very visual," said Pullen, so much so that, in their minds, "people often have trouble making our live performance compatible with what they hear on the record."

The lack of popularity from which jazz suffers in its home country has definite effects on the Pullen/Adams Quartet. During the first seven years of its existence, the group was forced to look elsewhere

Guest violinist Benny Kim performs with the Berkshire Symphony Friday night in Chapin Hall. (LeBauer)

Benny Kim's violin powers premier BSO performance

by Alex Oh

The Berkshire Symphony opened its 1987-88 season under the baton of conductor Julius Hegyi with a Parents' Weekend performance Friday in Chapin Hall. The somewhat oddly arranged program included Malcolm Arnold's Tam O'Shanter Overture, Mendelssohn's Symphony No. 3 in A minor, a new piece by Scott Lindroth called A Fire's Bright Song, and finally, Tchaikovsky's Concerto for violin and orchestra.

Undoubtedly, the highlight of the evening came at the program's end when guest violinist Benny Kim took the stage. From his first bowing to its last stroke, it was quite clear that he was in charge of the performance. He performed the opening lines of the Allegro moderato with a beautiful sense of phrasing and a gentle touch of subtle nuance. Throughout the entire concerto, he managed to sustain this high level of musicality. The audience was almost unaware of the orchestra as Kim dominated the stage in his performance.

Frosh shine in tribute to first-year woes and joys

by Mike Reisman

The old adage "big surprises come in little packages" couldn't be more true than when applied to this year's edition of the Freshman Revue. The Revue, produced by the student-run Cap & Bells organization, ran Wednesday through Sunday at the Downstage Theatre and included a talented ensemble of singers, dancers, musicians and actors almost exclusively from the freshman class. The audience was treated to a fast-paced blend of comedy, music, and dance that poignantly explored the anxieties and hopes of college life.

The Revue '87 is a musical tribute to that great time of college life, freshman days. Drawing on the combined experiences of the staff and cast, it includes more than an hour's worth of skits and song and dance routines that humorously depict the lives of newly-arrived freshmen. All those unique Williams experiences, the good and the bad, are dealt with, much to the delight of the audience.

Originals

The program, which was directed by Kristin Szilarto '88, was based on original staff ideas and later cast improvisation, which resulted in the final script and songs. Music was provided by a "Blues Duo" of Jeff Low '91 and Greg Woods '91, as well as by "The Price Choppers," (comprised of junior Chris Collingwood on guitar, Phil Harris '90 on bass, senior drummer Jeff Perrott, and Adam Schlesinger on piano).

The Revue began with a hilarious skit that presented two roommates with diametrically opposite personalities meeting for the first time. "Green and Granola" showed what happens when a guitar-strumming hippie who wears beads and ragged clothes while singing about peace, love and UNICEF children meets his button-down pre-Wall Street money-hungry roommate. The mellow guitar playing of "Granola" is interspersed with the capitalistic remonstrations of "Green." One can imagine how many similar first roommate shocks have occurred. The scene ends with each actor yelling "pig" and "hippie" at each other, respectively.

The next piece, "That's Something to Worry About," shows freshmen moving into the dorms, trying to lose their parents and little brothers while trying to find their roommates and feel at home. "Freshman Days" adds an elaborately choreographed dance segment, which is at times awkward but definitely contains enough spirit and action to captivate the audience.

In "Menu-ette," we are introduced to that great nightmare-spawner, the Baxter Hall food disposal system, known affectionately as "The Great Flume." In a mock dining hall scene, we hear all about the things with funny names that we are served to eat, and we see an actual demonstration of the art of "fluming" and the inevitable "flume" attack upon unwitting novice "flumers." As a side attraction, we are given a lesson in "scoping" for girls, a pastime that is presented as a traditional dining hall ritual.

Part of the action during "Freshman Days" deals with one girl's anxiety about the welfare of her divorced mother. The action then occasionally switches to her mother's home, where we meet her brothers.

"Friends of My Roommate Blues" shows what happens when one is trying to study and his roommate and friends come in and trash his room. Here we are also introduced to ritualistic entry parties and kegs.

Finally, we are taken to a "Screw Your Roommate" party, where one girl is left without a date and performs a touching yet humorous song in which she vows to find her roommate and screw up her night too. The show ends with an ensemble song and dance routine that brought the house down.

Above all, the Revue provided an enjoyable time for all and displayed a great sense of humor. The musical numbers, as well as the dance segments, had total energy and complemented the skits well. The theme was dealt with in a way that satirized nearly every aspect of the freshman experience while still retaining the seriousness and intensity that freshmen bring to these experiences.

take several years to complete for the whole library system, but hopes to have it done by the time TOMUS is fully operational. If this is done, students using TOMUS will be able to see if the book they want has been checked out, she said.

Sawyer Library installed a security system at its main entrance in January 1986. Cutler said. The system consists of sensors that detect magnetic strips placed in the binding of the material. If a strip that has not been demagnetized at the front desk passes through the gate, an alarm sounds, said Circulation and Stack Supervisor Jo-ann Irace.

Random

Like TOMUS, though, not all materials in the library have been covered by the system. "The library is only randomly stripped. In areas of high use, though, every book (was) targeted, while in low-interest areas it (was) done at random,"

Irace said. Every new book is targeted, and the library staff is working on retroactively targeting all the books in the library, though it is expected to take some time, she said.

Irace said that positive effects of the security system have been quite noticeable to the library staff. "Searching for missing books is way down, and we no longer have to keep track of display books, since those are all targeted. We used to get hundreds of books with the cards still in them (indicating they had not been checked out) returned at the end of the semester — now we only get ten or so," she said.

"We used to have students who would have to change a paper topic because the books they need were missing. We just don't get that anymore," said Irace. Cutler added that student reaction to the security has been quite positive. "They enjoy having the protection, not having to worry about something they need being gone."

Hodgkins said the meatless were founded by Anza Mammen '86, a former College Council President. Hodgkins said that for each student who attends the meatless meals a certain amount of the average cost of the meal is given to the council to be transferred to the Project. A meatless meal was held on October 21 in Dodd and Grey-lock dining halls. In the future the meatless meals will alternate from Mission Park and Driscoll to Dodd and Greylock. He said the meals will be kept out of Baxter, "because it's too central. There's too much going on there."

Hoch explained the philosophy of the Project: "We give a hand up, not a hand out." He (namely Italy, the home of Soul Note Records) for interested record companies. It wasn't until last year, with the release of the Blue Note LP "Breakthrough," that the group recorded an album with an American record company.

Pullen is at once indignant about this long wait and optimistic for change. "I don't like the fact that America has been so late in recognizing us," he said. But, he continued, "In time even that will be remedied."

Exposure

"Exposure is the key word," explained Pullen. "We need to be seen by people who have never seen us before, to be put in places that we've never been in before." An increase in the group's popularity is almost inevitable, according to Pullen. "It's natural that this group will become more popular," he said.

Pullen does not underestimate the limits of this popularity, either. "This group does have a kind of mass appeal," he insisted. He justified this belief by referring to the band's ability to excite both fans and non-jazz enthusiasts alike.

"I've seen people who have told me that they hated jazz come away from one of our concerts just beaming. So, I think, to use [drummer and band leader] Art Blakey's term, we are 'Jazz Messengers.' When people do hear us it can benefit all of jazz."

And with a new recording contract with the famed Blue Note label and a recently-released

LP entitled "Song Everlasting," it seems that more and more people will have the opportunity to hear what the Don Pullen/George Adams Quartet has to offer. In many ways, now is just the beginning for these veterans of the jazz scene. "We are at the brink, we are just at the edge," said Pullen. "And all we need is a little push."

The Don Pullen/George Adams Quartet will appear Thursday at 8 p.m. in Chapin Hall. General admission tickets are $5; admission is free with a Williams I.D. The concert is presented by the Student Activities Council with the support of the Afro-American Studies Committee, the Black Student Union and the Music Dept.

radiate a certain unrighteousness appropriate to Tartuffe.

But especially rewarding is the portrayal by Molly Luetkemeyer 'Ex of Mariane's maid, Dorine. As the archetypal servant who has more common sense than her employers, Luetkemeyer demonstrates a wonderful comedic sense and weaves her way through the play with a cocky confidence that shines.

Visual success

Visually, the Williams theatre production is quite successful.

Deborah A. Brothers' scenic and costume design share a uniformly light, pastel-oriented palette, save for Tartuffe's brown and white (but subtly polished) attire. The elaborate and sumptuous clothing combines with the simple and elegant set in an artful balance of the complex and the minimal.

Likewise praiseworthy is Cosmo A. Catalano, Jr.'s lighting, which uses fluidly changing purples, blues, and the occasional blood-red to complement the play's moods.

Tartuffe is both funny and provocative, and is a valuable piece of theatre. The Williams theatre production, judging from last Friday's performance, serves Mollere well, and conveys much of what it sets out to do. If its knot of perfection is somewhat loosened by some ill-defined characterizations and pacing, it remains knotted nonetheless and is an attractive and entertaining presentation.

Tartuffe will be performed again on October 31 and November 5 and 6. Curtain time is 7:30 pm. Tickets are $2; $1 with Williams I.D.

The portion of the program preceding Kim's performance was not without its share of excitement, however, thanks in part to Scott Lindroth, a young composer who attended the performance of his A Fire's Bright Song. Written in 1981 and revised in April of this year, the piece features exchange of tones and melodies by various sections of the orchestra in a highly minimalist style.

The concert opened with the Berkshire Symphony's rendition of Malcolm Arnold's Tam O'Shanter Overture. Both in this piece and in the following orchestra seemed to be blessed with an enormous yet coherent violin section.

Although at times the section seemed to possess a mind of its own, the performance was not made any less by its independence. The Scherzo was especially beautiful and featured the orchestra performing together in a very vivacious manner.

Cow Bell teaches art of knitting

by Marilyn Germano

Knowing how to knit carries with it a number of advantages. For one thing, it gives you something to do while you watch television, and you feel much less guilty about wasting time in front of the tube. For another, knitting a wool sweater is much less expensive than buying one that has already been knit for you. But suppose you don't know how to knit. Wait—you say that your grandmother could teach you? But what if Grandma is not willing to fly the 2,000 miles to Williams College just to give you lessons? Your best option, then, is to go to the Cow Bell.

Located on Spring Street, the Cow Bell has been in the hands of co-owners Sarah Campbell and Ruth Greene since 1979. In spite of its small size, it offers a wide variety of yarns and threads and other notions, so both knitters and needlepointers have a convenient source of supplies. The walls are hung with sample sweaters, knit by Campbell and Greene, to show clients what can be done with different patterns and yarns.

Indeed, many of the Cow Bell's customers have already learned to knit. But that is not meant to discourage anyone who has never picked up needles or a skein of yarn. "We have a free-floating floor mat to learn to knit," said Campbell. What that means, she continued, is that anyone with a desire to learn to knit can walk into the Cow Bell at any time and request a free personal knitting lesson.

The instruction that Campbell and Greene offer does not end with one lesson; rather, they encourage novice knitters to return any time they run into problems. "We know lots of little tricks to help a person out, with as little pain as possible," said Campbell.

Ten percent male

During the course of a school year, over 100 students go to the Cow Bell to learn to knit; of that number, 10 or so are male, according to Campbell. Knitting becomes a really popular pastime during Winter Study, and sweaters abound.

Campbell reported that the Icelandic sweater (or some variation thereof) is the most popular choice for a first sweater. She said that a type of yarn called Lopli is the easiest to start with. "If you can knit a Lopli sweater," she asserted, "you can knit just about anything. It teaches you lots, and it's something you can do in a hurry. Once you know the basics, you can move onto something for your next sweater."

Struggle

Just how difficult is it to learn to knit? That depends on the individual. Some people, said Campbell, will struggle and

Word processing

The college also began to sell Macs and IBM PCs in 1984. "Really the salvation of the line problems (extremely high demand for not enough computers) was students buying their own micros," Wright said.

"No one expected the college to provide everyone with a free typewriter," said Bruce Kieffer, Associate Professor of German since 1978. "The same thing had to apply to computers."

Consequently, there are no plans to expand the number of micros available. "We've hit a space limit," said Wright. "There's no room to put any more. Also, we've begun to arrive financially at a point where we have to start replacing what we already own. The life of a micro is three or four years."

The faculty was remarkably adaptable to the switch to word processing, according to Wright. "A few faculty members had done word processing elsewhere, and just jumped right in on it."

Professional machines

"Many faculty members have a machine at home and in their office; they've turned into real devotees. But that's as it should be. They are professional writers and these are professional machines," said Grabois.

Professor of English Peter Berek supports the idea of student word processing on large texts in particular. He insists that his honors students use micros for their theses. "You can ask for continued revisions that you couldn't in good conscience insist on with typewriters."

Negative effects

Kieffer also points out the negative effects of word processing, especially in the beginning. "Students were writing less well, because knowing that they could use the computer, they could wait until the last minute."

"It has some bad effects," agrees Steve Groh '88, a writing workshop tutor. "People tend to revise just a little bit, instead of going back over their papers. But it saves a lot of time, and makes the paper look better in general."

"Better quality machines"

In comparing the college's development of word processing with other institutions, Wright said, "We were a little late getting into micros, but we now have better quality machines—Macs instead of Apple II's, for example. Technically we're doing better, especially in laser printing. We have a better situation than most other places."

this play a "Megabreak! It was a tremendous momentum change for us."

After this timely Tufts turnover, the two teams traded punts, setting up the final, and most explosive big play of the game for the Ephs. Facing first down on our own 23, Kennedy gave the ball to Chesley who glided right, burst by the would-be Tufts tacklers, and sailed alone down the sideline for a 77 yard TD run, making the score 26-7.

Obvious credit must be bestowed upon the offensive line, which did a stellar job for the fifth consecutive week. Not only did it continually open gaping holes for backs Chesley (176 yds. 2 TDs), Hern (3 carries-36 yds. 1 TD), Holden (17 carries-66 yds.), and Kennedy (13 carries-89 yds. 1 TD), it protected the QB when he went back to throw, allowing zero sacks on the day.

Junior offensive lineman Joe Thompson, who at 6'5", 260 pounds, is the biggest Eph hog, explained why this O-line dominates its opponents with such ease: "We don't care what the conditions are, as long as we are on the gridiron, hitting somebody!"

Prior to the tangle with Tufts, the squad beat up on Bowdoin in an easy 16 point win. Paced by Kennedy, who rushed for one score and passed for another — on a beautiful 43 yard timing pattern to wideout Todd Streiter '90 — the Ephs dominated the Polar Bears in the last meeting between the two teams until 1993.

This week the squad travels to Union, a game Farley described as "scary." The Dutchmen, perennially a national title contender, are in the midst of a slump. But in their loss to Coast Guard this past week, Union rallied for a 35 point second half behind re-instated QB standout Mike Gargiulo. The game will mark the 100th year of the rivalry, and is the last scheduled contest between the two teams.

Farley expects his squad to "do more of the same things" it successfully did against Tufts, utilizing its potent running attack, as well as Kennedy's "athletic potential. (His recent running success) has made his pass game even more effective," said the first year coach.

body. Against Tufts, for instance, their themewas "Safe Intimacy at Williams." The band's other co-leader, Paul Danielson '88, said, "When we write our commentary each week it gives us a chance to be creative in a different way."

In utilizing their creativity, the band members see themselves as defenders of Williams. Timmons said, "Part of every show has to, in some way, denigrate the football team's opponent. Amherst is good because there's so much material."

Danielson spoke fondly of the Amherst game three years ago when the band was forcibly removed from the field. Bandless Amherst does not let the Moo-cows perform. In 1984 they hired a local high school band to perform. Danielson said that the Moo-cows took umbrage with the tykes performing at a college game, so they marched onto the field and made it very difficult for them to hold their formation.

After the ensuing ruckus, letters of complaint were written to President Chandler, and the band felt rather smug. Although Cardillo did not put them up to it, he said, "At the time, I was quite happy." In a general statement about Cardillo's paternal attitude, Timmons said, "Mr. Cardillo takes all the heat for us if we get in trouble, usually very well and uncomplainingly."

Car Crash

The band was unable to cause such mischief at the Trinity game this year. While en route to Hartford, the bus they had chartered was involved in a head-on collision with a car that had crept into the wrong lane on the twisting roads of the Mohawk trail. Although no one in the bus was hurt, the car was demolished and its occupants had to be taken away in an ambulance. One member of the band who wished to remain anonymous said, "The drivers (of the car) were apparently drunk, and there were foreign substances rumored to be in the car as well as a rifle which was lying on the ground after the crash, and the car itself was a rental... The sympathy level dropped from most of the guys in the band after they found that out."

Timmons said that Danielson and Erol Onel '88 were particularly helpful, directing traffic and keeping people out of the way until the blood could be cleaned off of the road. "The band tends to be a whole bunch of screw-ups and we were actually pretty organized that time," said Timmons.

The band recovered from their fateful trip to Hartford, and has overseen two consecutive wins since the crash. Against Tufts they encouraged the team with cheers such as "E-X-L-A-X, What does it make you do? GO GO GO GO GO." Such unbridled boisterousness is one of the things that band members like the most. "It allows you to yell at the other team and not feel foolish about it," said Onel.

tion Center legislation. NBCC president Corydon Thurston said he hoped to collect 10,000 signatures in ten days.

"This project needs impetus, a focus, and to sustain frontal attention," Thurston said of the petition drive. He said names will be collected through the first week of November, when he and a delegation of Mass-MoCA supporters hope to deliver them to Speaker of the House George Keverian.

Thurston added that both the Williamstown Board of Trade and the Adams Chamber of Commerce have passed resolutions in support of the petition. The Berkshire Tourist Bureau has also sent a letter of resolution in favor of the measure, he said.

"We're leaving no stone unturned in our efforts to show grass-roots support," Thurston said.

Saatchi loan

In an October 26 Newsweek article on the project, Krens disclosed the agreement for the long-term loan of works from the Saatchi's collection.

Zelda Stern, public relations director for the WCMA, said the loan consists of works by five American artists of the 1960's and 1970's, including Richard Serra, John Chamberlain and Bruce Nauman.

The Saatchi works would complement long-term loans from the collections of Giuseppe Panza di Milan and the German Architecture Museum of Frankfurt. Those collections were the subjects of preliminary loan agreements which Krens announced in the spring.

The Sunday night snacks time was favored because it was agreed among the members that students would be more open and relaxed to talk about the issue in other settings.

"We need a sense of urgency," said Tracey Blankenship '89, secretary of the council, summing up the council's approach to the plan.

The Council also continued its ongoing discussion on the availability of serious introductory courses for non-majors in Division 3 departments. Members of the council's sub-committee established to examine the issue, Blair Newton '89, Marisa Reddy '89 and Mitch Wong '89, were present at the meeting to participate in the discussions.

"We are trying to make the guts a little bit more scientific," said Newton.

Citing Chemistry Demonstrated one of the chemistry department's introductory courses for non-majors, Zinn said, "That's the kind of thing these folks (the non-majors) really need." Megan Jacobson '91 said that some people would like to see more psychology courses given Division 3 credits.

At the close of the meeting, Zinn announced that plans are being worked out for him, Melcher, and Blankenship to meet with Michael Russo, the coordinator of the college's physical education program, to discuss the possibility of granting physical education credits for participation in intramurals and independent exercises.

that really be a better world in which to be a parent?"

Although poor families may not be able to support themselves, they may be able to work together with other members of the community in order to supply their needs. In this sense, the community, unlike the government, can become an alternate source of satisfaction for the individual.

Murray, a strong believer in human capability to do good and an admirer of the traditional community life he observed while living in Thailand, believes the community can work together to supply its needs in the absence of government welfare programs. He said, "If you had a system in which the federal government didn't do these things, they'd get done."

a second straight uncontested Little Three Title when they could manage only a 1-1 tie in double-overtime against Amherst, despite outshooting them 14-7.

Senior co-captain Lisa Tenerowicz put the Ephwomens ahead off a Flaherty assist with a minute and a half remaining in the first half, but Williams was unable to break through again due to outstanding goaltending by Amherst's Margaret Price. "Amherst's goaltender had a great game," said Mason, "She's a freshman with great talent, and she made some plays that were simply unbelievable."

In other action last week, Williams beat Westfield State 3-0 on Westfield's rain soaked artificial surface. Tenerowicz tallied two and Flaherty one to contribute to the Eph's victory.

Williams hosted Connecticut College yesterday in their final tuneup for the NIAC tourney which will be held next Saturday, most likely at Trinity.

backfield and into their goal area. Our passes and defense were excellent."

Tie with Tufts

This Saturday, the Ephwomens staged a home field confrontation against a visiting Tufts squad ranked 6th in New England. The outcome: a 0-0 deadlock. Melendy explained, "It was a real frustrating game. We had some scoring opportunities that we didn't convert into goals. This was the third time in a row that we went into overtime against Tufts."

Melendy looks forward to the last regular season game, tomorrow at home against Mt. Holyoke. "If we beat Mt. Holyoke, we'll definitely be in the NIAC tournament." Even though Williams has not beaten Mt. Holyoke in four years, the fact that Amherst beat them earlier this season should give the team added confidence as it goes on to round up this season.

Volleyball cruises to 20 wins, 2nd at Invitational

by Ted Hobart

After Bates served the last points of the anticlimactic third game of the championship match of the first-ever Williams Invitational tournament on Saturday, Coach Nancy Roberts put her Ephs second place finish in perspective.

"I'm very happy about the way we played today. Bates is one of the best teams in New England. They'll probably be seeded first in the NIAC tournament." In fact this head to head match will play a large part in deciding the seedings.

The third game 15-3 loss does not tell the whole story of the final match, however, as the first two games were both closely fought. After losing the first game 14-16, the Ephs fought back to take the second 15-13. The aggressive net play and tenacious back row play of the two teams in both games made for long, exciting points which had the crowd fired up for the rubber game. Early on in that third game, however, the Ephs let their momentum slip away, and although they showed enthusiasm, it was not the sharp, inspired play of the previous games.

Earlier in the day, the Ephs romped through their pool, beating Westfield State, Union, and Mt. Holyoke in two games each. In fact, the squad gave up less than three points per game on average in those three matches. Trinity fell in the first playoff round before the team faced Bates in the finals.

Little 3 split

Each of the first two events in Chandler Gymnasium has been a mixed success for the Ephs. In Little Three action last Saturday, the squad beat Amherst easily 15-4, 15-5 behind the hard hitting of Shelley Whelpton '90 and the ace serves of tri-captain Mo Brand '88. The victory over Amherst was a appropriate way to christen the new gymnasium.

On October 24th, the team traveled to Northampton for the Smith Invitational. The Ephwomens followed Smith and Wellesley, and led MIT and Mount Holyoke in fourth place. Platt headed the team again with a time of 19:35 and was eighth overall out of 106 runners. The remainder of the top five were: Dannhauer, 19th in 20:24; Cocks, 21st in 20:38; Stacey Smith '90, 27th in 20:49; and Hams, 30th in 20:58.

Platt commented on the team's success, "We trained very hard the week before Smith so the three hills in a row in the last miles were bearable. The course was very well marked and well groomed, which also helped us out. The NESAC course, on the other hand, was very rocky and finding good footing was difficult." Many team members expressed the feeling that the

Smith race was even more competitive than the NESACs.

With Pierce, Hams, and Weissel back from their rests, the team expects to place very strongly at the Little Three race, to be held at Williams next Saturday at 12:30. The Ephwomens have beaten Amherst consistently this season, and do not expect a great challenge from them. The team's main concern is beating Wesleyan, the biggest obstacle between them and the Little Three Title.

Male ruggers smash Friars in 42-0 romp

by Andy Harris

The WRFC romped to four victories Saturday in front of a boisterous parents' weekend crowd. Inspired by a sobering 12-3 victory a week ago against M.I.T., the Williams A-side rebounded with a 42-0 drubbing of the Friars of Providence.

Playing the best rugby of the '87 season, the White Dogs surmounted the adversity of injury, as Bryan Baird '89 fell to a hip pointer early in the first half. Minutes before, the junior outside-center had scored the first, and eventual game-winning try to pace the A's to their fifth victory.

The line was to touch down five more times that afternoon while the hard-mauling, loose-rolling scrum added two more scores, both by the hands of lock Tom Higgins '88. Johnny Hollenberg led all scorers with two tries of his own as well as five conversions, giving him 18 points for the afternoon.

Not to be overshadowed, the Killer B's, powered by the inestimable desire of sophomore J.

Chapman Petersen brawled to a 7-0 triumph over the University of Vermont. The winning points came off a first half penalty converted by winger Steve Felix '90. Petersen's tumbling try through a crowd of UVM defenders late in the second half was the game's best play, providing a margin of safety to preserve the win.

Mirroring the A-side game, the screamin' C-men secured victory early before losing the player who scored the points. Peeling the ball out of the scrum from his number eight position, Freshman Matt Conlan galloped downfield before dishing off to Alton Goldstick '90, who motored the rest of the way for the score. Goldstick later separated his shoulder and had to leave the field.

The final match of the day pitted the C-prime squad against a tough third team from Vermont. Williams was physically overmatched, but the Ephs responded with a stunning 12-6 victory, serving notice to Vermont that the scrappy White Dogs are ready to play Rugby with the big boys anytime. Playing in a Williams uniform for the first time in five months, eight man Jeff Hellman '87 proved that corporate life doesn't diminish rugby talent in the short run, as he assisted on a score by Vin Cannato '90.

Williams rides the crest of its 5-1 record into the fall tournament next weekend at Orono, Maine against New England's eleven best Division II clubs.

Women harriers run to 3rd place at Smith

by Mariam Nafley

Recovering from a series of illnesses and a subsequent performance below their normal standard at the NESCAC race on October 17, the women's cross country team placed a strong third out of 11 teams at the Smith Invitational place finish in the eleven team field.

The figures are deceiving, however, according to Cathy Cocks '89: "There was only a seven point separation between the second place team and us; if a few places had gone the other way, the final placing would have been very different."

The scores were as follows: Tufts 39, Bowdoin 109, Bates 111, Middlebury 112 and Williams 116. The top five Williams runners were: Anne Platt '91, 13th overall; Ingrid Welsel '90, 18th; Ann Dannhauer '90, 19th; Jennie Garrett '89, 29th; and Cocks, 38th.

Creative decision-making. It's the rule, not the exception, at Chubb.

The property/casualty insurance business demands an ability to make carefully calculated, creative decisions.

Because it's the element of risk that makes insurance necessary—and exciting. Property and casualty insurance involves the highest sort of risk, and is the least predictable form of insurance.

Why? It has been said that people die more or less "on schedule." But who can predict when—or if—a bridge will collapse, an ocean liner will sink, a trusted employee will embezzle, or a home will be burglarized?

Creative thinkers make successful property/casualty insurance professionals. And we should know. It's been our business for over 100 years.

Chubb's National Recruiting Coordinator Mike Oppe will be on hand Wednesday, October 28th for an information meeting beginning at 7:00 p.m. in the Office of Career Counseling. He'll be joined by Williams Alumnus Carlos Diaz '87. We cordially invite you to stop by and learn more about Chubb, and our innovative way of doing business. If you're a creative thinker, you will be interested to hear what we have to say.

* COMING NOVEMBER 7th and 8th: 60's WEEKEND *

SPORTS SHORTS

M. X-Country

Just as the season began to look up for the male harriers, a series of injuries swept through the team. Ted Arrowsmith '88 and Gil McCabe '89, both of whom are in the top three for the team, may be unable to run in the Little Three Championships this Saturday.

Arrowsmith, who contracted bronchitis just before the NES-CACs last week, made a valiant effort to run the race but was unable to finish. McCabe badly hurt his ankle, and could not run in the NES-CACs or the tri-meet versus MIT and Tufts this past Saturday. In addition, Dave Tewkesbury '89 is fighting a back injury, which has thus far kept him from running in any recent races.

These three injuries were enough to seriously hinder any attempts at winning NES-CACs last Saturday, as the team finished ahead of only two squads, Trinity and Connecticut College. Those who did turn in good performances included Dylan Cooper '91 and senior co-captain Dave Glendon.

In the match against the Jumbos and the Bantams, the squad placed last, despite the efforts of Nate Mcvey-Finney '90, Dave Sprague '88, and Evan Driscoll '91, who finished 13th, 16th, and 17th respectively. This loss was expected as coach Peter Farwell was resting most of the top runners for the Little Three race.

—David Nadelman

Crew

The men's varsity eight, with its highest Head of the Charles finish in ten years, rowed to an impressive fifth place ten days ago in Cambridge, Massachusetts. In the Championship four race, the Williams four took 24th in a strong field of fifty, which was won by the Canadian national team.

The eight, starting well back in the fifty boat field, passed six boats during the course of the twisting, three mile race. Their time of 15:39 put them 12 seconds off the lead. Said Jim Buck '88, stroke and co-captain, "This finish reveals our tremendous potential against our

The three-quarter mile long starboard turn proved to be the decisive section of the race, as the crew passed four other boats. Taking the inside of the turn, the starboard side: Mark Cullen '90, Jeff Klip '84, Drew Erdman '88, and Andy Hoddick '89, along with the steering of coxswain Lisa Nahf '88 was able to hug the inside buoys and easily decimate their slower moving competition.

Taking a tight turn through Weeks Footbridge, the eight drew even with two other crews. This placed them in a potentially dangerous position: three boats abreast, heading into the two-boat wide Anderson Bridge. However, the crew was able to take a ten and move up a boat-length. This gave them a clear shot through Anderson, and port-side Bock, Seth Burns '89, Mike Nader '90 and David Katz '89 easily brought the boat around into a good position for the starboard turn.

The Head of the Charles was the final race in a successful fall season highlighted by fourth place finishes at the Head of the Connecticut and the Textile Regatta in Lowell, Massachusetts.

—Lisa Nahf

W. Rugby

The 2-1 WWRFC killer-B side exploded this weekend, beating the Southern Connecticut women by a 16-4 score. Kristin Moomaw '90 made the first try of the game in a line-out play near the try zone. The Agard house contingent of the team dominated the second half as Gina Coleman '90 and Laura Whitman '90 both scored try's.

The final try of the game was made by Kathy Lapey '90, who burst through her opposition with the B-side pack close behind her. Sammy Rogers '90 made many excellent tackles.

The C squad then moved in to meet Middlebury and played a close game against the lasses in blue. Janet Baker '90 scored a magnificent try in the first half and Katie Carr '91 followed it up with a successful conversion kick which kept the women in a narrow lead throughout. Despite Mid's best efforts, the C's carried the day with a final score of 10-8.

The A-side played the final game of the day against a rag-tag team from UConn and won by the astounding score of 34-0. Scrum half Kerry Killander '89 scored twice and Thomas Street was well represented as the residents who lurk therein each took a tumble in the try-zone: seniors Janet Mansfield, Jean Janson, Sharon Burke, Sonja Lengnick and Annie Cordova.

Two weekends ago, the A's participated in the Mayor's Cup Tournament in Boston, beating MIT and losing to Harvard and UVM. Last weekend they took their revenge on Harvard, beating the Crimson by a narrow, but well deserved margin. With Amherst weekend quickly approaching, the WWRFC is still in good standing with a record of 4-3.

A Letter From The Jeffs: An Offer We Can Refuse

Two weeks ago I received this letter from the presumptuous sports editors of the Amherst Student. I thought you might be interested in reading it.

Amherst, Mass.
October 12, 1987

Dear Al,
This is a copy of a letter we have sent to The Williams Record. Please respond to Dave Truman, P.O. Box 823, Amherst College, Amherst, MA 01002 as soon as possible.

As the traditional Amherst-Williams football game approaches, our confidence knows no bounds. Due to the fact that we have won the last six games in a row and that your team is currently 0-3, we have a proposition for you. As sports editors of The Amherst Student, we hereby put our journalistic credibility on the line via the following gentlemanly wager.

If (oops, we mean when) Amherst beats the Purple Cows (nice nickname, by the way) on November 14, you will agree to run the following phrase in headline print: "Amherst College and Amherst Football are superior to Williams College and Williams Football in every respect. Go Lord Jeffs!" Should, through some extremely bizarre twist of fate, the Ephs (another good nickname, we might add) upset the mighty Lord Jeffs, we will run an equivalent phrase of your choosing.

We hope that you are gentleman enough to accept our bet (though we doubt it, since you do go to Williams). As representatives of the finest college in the nation and, of course, the best in the Little Three, we humbly await your response.

Terris Irradiant,

Matthew B. Morschower '90

Sports Editors, The Amherst Student

P.S. We can discuss other bets on the game (of other, more practical items, perhaps) either by mail or before our victory. See you in Williamstown (if we can find it).

What was that about journalistic credibility?

Football routs Bowdoin and Tufts at home

by Al Mottur

Two weeks ago, the future of the Williams football team looked bleak. Now, it sparkles with promise. Rising from the dismal depths of a 0-3 record and overcoming a seemingly ineffective offense, the squad has surged to two straight impressive home wins over Bowdoin and Tufts.

Ten days ago, the squad began its trip back toward respectability with a surprising 24-8 victory over the Polar Bears of Bowdoin, who were ranked first in New England at the time. Three days ago, the Ephs traveled a bit farther with a convincing 29-15 rout of Tufts. Both wins, coming in front of partisan Weston Field crowds, showcased a suddenly revived and entertaining offense which produced numerous big plays and kept turnovers to a minimum.

Men's soccer sweeps by Jumbos with ease

by Ted Ruger

With victories over Tufts, Bowdoin, and R.P.I., the men's soccer team upped its season record to 9-1 and continued to draw closer to an ECAC tournament berth. The Ephs, ranked second in New England and eleventh in the nation in Division III, will face a tough Babson squad this afternoon in an away contest.

Saturday's Tufts game was the scene of a convincing 3-0 Eph victory at Cole Field. A large and vocal home crowd cheered on the team as it dominated the Jumbos both offensively and defensively.

Doug Brooks '90 put the home team on top early with a head goal off a pass from classmate Dan Calichman just 5:42 into the game. Calichman lofted a free kick into the Tufts' goalmouth and Brooks knocked it past keeper Paul Aurette. "That goal was exactly like a pass I scored on from Dan the week before. I figured if it worked once, it might work again, so I ran for the same spot," said Brooks.

Brooks, to Masters ...

The score remained 1-0 until early in the second half when Brooks and Mike Masters '89 conspired to put the game away. At the 53:19 mark of the match, Brooks beat a Tufts defender at the top of the penalty box and dished an assist to the feet of Masters, who redirected the ball into the back of the net.

Just two minutes later, the combination of Brooks and Masters clicked once again. Brooks sped down the left wing and served a cross over the outstretched hands of keeper Aurette and onto the head of Masters for the goal-scoring shot.

"Today's game was a good team victory. We got excellent movement off the ball and pretty much neutralized their offense," said coach Michael Russo. He also emphasized the strong play of the back four, which held the Jumbos to only three shots on the day.

Last week, the Ephs won a pair of games, beating Bowdoin at home and R.P.I. on the road by identical 2-1 scores. Brooks and Rob Lake '91 scored in the Bowdoin match, while Ambi Stern '90 and captain Nick Nachamkin '88 tallied against R.P.I.

In two key games this week, the team faces Babson on the road today and returns home Saturday against always-tough Connecticut College.

Senior cornerback John Edie looks for six with this interception against Bowdoin ten days ago. (Camp)

Against the Jumbos, the squad struck fast and often, scoring touchdowns on its first three offensive series, and amazingly, on three consecutive offensive plays. After three Tufts plays and a punt, Williams took over on the Jumbo 45. On second and nine, sophomore tailback Neal Chesley, who had played behind Maurice Holden '90 for much of this season, scampered 44 yards for a TD and a 7-0 lead. After the kickoff and a John Edie '88 interception, fullback Lars Hem, another member of the outstanding sophomore crop of runners, plowed his way to a 34 yard TD run. All of a sudden it was 13-0.

The onslaught was not over. Again taking over after three plays and a Jumbo punt, Williams had the ball on its own 45. This time it was junior quarterback Scott Kennedy's turn to do some dancing. The second year transfer from California started out on a simple first down option play and swept to his left. What usually ends in a five or six yard gain turned into a lot more, as Kennedy cut back against the wave of Tufts defenders and sprinted untouched for a 55 yard TD.

'Megabreak!'

With the score 19-0, Tufts began to rally behind its impressive wishbone attack. After scoring a touchdown, the Jumbos were about to draw within 19-14 when FB Tim Fanikos fumbled on what would have been a two yard TD plunge. Coach Richard Farley called

9-1-1 Field Hockey rolls by Tufts, NIAC's in sight

by Marc McDermott

The field hockey team enjoyed great success in the past two weeks, winning three matches while tying Amherst to improve its record to a stellar 9-1-1 and secure a tie for the Little Three Title.

The Amherst game took a back seat in importance to last Saturday's game versus Tufts, as both the Ephwomen's and the Jumbos' NIAC tournament hopes rested on a victory.

In what Coach Chris Mason called "the most exciting game we've played this season", Williams defeated Tufts on the strength of sophomore midfielder Kristin Frederikson's goal and Junior Wyn Hohlt's seventh shutout of the year.

Just minutes into the first half, Sophomore Mo Flaherty dished the ball to Junior Kirsten Neuse who in turn fed a perfect pass to the charging Frederikson, who put it home for the game's only goal. Hohlt turned back all six of the Jumbos' shots on goal, and Senior co-captain Suzanne Falcone played excellent defense to shut down Tuft's attack.

"It was an exhausting game for both the players and coaches," commented Mason. "Suzanne was a key to our victory. She anticipates and reads the game as well as anyone. She had a great game and took away the entire right side of the field from them. All in all, though, it was a total team effort, everyone was on top of their game."

The victory virtually assures Williams one of the four berths in the NIAC championships. The Ephwomen will most likely be seeded second or third along with Bowdoin, but behind undefeated Trinity, which dealt Williams their only loss this season.

W. Soccer posts nine game unbeaten streak

by James Lee

Raising its record to 8-2-2 on the season, the women's soccer team continued its nine game unbeaten streak with an impressive 3-0-1 record over visiting teams from Union, Amherst, Connecticut College and Tufts during the past two weeks.

With the outstanding streak over the past month, the team has earned a number five ranking in New England and has a great shot at a berth in the upcoming NIAC tournament.

The biggest win in the streak came last Saturday as the team registered a 1-0 shutout victory over a visiting Amherst squad. The triumph, coming at the heels of a 4-1 rout of Union, was the team's first over the Lord Jeffs in four years, and it brought the squad its first Little Three Crown in that same period of time.

Schaen connects

Lori Schaen '89 scored the game-winner at the 27 minute mark of the first half, heading in a pass from co-captain Christine Boddicker '88 past both the Amherst sweeper and the goalie, into the left corner of the net. The Ephs displayed tenacious defense and fine teamwork throughout the game as they outshot the Lord Jeffs 19-13.

Last Wednesday, the Ephs hosted their toughest opponent of the season — Connecticut College. Coming into Williams-town, Conn College was ranked fourth in New England and 14th in the country, but the Ephwomen rose to the challenge, winning 1-0. The lone goal of the game came 22 minutes into the first half when Boddicker fired it home from 18 yards out off an assist from Schaen. "It was a very even game. It was by far the best game we played," commented coach Lisa Melendy.

Boddicker added, "Everything seemed to come together well, and thus we were able to move the ball well from our

Prospective students party (too) hard visiting Williams

by Mariam Nafley

Prospective students that visit Williams try to impress members of the Admissions Office in various ways. Last month, three prospectives were so impressive that the Admissions Office sent a letter on October 14 to all freshmen and Junior Advisors describing their activities while visiting Williams.

"Three times this fall we have had a situation where a prospective student has needed medical attention because of excessive consumption of alcohol," the letter said. "This past weekend, a prospective student required hospitalization as a result of on-campus drinking." The memorandum asked hosts to remind their prospectives of the College's drinking policy and not to encourage them to drink.

Why send out a memorandum now when, according to Assistant Director of Admissions Richard Nesbitt, similar incidents have been going on for years? Purple Key Co-President Dave Allen '89 replied, "It's a bigger deal now that the law has changed — the college can be held liable, and has to cover itself legally."

Nesbitt expressed doubt about the memorandum's potential for deterring further incidents of prospectives' consumption of alcohol. "What kind of drastic measures can you take with people who don't listen," he said. "They are practically impossible to enforce. The bottom line is for everyone to use their common sense — that's basically the drinking policy of the school," he replied.

Both Nesbitt and Allen indicated that it is often the prospectives who arrive on campus eager to drink. "It's something that the applicants should be concerned about," Nesbitt said, "that reports of deplorable behavior may reach the Admissions Office. They're guests of our college."

Robin Lloyd '91, who hosted one of the prospectives who received medical treatment, said his name had been withdrawn from the hosting list without his being notified of the decision or given a chance to tell his side of the story.

Allen said, "We haven't kicked him (Lloyd) off the list; we're just waiting to talk to him about the incident before putting another prospective in his room."

Conversations with the prospectives themselves revealed a wide range of preconceptions and anxieties about Williams, from the important to the trivial, while none of the prospectives interviewed said that the recent drinking incidents would have any effect on what they already thought about the college. When asked what image comes to mind when students at her school think of Williams, Maura Gallagher of Red Hook, N.Y., replied, "No image comes to mind, because nobody at my school has ever heard of Williams — I come from a small town."

Deans consider locking buildings

by Stephanie Jones

The Dean's office is investigating different types of lock systems for college buildings. According to Dean of the College Stephen Fix, the issue will be presented to the college community for debate before Thanksgiving break.

"There was conversation about this over the years," Fix said. "I would say the conversation was intensified last winter (after the reported rape of a Williams freshman on campus last January).

The Committee On Undergraduate Life (CUL) recommended last June that the college pursue the possibility of installing a student ID card-activated system, according to last-year's CUL chair Assistant Dean William Wagner.

Wagner said the CUL recommended that the college investigate the cost-effectiveness of different systems as well as the feasibility of installing the systems.

Automatically-locked

The system the CUL considered would automatically lock dormitories after a certain hour, but students could enter any dormitory with their ID. Wagner said that a system of this type would cost anywhere from $180,000 to $280,000, depending on how many buildings are secured.

"I want an open debate," Fix said. He said there will be an open meeting at which students can offer their views. He added that opinions from the faculty and administration members, as well as advice from security, will play an important role in the debate.

Director of Security Ransom Jenks said that he thinks students are likely to oppose the lock system because they do not seem to want to lock their doors now. "If students were very much opposed to it, the school would not spend the money," he said.

Fix said the Dean's office is investigating several types of systems. He said the system chosen will most likely be a type of electronic system on the outside of buildings. "Some people would like such a system not only in residential buildings but in other buildings," he added.

Follow-up discussions

Race Relations committee to hold panel

by Debbie Snyder

Members of the Commission on Campus Race Relations describe their efforts as falling into two categories: institutional reforms and changes in student interaction. The commission will introduce the latter issue to the student body with a panel and follow-up discussions next Sunday.

The panel, "Opening Up: Perceptions of Racism and Differences at Williams," will consist of eight students and one alumnae. Elyse Rosenblum '88, who chaired the commission sub-committee that prepared the panel, said, "Our idea was to get as wide and varied a picture of how people perceive racism at Williams as well as how they perceive their position at Williams."

Panelists include Ken Alleyne '88, Kim Barnsdollar '91, Penny Beach '87, Jose Calero '89, Bill Hoch '89, Kim Ma '89, John Rumsey '88, Courtney Saunders '89 and Staci Williams '88.

Perspective building

"The spirit of the panel discussion is to give people the opportunity to experience racism in all its forms," Carter Zinn '88, college council president and liaison to the commission, said. "It's aimed at perspective building and perspective widening and not just a voicing of grievances."

Zinn stressed the importance of the follow-up discussions that will take place in all houses and entries after the panel. They will be led by house representatives to the College Council.

Discussing the expected student turnout, commission chairman Timothy Cook said, "You're never going to have all 2,000 students show up. There's always going to be some self-selection."

Cook said that in addition to organizing the panel, the commission is exploring institutional reforms which would have long-term effects on the college. This exploration has included a review of the existing grievance procedure and the formulation of a proposal for a mandatory freshmen assembly on race relations. In conjunction with the Committee on Educational Policy (CEP), the commission is also evaluating the sensitivity of the curriculum to minority concerns.

Grievance procedure

If a student wishes to file a grievance against a faculty member, according to the existing procedure he or she must speak to the Dean. Cook said the commission met with members of the Black Student Union to learn about problems with this procedure.

"A plus is that it encourages working out things in an informal way," Cook said. "A minus is there's a perception that it's very slow and very cumbersome." The commission will reach a decision on whether or not to recommend changes in the grievance procedure by the end of this academic year, he said.

The commission also plans to have a mandatory assembly for freshmen next October, to be followed by entry talks. Zinn said the assembly will be for freshmen, because, "They're the only people you can pull mandatory stuff on."

In the area of curricular changes, Rosenblum said the commission is focusing on the content of introductory-level courses. The aim, she said, is to ensure that departments do not simply offer courses about minority issues but that they address minority concerns within general courses.

Council discusses race relations and parking

by James Lee

"We are trying to get way down into the more insidious, subtle forms of racism on campus ... These are issues that run beyond policy," College Council President Carter Zinn '88 said at Thursday's council meeting.

Zinn was speaking about the upcoming panel discussion on race relations and follow-up discussions in residential houses. The council continued its planning for the panel and the discussions at the meeting.

The council also heard reports from representatives from the Williams chapter of MassPIRG and liaisons to the Committee on Undergraduate Life (CUL) and the Parking Committee. The issue of the status of women's athletics at Williams was discussed too.

Zinn said that the upcoming panel discussion, "Opening Up: Perceptions of Racism and Differences at Williams", scheduled for this Sunday night at 7:30 in the Baxter North dining hall, will consist of eight students and one graduate.

Zinn said that freshman faculty advisors, faculty house associates and council representatives will lead the follow-up discussions in freshman entries and upperclass houses.

"The goal of the panel and discussions is to give people an opportunity and an education so that they can understand what it must be like for 20 black students to arrive at the Berkshires at the beginning of the school year to start a school life supposedly on an equal footing with white students," Zinn said.

Zinn asked representatives from houses that do not have snacks on Sunday nights to schedule snacks on this Sunday night following the panel discussion.

Rajiv Vrudhula '90, a member of the Williams chapter of the MassPIRG, reported that the MassPIRG is currently lobbying for the approval of a water testing bill in the state legislature. He said that Rep. Sherwood Guernsey, state representative for the Williams-town area, had already approved the bill and that the current lobbying effort aims to reconcile the two different versions of the bill put forward in the House and the Senate.

Parking the way it oughta be

Parking is a subject near and dear to the hearts of many Williams students. Those of us with cars on campus are acutely aware of the chronic space shortage in some student parking lots, and are perhaps even more aware of the ever-vigilant security officers who continually adorn our windshield wipers with parking tickets.

The parking shortage problem is obvious and is being addressed by the administration and the College Council. Both have established ad hoc committees devoted to the issue, and ideas are in the works to create more parking in various parts of campus.

The parking ticket situation, however, has received no such institutional examination. It should, for the time has come to abandon the inefficient and largely ignored system of parking fines currently in place and establish in their place a system of moderated but enforced fines that will deter illegal parking while maintaining some sense of justice. Specifically, we suggest the following:

- An elimination of the escalating fine system and its replacement by a standard fine of $5. Extraordinary fines for such offenses as "parking on grass" and "not registered with Williams," could be maintained at their current level.

- The establishment of a seven day grace period within which a fine must be paid. Failure to make timely payment would result in a doubling of the fine, and after another seven days it would double again.

- The elimination of unpaid parking tickets from term bills. Instead, if fines remained unpaid at the end of the semester, parking privileges would be revoked for the next semester. In the case of graduating seniors, diplomas would be withheld pending payment, much like the policy on library fines.

The above system would help bring the pain of parking tickets closer to home, but would do so in the context of a fairer fine structure. Under the current system, the consequences of illegal parking are far removed from the actual event. After all, when it's cold and windy outside, wouldn't you rather risk a fiscal fallout with Mom and Dad than walk all the way to Baxter? Even for those students who pay their own term bills, $200 in parking fines can hardly seem very significant when included on a $7,000 term bill.

In return for stepped-up enforcement, students would get a fairer, more predictable system of parking fines where the penalties assessed more accurately reflected offenses committed. As the system now works, fines can increase to as high as $20. Is any parking infraction really worth that much? The stiffest Williamstown fines are $10.

Our proposed system might create somewhat increased paperwork for Security, and it might not bode well for those students who continually count on parental indulgence to save them from their irresponsibility. For the great majority of us, however, it would make everything fairer. And who knows ... with fewer illegally parked cars in student lots, maybe some of the parking shortage problem would disappear too.

Sprague Electric's commitment to North Adams is ignored in Record

To the Editor:

This letter is in reference to the 'Sign It' editorial in the October 27 Record which asked Williams students to sign a petition for the proposed Massachusetts Museum of Contemporary Art. I am completely in favor of the museum and pray that the Convention Center Bill gets passed. In fact, students who were not able to sign the petition should write to the Honorable George Keverian, Speaker, Room 357, State House, Boston. They should thus indicate their support for the Massachusetts Convention Center Bill. Every little bit helps.

However, I was disturbed by the references made to the Sprague Electric Company in the above-mentioned editorial. First of all, twenty years ago the plant in North Adams did not employ 10,000 workers, only 4,000. Sprague Electric did employ 10,000 in all of its world operations. In another point, four years ago the plant in North Adams employed about 1,800 workers, not the 5,000 mentioned. In 1985, it did lay off hundreds of workers in response to a competitive market.

In the past year, Sprague Electric has built two new modern plants on Route 8 in North Adams, allowing the Marshall Street complex to be vacated. It maintains its research lab on Marshall Street and between this and the new plants, Sprague Electric employs 600 workers in North Adams, remaining the largest industrial employer in the city. Sprague Electric is dedicated to North Adams and to being a viable employer in the area.

MASSPIRG thanks community for contributions to anti-hunger effort

To the Editor:

Thanks to the lively performances of four Williams capella groups, the generous contributions of several local merchants, and the enthusiasm of a hall full of Williams students, MASSPIRG's Hunger Week Jamboree and Raffle on October 22 was a tremendous success. In a single evening, over $500 was raised to help combat both local and national hunger, half of which will be contributed to the Berkshire Food Project and half to the National Student Campaign Against Hunger. We at MASSPIRG are encouraged by the positive response to this event and others like it in the past two years. Hopefully, hunger awareness and activism on our campus will continue to grow and strengthen in the coming year.

Once again, a special thanks to Ephra, the Ephratis, the Springstreters and the Octets; Goff's, the Slippery Banana, Colonial Pizza, the House of Walsh, Gatsby's, the Record Store and the River House; and, of course, everyone who came to the concert or participated in the raffle.

Development of Mt. Greylock puts environment in jeopardy

by Susan Paulson '88
and Geri Tierney '88

On Mountain Day a few weeks ago, many students took advantage of our location in the scenic Berkshires and spent the day hiking, eating and singing on Mount Greylock. These students may be surprised and dismayed to learn that a proposal exists to build a major ski resort on Mount Greylock, which includes nordic ski trails extending into the Mount Greylock State Reservation land.

In 1985 a bill was passed giving the development rights of the Mount Greylock State Reservation to the State Department of Environmental Management. This bill was initially welcomed by environmentalists and community members alike because it provided a means for protecting Mount Greylock from inappropriate development threats, while simultaneously boosting the region's economy. The Greylock Glen bill set up a public-private cooperative effort to develop recreational facilities on the Mount Greylock property.

Unfortunately, the Greylock Glen bill has evolved into something slightly different than was originally proposed. The present development plan includes a full-size golf course, a twenty-five acre man-made lake, 101 kilometers of cross-country ski trails, over 1000 condominiums, several inns, lodges, conference centers, pools, a fitness center, a 'small' New England village, rustic cabins, five new roads and thousands of parking spaces. The bulk of the development will be on the Glen property, adjacent to the Mount Greylock State Reservation, but the ski trail network will extend throughout the reservation. The plan does not take into account the capacity of the local sewer system, the environmental impact on the ecosystem, the limited space at the landfill, and other environmental consequences.

Many people have hailed the development as a source of economic revitalization for the depressed Adams community. The Greylock Glen resort is expected to generate 345 construction jobs per year during construction and 700 full-time jobs after completion, thus bringing $134 million into the households of the workers and providing five million dollars annually in retail sales. These figures sound impressive but they don't necessarily indicate a socially optimal form of economic growth. One issue at hand is the nature of jobs which this development will supply. The permanent jobs created by the resort will primarily be low-skilled, part-time jobs which won't allow for many benefits or financial security for the employees. Many of the skilled jobs that will be created, i.e., ski instructors, hotel managers, and chefs, will be filled by people from outside of the community not from within.

While there is a certain amount of support for the Glen project, many Adams residents recognize some major flaws in its present form. A key concern is access to the Greylock Glen property. In order for there to be a significant amount of commercial activity spilling over into Adams and a significant amount of labor mobility between the two major areas there will need to be a direct access road accommodating this traffic. Presently there is no plan to create such a road. Furthermore, residents are concerned about the effects of this development on land values in Adams. The resort could drive land values up high enough to force low-income residents out of the area.

In addition to these economic pitfalls, environmental hazards abound. We are

by Clark West '89

In an Op-Ed of October 27, John Canty '88 made a sincere plea to Williams students to take a hard look at ourselves and our tradition in order that we might "uphold the truths of our past in our discovery of the future." While I agree with John that the kind of thinking he describes is "not just wrong, it is arrogant and it is dangerous," I find his critique of deconstruction inadequate and incomplete.

In this case, his attack on deconstruction parallels that of Allan Bloom, who mentions Jacques Derrida, perhaps the most influential "spokesman" of deconstruction, a grand total of one time. Despite this astonishing lack of depth on both Bloom and Canty's part, they insist that deconstruction is a major stumbling block to "a basic knowledge of one's own culture." Bloom even goes so far as to say that deconstruction is "the last, predictable, stage in the suppression of reason and the denial of the possibility of truth in the name of philosophy" (Bloom, The Closing of the American Mind, p. 379).

Canty hints that it is the deconstruction's kind of thinking that leads to "distortion and intellectual laziness." Deconstruction is labeled en vogue. "I have heard that sentiment echoed on this campus, with other derogatory terms such as trendy and faddish being used. The Religion Department is considered the main culprit, with Professor Mark Taylor leading the way. As a major in this so-called chic department, I find it troubling that figures such as Bloom and Canty stress the importance, as Canty says, of not 'abandoning the spirit of our tradition' and yet fail to get a clear grasp of what deconstruction is all about. They forget that it, too, is part of that tradition. It is in this regard that I wish to clear up a few common misperceptions regarding the supposed 'judgmentally self-paralyzing relativism' that deconstruction provokes.

all aware of the shortages of landfill space in northern Berkshire County. This is a problem which will be greatly aggravated by the estimated 75,000 annual visitors is expected to attract, thus making it a matter for serious concern. The Heritage Group developers presently have no solutions for this problem.

The impact of the nordic trail network on the Mount Greylock State Reservation concerns environmentalists greatly. Projected figures for the width of these trails range from nine to twelve feet, while brush clearing will extend the corridor to a width of sixteen to twenty-four feet. Many of these trails will be gravel-based and groomed with snowcat-type machines. Although the public can currently ski on the Mount Greylock State Reservation without charge, the Heritage developers hope to institute a user fee. This fee raises the important issue of privatization of public land; who will profit from this fee?

A number of hurdles must be cleared before this development plan can be executed. The developer is required to submit an Environmental Impact Report which will be binding to the State and to

why Bloom misses the point

The first problem one encounters when speaking of deconstruction is that, contrary to both Bloom and Canty's assertions, it cannot be described sufficiently in a paragraph or even an entire text, as Mark Taylor explains when attempting to clarify some of the misconceptions he sees. "The readings in this volume suggest one approach to deconstruction. Much of the controversy that continues to surround it is the result of persistent misunderstandings" (Taylor, Deconstruction in Context, p. vii). To sum up deconstruction in two sentences, as Canty does, while it may be necessary for the length of his article, does a great disservice to the complexities within deconstruction and evidences an all-too-simple method of pigeon-holing something that on the surface may appear threatening.

That is not to say that deconstruction is not threatening; it most certainly challenges those very notions that Bloom wants to hold as in some way sacred. In order to understand its dangers, however, I believe it is necessary for one to scrutinize the many texts that authors like Derrida and Taylor provide, something I feel Bloom and Canty do inadequately in their written work.

This leads me to look at the Canty's second major misconception: that it does not provide for or even itself have knowledge of one's own culture. By invoking the notion of cultural relativism, Canty seems to suggest that deconstruction and deconstructionists (if there even are such rare beasts — Bloom implies that even in Paris, considered the heart of the deconstructionist school, the "fad" has passed) are unaware of the tradition they come out of or are at least unconcerned with it because of its "relativity." Nothing could be further from the "truth." Deconstruction relies on the traditional the Heritage Group. After Environmental Impact Report comes out, the State Board of Environmental Managers must unanimously approve the Heritage Group's final development plan. Finally, the State Department of Environmental Managers and the Heritage Group must sign a Land Disposition Agreement outlining all aspects of the relationship between the Commonwealth and Heritage. In other words, there is still time to revise the plan.

The Environmental Impact Report will be made public on November 15. The public will then have thirty days to comment on the report. It is important that people educate themselves now and respond intelligently to the Greylock Glen Development issue. A panel discussion will be held soon after November 15. The issue is frequently addressed by local newspapers and is a major topic of discussion at campus Environmental Awareness Group meetings. We encourage you to stay on top of the issue so that you may have an impact on the final decisions. It is our duty to insure that any development on Mount Greylock is both environmentally sound and economically advantageous to the region.

values it then attempts to see as inadequate and problematic. It is, to paraphrase J. Hillis Miller, parasitic. It cannot stand on its own and is deeply in debt to the traditions it is bound up in. In that sense, it is hardly apothecic, for it recognizes its dependence on what it attempts to subvert. For an excellent description of how this works, I recommend Jonathan Culler's On Deconstruction, specifically pages 85 to 89. Thus the criticism Canty makes of those who do not seem to care about their own tradition due to its relativity is not an accurate one of deconstruction. Although I would not deny that the kind of thinking Canty describes goes on, it is certainly not attributable to deconstruction.

The final misconception Canty has is that deconstruction is, in some way, en vogue. While it is true that the Williams Religion Department has a lot invested in deconstructionist thought, it is not considered the "thing to do," as any religion major planning to do graduate study in the field can attest. What is en vogue at the present time is Bloom's attack on deconstruction that does not take into account the intricacies that a study of deconstruction necessitates and evokes. Certainly a field which draws into question the adequacy of the concepts of truth, continuity, history, and even God to explain our world cannot be en vogue in a country that has elected Ronald Reagan for two terms. Deconstruction is, by its very nature, marginal and unassimilable and arguably, absolutely unknowable.

I realize that I have not adequately described what deconstruction is. What I hope I have done, though, is given people some idea of what it is not and shown the ways in which a rash appraisal can often lead to the very closed-mindedness from which John Canty and I would like to get away.

director

College President Francis Oakley has named Bruce Kieffer, associate professor of German and Russian, as the first director of the new center for Foreign Languages, Literatures, and Cultures, established last year.

Kieffer, who has been teaching German at Williams since 1978, was instrumental in developing a proposal to the Pew Memorial Trust which resulted in a $500,000 grant for funding the center.

The idea for creating the center, according to Kieffer, evolved from the perception that foreign studies at Williams would benefit greatly from increased cooperation among the separate foreign language and literature departments as well as from increased interaction between these departments and others, such as anthropology and political science, whose programs have international dimensions. The center will pursue projects in a variety of areas, ranging from curricular planning to development of new learning and research facilities.

Kieffer said he is pleased "to be involved in what promises to be a very exciting era for foreign students at Williams, during a time when people all over the country are becoming more aware of the interdependence of the United States and other countries and of the urgent need for better knowledge of foreign languages and cultures."

Krens says

The Berkshire Eagle reported on Saturday October 17 that Sprague's donation of its Marshall Street Complex to the MassMoCA project is contingent not only on the granting of state funding but also on the working out of details such as who is responsible for an environmental review of the site. The

Bruce Kieffer

Eagle said that this is especially important because PCB contamination was found at Sprague's Brown Street complex, which is not part of the proposed MassMoCA project.

Thomas Krens, Director of the Williams College Museum of Art (WCMA) and chief planner of the Massachusetts Museum of Contemporary Art (MassMoCA) said he was not bothered by concerns over environmental safety at the Marshall Street Complex.

Krens cited studies by Sprague Technologies Inc., the donor of the 13.5 acre property, and by the Department of Environmental Quality Engineering. According to those sources, the chances of environmental problems are "relatively small."

"The college has to be in a position, has to be confident, that there are no environmental problems before it even acts as a conduit," he said. He stressed the fact that Williams College will never actually own the buildings, but is acting on behalf of the future museum.

Krens said he has been approached by about 50 architecture firms who have expressed an interest in working on the design of MassMoCA. He mentioned architects Robert Venturi, Stanley Tigerman, Peter Eisenman and Frank Gehry, who are nationally known and who viewed the site last year.

"Certainly having an architect of prominent stature is something we're interested in," Krens said.

Krens added that the choice of the architect may be subject to state bidding guidelines.

WSP launches U.S.-Soviet student exchange

by Daniel Drezner

Twelve Williams College students and at least two professors will travel to the Soviet Union this Winter Study. There have been trips to the U.S.S.R. in other years, but this trip is unique because the students will spend half their time at the University of Tbilisi in Soviet Georgia. According to Assistant Professor of Russian Darra Goldstein, this is the first known direct contact between a Soviet university and an American liberal arts college.

The students will spend ten days at Tbilisi (pronounced tbi-lis) and another ten days visiting Moscow and Leningrad. The twelve students were chosen through a combination of essays and interviews. Knowledge of Russian was not necessary, and non-Russian majors were encouraged to apply. Each student will be required to write a ten page paper upon returning to Williams. The students will be accompanied by Goldstein, Assistant Professor of Economics Robert Whitesall and possibly one other faculty member.

While at Tbilisi, the students will participate in roundtable discussions and attend lectures by Soviet professors as well as other cultural events. Informal meetings between the Soviet and American students will be encouraged.

The program is organized by the Citizen Exchange Council (C.E.C.), a private organization based in New York. This program stems from a similar arrangement made between Yale University and Moscow State University in 1985. Harvard University, Stanford University, the University of Maine and Lafayette College are also participating in the C.E.C. program. They will send students to other Soviet universities.

Tbilisi is the capital of the Georgian Soviet Socialist Republic. It is located in southwest Russia, between the Black Sea and the Caspian Sea, close to the border of Turkey. It has a population of 900,000.

Direct contact

"It has been mostly tourist type, see-the-sights tours before this program," said Professor Bruce Kieffer, chairman of the Russian and German departments. "This is a new type of opportunity for students to interact. Direct contact with Soviet students is very rare," he said. Goldstein agreed: "This gives American students an opportunity to meet their counterparts."

The Soviet university system is patterned after the European concept of large, state-sponsored research schools. There are no liberal arts colleges in the U.S.S.R. "Williams represents a unique education which the Soviets view as strange, with their European system," said Goldstein. Physically, the Soviet university is also different. "It's not a beautifully manicured, aesthetically perfect campus. The buildings are made of form concrete. Still, it is patterned after the American model," she said.

For the students who are going, this is an exciting opportunity. Senior Mollie Cavender said she sacrificed writing her thesis so she could go on this trip. "I'm very in favor of travel as an educational experience," explained Cavender, a history major. "I'm curious to what extent the propaganda (about Americans) has taken hold. I really don't know what to expect. We want to avoid the archetype of the rich American," she said.

Four to a room

Goldstein explained that the details of the trip are sketchy, since the Tbilisi authorities are undecided as to where the students will be housed. Dorm rooms at Tbilisi are much more sparse than at Williams, and often four people live in the

IVORY TOWERS

Middlebury
A male intruder sneaked into a bathroom on the second floor of Middlebury College's Stewart Hall at 10:30 on a Monday morning and twice peeked around a shower curtain at an anonymous female student. The showering student reported that she thought the man had come to turn off the water the first time he peeked around the curtain, and that he apologized and left after she said "hey." "The second time he peeked in I attacked him with my sponge and yelled," she said. Director of Security Fred Spencer said that the man was "definitely a non-student."

Dartmouth
The issue of unattributed quotations has recently surfaced in two instances at Dartmouth College. Student assembly president Scott Evans '88 has requested a hearing with the College Committee on Standards to explain similarities between his convocation speech and the commencement address of Columbia professor Arthur Danto, which was reprinted in Harper's magazine. The second incident involved Dartmouth President James Freedman, on the other end of the problem. Parts of one of his speeches, which had been reprinted in a pamphlet, were used without attribution by the president of the University of Colorado, Gordon Gee, who pointed the blame at his speechwriter, Mark Walt.

Bryn Mawr
The preponderance of liberal viewpoints among the student body at Bryn Mawr College is so great that student Republicans told the newspaper that they "are deciding to keep their political views to themselves out of fear of confrontation with a close-minded and emotional liberal majority." Students complained that the more vocal liberals on campus ostracize students who express conservative viewpoints, and that there is no Republican voice on campus for them to rally behind or identify with. Mary Scallia, daughter of Supreme Court Associate Justice Anton Scallia and a sophomore at Bryn Mawr, said that many students will not even discuss politics with her because of her father's noted conservative views.

More Middlebury
For the first time ever, a woman attended auditions for the Dissipated 8, the most popular singing group at Middlebury College. Senior Julia Foote signed up for an audition under the name "Julian," but was nevertheless given a full audition. Her tryout caused such debate within the a capella group that they couldn't decide whether to give her a callback. When Foote showed up for the second audition, the group decided that even though she was an excellent singer, her female voice would disrupt the musical unity of the group, and she was turned down. "I was impressed with how they handled it — the length of their discussion and they way they kicked it around. I have great respect for them," said Foote.

In Other Ivory Towers was compiled by Rob Weisburg from material printed in other college newspapers.

Quartet haunts Chapin with Janacek

by Sean Timmons

On Friday, Oct. 30, the Mendelssohn String Quartet played an enjoyable concert in Chapin Hall, as part of the Thompson Concert Series, co-sponsored by the Sterling and Francine Clark Art Institute. The program included works of Mozart, Leos Janacek, and Beethoven.

The Quartet had a ringing tone that filled the hall well, and all of the players demonstrated remarkable dexterity in some fairly challenging lines. Occasionally, however, some of the rhythmic clarity was lost, leaving the audience with a slightly disturbing sense of disorientation.

The Mozart String Quartet in F Major, K. 590 (1790), for example, while not seeming to be a terribly difficult piece, often lost some of its beauty as a result of lines being unclear, especially in the first violin. The work itself is very light and playful throughout, but in this performance, some of the lightness was lost due to the slight inaccuracy.

The Beethoven String Quartet, Op. 59 No. 3 in C Major (1806) suffered none of these difficulties, and as a result of the players' ability to heighten the intensity of certain dramatic moments, was a moving experience. Particularly noteworthy was the way in which the first violinist was able to make giant leaps seem effortless, which made them seem musically more exciting. Also contributing to the dramatic effect was the Quartet's hitherto unseen ability to create huge differences in dynamics; the performers dropped from a fortissimo that filled the hall to a pianissimo that was barely audible, while still retaining a marvelously warm tone. The Beethoven was without doubt the finest performance of the evening.

The Mendelssohn Quartet took a little more of a musical risk with its performance of Janacek's String Quartet No. 2 "Intimate Letters," (1928). Janacek, even when performed impeccably, is inaccessible to most audiences. While the Quartet did a very creditable job in its performance of the piece, the players could not make the piece hang together well enough to create a real emotional experience. To its credit, the ghostly sul ponticello lines were chilling, as indeed were the more traditional solo lines, but as an ensemble, the group seemed to be a little too tentative to make the work striking. Still, it was a lovely piece for Halloween, despite the intriguing title.

The group also played an encore, Dvorak's Waltz, Op. 54, No. 1, which, after such an excellent performance of Beethoven, seemed anticlimactic, even though it was played quite well.

The Mendelssohn String Quartet has been playing together since 1979. The players are Ida Levin and Nicholas Mann, violins; Ira Weller, viola; and Marcy Rosen, cello. They are artists-in-residence at both the Hebrew Arts School in New York, and the Santa Fe Music Festival. In 1981, the group won the Young Concert Artists Competition.

same room. Unfortunately, the timing of the trip is bad, she said, since the Tbilisi students will be taking final examinations while the Williams entourage is there.

According to Goldstein, the Russian part of this exchange will take place sometime in late September or early October of next year, to show off the foliage. The Soviet students will be housed by students on campus. Both Kieffer and Goldstein said that they hope this first exchange will be expanded into a semester-long program in the years to come.

CUL explores integration of social & academic life

by Rob Ullman

The Committee on Undergraduate Life (CUL) discussed establishing a coffee house where students can meet and talk, hiring a recent Williams graduate to promote cultural activities and revising the freshman advising system at their meeting last Wednesday.

The CUL has been discussing issues raised by Gaudino Scholar Kurt Tauber about integrating intellectual and social life outside the classroom.

The committee approved of the idea of a coffee house, but agreed that it poses many problems — most notably finding a location — that must be solved before it is instituted.

The CUL considered the Log as a possible location, but it is booked until 10 p.m., leaving only two hours for use as a coffee house and eliminating the possibility that it could be used during the daytime.

"It's hard for the Log to become a coffee house as long as it is booked during the day."

Women's tennis wins Little Three Volleyball

by Jim McDermott

The women's tennis team ended a sometimes frustrating season with an impressive fifth place finish in the 23 team New England Women's Intercollegiate Tennis Tournament held ten days ago on the windswept courts at Amherst.

Kathy Stearns '91 took an unexpected second place in the number four seed singles, while number three seed Mary Montgomery '88 and number five Missy Crouchley '89 both gained the semifinal round of their tournaments. Stearns beat the tournament's number one seed in the fourth singles division in the semifinals to gain the team's only finals berth. Coach Ed Grees commented on Stearns composure in the wind. "She used the wind to her advantage, and often lobbed into it. She had a very good tournament and adjusted well to the conditions."

Montgomery capped an impressive 9-2 season with a semifinal finish in the number three singles division. The senior defeated opponents from Wesleyan and Trinity in two three set matches to reach the semifinal round. After dropping the first set to her Smith opponent, the eventual tournament winner, by a 6-3 score, Montgomery took the second set in a tiebreaker, 7-6. In the third set, the effects of the tough earlier matches caught up with her, and a 1-6 loss was the result.

Crouchley breezed through her early round matches, defeating the number five seeds from Bates and Middlebury before meeting Smith's entry in the semifinal round. She lost a close first set in a tiebreaker and dropped the second, 6-4. Number two seed Beth Laxson as Food Service is running it," Daniel Comisky '88 said.

Assistant Professor of English Lisa Wright said that because of limitations of the Log or other existing structures on campus, another structure is needed.

The committee decided that a Williams graduate acting as a coordinator for campus cultural activities person would help to fill the gap between students and faculty in cultural affairs. This person would work with house presidents and other students in organizing events. Wright said that if a group of students wanted to see a play, the facilitator could hook them up with a faculty member who could discuss the play with them.

In discussing the freshman advising system, committee members said that it could also serve as an area for improved student faculty interaction. Referring to the current system, Assistant Professor of Philosophy Peter Lipton said, "I don't think it's a success. I think it needs to be changed."

The committee members agreed that by matching freshmen with faculty members according to interests they could foster better relations between students and their advisors. Lipton said, "If you saw your advisor as an individual mentor, then you'd be meeting much more often."

'91 lost in the round of sixteen, and went on to finish in the semifinals of the consolation tournament. Amy Davidson '90 lost in the quarterfinals to the Wellesley number one.

Lisa Brayton '91 lost in the quarterfinals to Amherst's number six. The doubles team of Annabel Sheinberg '89 and Nora Vincent '90 lost in the semifinals. The other doubles teams lost in the early rounds.

Coaches Grees and Sean Sloane said they were pleased with the season in general, and the latter half in particular, when the team came back from a 1-3 start to finish 6-4 overall. The injury to number one seed Amy Davidson in the early season factored into the team's slow start. Coach Sloane said, "The team will lose Montgomery and team captain Anne Shulman to graduation. Still, consistently strong play from freshmen Brayton and Stearns leaves Grees optimistic about next year, when a healthy Davidson could be the dominant singles player that she was in 1986."

Men's rugby falls to Framingham in 2 OTs

by Andy Harris

Invited to play in its first Union-sanctioned Divisional tournament in a decade, the Aside of the WRFC ventured to the lonely University of Maine at Orono.

There, huddled in a clump across the pitch, covered the hated minions of the Great Defector to the East; fifteen black and purple clad knights of the court of Lord Jeff waited in morbid realization of their fate: round one of the tournament pitted them against the WRFC.

Brian Baird '89, returning from a week's layoff, twice found the try zone after the crafty Williams side had tactfully placed kicks beyond the hapless Amherst backs. Two second half goals by fullback Johnny Hollenberg, including a deft drop kick, finalized the tally at 18-0, just two weeks before 'RFC hosts Amherst for the '87 Little Three finale.

Fall to Framingham
The Williams triumph was short-lived, however, as powerful Framingham State dualed the Dogs to a 9-9 tie in regulation in their quarterfinal match. The game had been hard fought at both ends, and early on it seemed that Williams might secure victory as the line repeatedly overloaded Framingham, but could only once cross the try line for points.

In the second half, despite heroic efforts by the touted Williams scrum, the line's nervous play precluded further scores. Three minutes into the second overtime, the Framingham standoff drop-kicked for three points and a victory. It is thus that Williams was dispatched from the frozen desolation of Orono.

This Saturday the Ephs will travel to Middletown to try to ground the Cardinals of Wesleyan.

for individual rooms, according to Fix. He said some people think that only dead bolt locks are necessary while others would prefer both dead bolts and an electronic system on the outside of buildings.

Winthrop Wassener, director of the physical plant, said, "As far as I know... (the type of lock system) is still a wide-open question and anything that's made is being considered."

Director of Housing Robert Fowler said that an electronic entry system would be expensive. "If you wired the whole campus, you're probably talking over half a million dollars." The system would have to be interconnected through the whole campus according to Fowler, who said, "It would be my guess it would take a year or two to engineer and install." He said that he believes students should agree before the college decides to go ahead with the system.

Fowler said that dead bolt locks are more secure than the kind of locks currently used for individual dormitory rooms because they cannot be picked or kicked open. "It's the type schools all over the country are using." These type of locks have already been installed in Dewey House and two other houses. Fowler said that the dead bolt locks have worked out well and there are plans for further installation during the summer. According to Fowler, dead bolts will be installed as repairs are made in each house rather than all at once because, "You have to modify the door to take the lock." "It would be quite a job to do every one of those doors," he said.

Rogers hall to raise money for the hunger project. The $540 raised, he said, went to the National Student Campaign Against Hunger and the Berkshire Food Project.

Virginia Demaree '88, the council's liaison to the C.U.L., spoke on the committee's efforts to foster intellectual life on campus by establishing a coffee house (see related article on the C.U.L.).

Council Treasurer Mark Ralsbeck '88, who chairs the council sub-committee on parking, said there was a shortage of 100 parking spaces last year and that he expects the shortage problem to get worse this year as the public uses parking spaces for the new gym and the expanded art museum.

Ralsbeck said that the ad hoc committee chaired by Assistant Dean William Wagner established to investigate the parking problem had looked for new spots to expand the parking spaces and come up with several possible locations.

Ralsbeck suggested that students are using cars for wrong purposes. "On a small campus like Williams, students don't really need cars to get to classes," he said.

The council discussed briefly the status of women's athletics at Williams. Zinn said that equal treatment of women's intercollegiate sports has to involve more support from the administration and a fairer distribution of the budget. As an example of a situation that could be improved, Zinn cited the fact that women's lacrosse and field hockey players share the same skirts. He said a thorough discussion of the issue is included in the council's upcoming newsletter to all students.

Now that you've gotten into Williams, IBM can help you get more out of it.

The road to graduation is paved with term papers, lab reports, cramming, all-nighters and, of course, exams.

To ease that journey and awaken your professors to your exceptional abilities, we suggest the newest member of the IBM® Personal System/2® family: the Model 25 Collegiate.

It's a high-powered personal computer with advanced graphics capabilities, designed to fit on your desk without adding to the clutter. And it comes with a generous 640 KB memory, two 3.5" diskette drives and an aid package every student can appreciate—a big discount, plus Microsoft® Windows 1.04, Write, Paint, Cardfile, IBM DOS 3.3 and a mouse.

Pop in the load-and-go diskette and your Model 25 Collegiate is set to help you write and revise long papers and illustrate your points by combining words and graphics. So your professors will draw favorable conclusions about your work.

For more information on the Model 25 Collegiate, visit the IBM Education Product Coordinator on campus. You'll quickly learn how to get the most out of the IBM Personal System/2. IBM

Despite the beautiful weather and superb efforts by much of the team, the men's varsity cross country team lost the Little Three title for only the second time in seventeen years, by a score of Amherst 24, Wesleyan 38, and Williams 62. It was Amherst's first title in that period.

The principle problem for Williams was a lack of healthy runners. But the first two miles or so, Williams looked as though they could pull off a miracle, as co-captain Dave Glendon, star freshman Dylan Cooper, and Dale Johnson '90 all were running in the front pack. However, the grueling 4.9 mile course began to take its toll as Glendon and Johnson began to fall off the pace.

With one mile to go it was clear that Amherst had won, and that the Williams pack of Johnson, Dave Sprague '88, Nat Mcvey-Finney '90, and Mac Hines '88 had fallen too far back to figure in the final scoring. Following Hines for Williams were Dave Tewkesbury '89, who ran despite a severely injured back, and Steve Brody '90.

The first finisher for Williams was Cooper, in seventh overall with a time of 27:09. Ever-tough Dave Glendon, who ended up running alone for much of the race, cruised through the finish line in tenth place with a time of 27:21.

The bitter taste of the Little Three loss must be quickly put aside, as this weekend features the East Coast Athletic Conference championships at Tufts.

The women's soccer squad last Wednesday won an important 1-0 shutout victory over a visiting Mount Holyoke team as it secured a place in the upcoming NIAC tournament. The victory, extending what has now become an amazing ten game unbeaten streak, rounded the team's regular season up at an impressive 9-2-2.

The first half was slow, as the two teams battled to a scoreless tie on a cold, wet field after a rain. The second half, however, was witness to a dominating Eph offense which kept play in the Holyoke half of the field. Senior co-captain Chris Boddicker scored the game-winner, knocking it home off a Holyoke defender after an assist from Lynne Brenner '90.

The win, the first over Mt. Holyoke in four years, was "a well played game, and we were able to capitalize on passing in the second half," said Kim Hatch '88, the team's other co-captain.

The victory continues the remarkable turnaround for the Ephs, who started off the year at 1-2. "Being a very young team, we had a shaky beginning. But the team showed steady improvement," said Melendy. Hatch reflected on the season, "The best part of the whole thing is that I am able to finish off my soccer career at Williams with a NIAC tournament in my senior year."

W. Rugby

A crisp Halloween weekend in the Purple Valley proved frightening for the St. Pauli Girls of the University of New Hampshire as they lost to the WWRFC's fiendish A-side 10-0.

The Ephs women played a clean and well disciplined match. Senior line captain Annie Cordova had one of her best games of the season, scoring in both the first and second halves.

Defensive players of the day were uncontestedly Kim Jordan '88 and Cathy Paper '89, who supported their teammates despite being caught up in a St. Pauli Girl scrum which collapsed on them in nearly every scrummage. Junior fullback Lauren Boeschstein added a two-point conversion kick to an already solid lead, and the St. Pauli Girls remained scoreless throughout the match.

The B and C squads scrimmaged earlier in the day, with the B's topping the valiant C's 10-0. Gina Coleman '90 scored in the first half, reminiscent of her fine performance last weekend, and Liz Martin '90 made the second try despite being brutally tackled several times by screaming C-woman Jackie Graves '90. Kara Lynch kicked the conversion. Another major factor in the B's success was hooker Ellen Lee '88, who won the majority of hooks with quick thinking and quick feet.

Volleyball 22-9 for season

by Ted Hobart

For the second time in a week, the 22-9 volleyball team found itself in the same situation, facing Bates in the finals of a tournament. Ten days ago, Bates won the first Williams Invitational Tournament, but on Saturday the New England Championship was on the line as Bates hosted the NIAC tournament.

Unfortunately, Bates also emerged victorious in this contest and came away with the championship. The first game was very tight, a 15-10 loss, but Bates pulled away in the second to win 15-3.

"We took a while to get going, but we really played well," said tri-captain Jenny Aulse '88. Opening the day against Smith, deposited the ball into the goal. Brooks would later return the favor by setting up the third goal for Masters eleven minutes into the second half. Masters ran onto a brilliant through ball from Brooks and tapped in his own rebound after an initial save by the Conn. College keeper, Kevin Wolfe.

The second goal came with ten minutes left in the first half when Eph captain Nick Nachamkin '88 rifled a shot from just outside the penalty area into the lower corner of the net past the diving Wolfe.

Wolfe, an All-American keeper last year, witnessed a goaltending clinic by Eph netminder Rob Blanck '89. Blanck thwarted every Husky opportunity as he recorded his eighth shutout in twelve games.

In action Tuesday at Babson, Williams won handily, by a score of 4-0. Brooks tallied a hat trick and Masters added the other. Despite such offensive punch, coach Michael Russo stresses the defense's efforts in the impressive 11-1 record.

"The cohesion of the defense has been so strong this year. Dan Calichman '90 and the rest of the back four have been outstanding at eliminating opponents' scoring opportunities."

Platt takes individual titleWomen runners capture Little 3

by Miriam Nafley

Though plagued by illness and injury, the women's cross-country team held on to become champions at the Little Three Meet at home last Saturday.

Murmurs in the crowd turned into screams of excitement as Anne Platt '91 appeared first at the top of the hill in the Science Quad, the clear leader in a pack of 36 runners. Within a minute of Platt's finish it was apparent that Williams had won the meet, taking seven of the top ten places overall. The Ephs' dominance was apparent in the final scores: Williams 22, Amherst 51, and Wesleyan 64.

Following Platt's first place finish of 20:29 were captain Sarah Pierce '88, 3rd overall with 20:57, Ingrid Welsel '90, 4th with 21:03, Cathy Cocks '89, 6th with 21:22, and Sarah St. Antoine '88, 8th with 21:43. Sophomores Susan Gray and Ann Danhauer rounded out the Ephwomen top seven, placing 9th and 10th respectively.

Team members expressed their satisfaction with the fact that the top seven finished so closely, a pivotal strength in cross country meets, where only the top five score.

Coach Larry Bell, who had expressed anxiety before the race, said, "I'm ecstatic. The people we were concerned about really came through, and pretty much closed the door on the other team's top runners."

Bell is planning to enter seven runners in the ECAC race at Tufts on November 7. He commented, "It's frustrating to be a good runner on such a good team as ours. The younger runners on our team deserve a chance to end their season with a championship, so I'm, taking runners to the ECAC who will not be running in the NCAA (qualifying meet for nationals) on November 14, to give them the experience."

The Field Hockey team placed second in last weekend's NIAC tourney, beating Bowdoin 1-0 in triple overtime on penalty shots, but losing 3-0 to Trinity. The loss to the Bantams, the only team to defeat the Ephwomen this year, left the squad's final season record at 11-2-1. (Albright)

31-7 Union rout drops Ephs to 2-4 in series last meeting

by Al Mottur

"We were intimidated," said head coach Richard Farley, describing his football team's 31-7 loss at Union on Saturday. "They have a better football team. They played very well and we played very poorly."

Union did indeed play very well. The Dutchmen racked up an amazing 301 yards rushing on 53 carries, and had two 100 yard rushers on the day. Quarterback Mike Gargiulo completed 11 of 15 passes for 120 yards, and the Union special teams came up with two big first-half kickoff returns.

The Ephs, on the other hand, failed to gather any consistency in their offense, and, except for two series, never really threatened to score.

17-0 Dutchmen

Union wasted no time, as they took the opening kickoff and marched 65 yards for the game-opening score. Brian Polumbo, who rushed for 105 yards on the day, scored for Union at 10:20 of the first quarter.

To start the second stanza, the Dutchmen went up 14-0, on an impressive 71 yard drive that lasted just over five minutes. After the ensuing kickoff, three plays, and a Scott Powers '88 punt, the Dutchmen marched downfield again, but had to settle for a chip-shot field goal when the Eph defense stiffened at the goal line.

It was at this point that Williams woke up. Sandwiching three medium range passes around a crucial defensive pass interference call, the Ephs travelled 68 yards to score with 1:15 remaining in the first half. The key play in the drive, which ended in a 13 yard Scott Kennedy '89 to Lewis Collins '88 TD pass, was a 28 yard toss to sophomore wideout Kevin Brown, who caught three passes on the day.

Dutchmen roll

Going into the second half, one might have thought the Ephs had a chance to rally, considering they had the momentum and would receive the opening kickoff. However, after a big Bill Wurm '88 return, the Ephs could not gain a first down. Powers' booming 48 yard punt left the Dutchmen on their own two yard line and set up the drive that would cancel all Eph hopes on the day.

Quarterback Scott Kennedy '89 rolls left behind guards Joe Thompson and Andy Allen in early season action vs. Bowdoin. (Camp)

Overcoming 33 yards in penalties, the Dutchmen marched 98 yards to take a 24-7 lead on what was in effect, a 131 yard drive. The touchdown, coming on a 38 yard pass play, was improbably converted on third down and 36.

Men's soccer sets record with 11 wins this season

by Ted Ruger

The Ephs drubbed Connecticut College at home and Babson on the road to raise their record to 11-1 heading into Little Three and East Coast Athletic Conference play this week.

The team's eleven victories ties a school record set in 1984 and in addition, with a loss by previously top-ranked Salem State, the squad figures to be ranked first in the final New England Division III poll.

As the probable number one seed in the four team ECAC tournament, the team will play at home Thursday or Friday, and if they win that game, will play again in the championship game on Sunday. In between those tournament games is a critical Little Three contest at Wesleyan on Saturday.

The Ephs won in fine fashion on Saturday, as they humbled a tough Conn. College squad 3-0. Doug Brooks put the home squad on top just 2:36 into the game when he broke free off a pass from Mike Masters and After one hundred and ten minutes of grueling championship soccer at Cole Field, the scoreboard told the story: Home 2, Visitors 1. That was the final score in the Ephs thrilling, come from behind victory over Middlebury Sunday which clinched the New England ECAC title.

The win boosted the squad's season mark to 14-1, extending its school record for victories. In recent polls, Williams was ranked first in New England and fifth nationally among Division III teams. Their New England ECAC championship qualifies the team for a four team tournament with other regional ECAC winners at Long Island this weekend.

Before that, however, the squad will attempt to win the Little Three Title in its final

Panza plugs MassMoCA at State House

by Peter Balaban

Count Giuseppe Panza di Blumo answered questions about his vision for the proposed Massachusetts Museum of Contemporary Art (MassMoCA) at the Sprague Electric plant in North Adams last Tuesday.

Panza, who has agreed to loan MassMoCA 150 to 200 works from his collection, was accompanied by his wife Giovanna, artist Robert Morris, and Williams College Museum of Art (WCMA) director Thomas Krens.

"This large space is the ideal home for this kind of art," Panza told reporters as he stood surrounded by open space in building six of the Sprague complex. He said contemporary art is "one of the most important achievements of the culture of our time."

Panza was at the Massachusetts State House last Monday to drum up support for the project.

He addressed the Senate and was introduced to members of the House. He also spoke to members of the House Ways and Means Committee, which is deliberating on the Massachusetts Convention Center Bill. If passed, the bill will provide a crucial $35 million in funding for MassMoCA.

Dukakis is confident

Panza also met with Governor Michael Dukakis and Lt. Gov. Evelyn Murphy. "Mr. Dukakis was very confident that the project will be realized," Panza said.

Krens said that at this stage of negotiations, the Panzas have agreed to a long-term loan of about 150 to 200 pieces from their collection. Panza said that the value of his entire collection of over 600 pieces was recently assessed at $28 million. The collection contains art from the 1960's and 1970's.

Count Giuseppe Panza visited the Sprague Electric complex in North Adams with his wife to endorse the MassMoCA project, to which he has committed part of his collection. (Ward)

Adams substation malfunctions

Berkshires plunge into darkness

by Bill Savadove

"We're getting a little tired of these power outages," said Computer Center Director Lawrence Wright, echoing the sentiments of many regarding the blackout last Wednesday night.

This was the third power outage to affect the campus in a little over a month. The entire northern Berkshire area served by Massachusetts Electric lost power, including Williamstown, North Adams, Adams, Hancock, Clarksburg, and portions of Stamford, Vermont.

According to Nancy Cole, spokesperson for Massachusetts Electric, 17,000 customers were affected. The blackout was caused by a transmission fault in the Adams substation. "But as to the exact combination of conditions that caused it, we have no idea," she said.

Observers in Adams saw a large blue flash before the power went out. This flash, or arc, occurred when the Adams substation opened all of its switches, preventing power transmission, according to Cole.

In Williamstown, power was lost a few minutes before 8 p.m.

and it was restored at 9:37, after the power company determined how to reroute power around the Adams substation.

Bronfman Science Center, Baxter Hall, the heating plant, Prospect House and Chandler Gymnasium have emergency generators, according to Director of the Physical Plant Winthrop Wassenar.

During a power outage, all buildings are required by public safety laws to have lighted exits in case of fire, according to Wassenar. The emergency lights are powered by battery pack units, which last for about an hour, he said.

Jesup Computer Center has a short-term battery backup system that covers the main computer and some power outlets. Students using personal computers lost any copy that was not saved on disk.

The college switchboard, which is electrically supported, was also affected, rendering college phones inoperable.

"I think the students reacted pretty well," said Director of Security Ransom Jenks. "I would recommend that they don't walk around in the roadways like they did." He said one injured student was transported to the infirmary, after being hit by someone riding a bicycle in the dark.

Williamstown Chief of Police Joseph Zolto said the police increased patrols in response to the power outage.

Some students saw the power outage as a welcome study break. Wilson Clements '91 said, "It really didn't bother me. It didn't affect my life that much. I like to go out when all the lights go out. . . We had a good time."

400 students show up for race relations panel

by Jocelyn Shadforth

Eight students discussed their perceptions of racism at Williams in front of approximately 400 students and a handful of faculty at "Opening Up," a panel discussion on race relations at Williams on Sunday night.

College Council President Carter Zinn '88 moderated the discussion. In his opening remarks, Zinn said, "We are not here to accuse or malign. That would be a static action." Instead Zinn pointed to "thinking of racism on a surface level which can be confused with racism by itself" as the focus for the panel discussion.

He said that panel members included "people who would represent the student body, not the most political or the most vocal."

Penny Beach '87 spoke first, giving some historical background on the issue of racism at Williams. Beach authored a history thesis last year concerning black students at Williams during the 1950's and '60's and the 1969 occupation of Hopkins Hall. She referred to herself as "one of those people who asked why the black students sat at separate tables," and said, "It took four years and a 115 page thesis to find out why."

Beach said, "Racism was born of an ignorance that pervaded campus." She said blacks were not perceived as individuals but as representatives of the entire black race and, as such, were often called upon socially and academically to answer general questions about black concerns.

Kim Barndollar '91 said that as a prospective freshman she had heard that Williams had a very diverse student body. Then, she said, she noticed the separate orientation activities during Freshmen Days for black students and felt excluded when her black suitemate knew more people than she did when she first got to campus.

"I can never know about minority experiences at Williams," Barndollar said. She suggested that more knowledge about minority organizations provided in such guises as entry talks sponsored by the Williams

An open and free community

Meeting and overcoming the evil of racism remains a challenge to the commitment and perseverance of all Americans. Here at Williams, no less than in our national society, this challenge confronts us with the vital need for a sense of racial justice and, in the absence of that justice, of decisive action to bring it about.

Thus, we wholeheartedly support the efforts of the Campus Commission on Race Relations (CCRR) to fulfill the charge given it by President Oakley in May "for monitoring race relations at Williams, making recommendations for their improvement, and arranging activities ... to promote racial understanding." Whatever reservations we might initially have had about the effectiveness of the Commission have now been largely eliminated.

The meetings of the CCRR since October and the panel discussion Sunday night have marked a good start in the Commission's effort to fulfill Oakley's mission. The overwhelming response of Williams students to the panel discussion is further evidence that the CCRR has established a significant role for itself on this campus. And the panel discussion is also important, for it provides an opportunity for the Williams community as a whole to step back and re-evaluate exactly where we think this College and this society should be headed in terms of race relations.

As we see it, the goal of the CCRR and, in the most important sense, of our learning here at Williams, must be to establish an open and free community. We mean these words quite precisely.

Williams must strive for an open community in which neither our institutions nor our rules make arbitrary and invidious distinctions on the basis of race. At the same time, we should work to create a free environment in which all members of the community can share and find reception to their differing cultural identities. Implicit in such an environment is the right to find support in groups of similar backgrounds and outlooks; the decision to seek this support must originate from the individual's choice and not a surrounding world where an indifferent campus offers no support of its own. We cannot be free and simultaneously face the mandate of conforming our lives to a planned racial pattern.

Going one step further, we must seek to make this College a place which embraces talented individuals and exalts their differing backgrounds and colors.

We can do no less and still be true to our collective conscience as a community dedicated to individual self-fulfillment. It is our hope that through this process of discussion and, yes, debate we can maintain a respect for each other's goodwill. It is through rational discussion and not angry confrontation that, one to another, we can hear each other speak.

Sunday night's discussion proved valuable in that our community was given an opportunity to affirm its commitment to the bettering of racial relations; in some halting, imperfect way, it moved us closer to that goal. We feel this process of self-examination to be the purpose and, with that purpose unfulfilled, the problem of the CCRR.

Under the chairmanship of Assistant Professor of Political Science Timothy Cook, it has met repeatedly beginning in October. It has studied with care the most distressing points of the minority experience at Williams, i.e., the issue of the exclusion of minority perspectives in departmental offerings. No doubt some of these meetings, due to their confidential nature, had to be closed.

Now that the CCRR has established — at least in part — its agenda and set some of its goals, the time has come to open up most of the Commission's meetings. Some, of course, will still need to be closed; the sensitivity of the issues discussed requires confidentiality.

The solution to race relation problems, however, must ultimately come from not just the CCRR, but from all members of the community. To most effectively arrive at that solution, we need to understand the topics under discussion by the CCRR; we need to know what the Commission is talking about if we as a community are to provide useful ideas. When possible, then, the CCRR should hold its meetings publicly.

Admissions Office warning ignores the health of prospectives

To the Editor:

In the November 3 Record story "Prospective students party (too) hard visiting Williams," Richard Nesbitt of the Admissions Office is quoted as saying, "It's something that the applicants should be concerned about: that reports of deplorable behavior may reach the Admissions Office. They're guests of our College." The implication behind Nesbitt's statement is that the Health Center may disclose information about the status of prospectives, thereby weakening their chances for admission.

First of all, no one at this College has access to that sort of information: health records are kept in confidence. There is absolutely no reason that the Admissions Office should be exempt from this practice.

Secondly, Nesbitt's comments might very well serve to prevent a Williams host from taking an ill prospective to the Health Center, out of fear that he or she might be jeopardizing that person's chances for admission. Nesbitt's warning will certainly not stop prospectives from drinking, but it might very well stop a host from providing them with urgently-needed medical attention. This sort of attitude on the part of the Admissions Office could lead to a serious injury and perhaps even an alcohol-related fatality.

That the fear of retaliation by the Admissions Office could bring about such a dangerous situation is truly deplorable. If prospectives are indeed guests of the College, as Nesbitt asserts, then the first concern of the College should be for their health and safety, not the status of their applications.

Corrections

An article on the College Council's in last week's Record incorrectly quoted council president Carter Zinn '88 on the goal of Sunday's race relations panel. Zinn restated his comment Sunday as: "One of the goals of the panel is to put people in a position where they can consider what it would be like to be one of a small number of minorities in this community."

Because of an editing error, the same article incorrectly paraphrased Zinn as calling for a "fairer distribution of the budget" among men's and women's athletics. Zinn said that women's team's coaches he consulted said they did not have access to information about the budgets allotted to them.

Williams must embrace in its goals the view of the minority

by Farhan Haq '89

According to a few national news magazines, racism is "back" on college campuses. Certainly it is alive in some academic circles. Witness, for example, the increasing popularity of conservative professor Allan Bloom, whose trendy new educational manifesto The Closing of the American Mind accuses black students of causing racial problems and refusing to integrate. Even as he asserts that white students are no longer "subtly racist," Bloom snidely suggests that black students, through their efforts to preserve their distinct cultural and racial heritage, are practicing self-segregation; that courses teaching black studies and black English are merely "concessions" to special interests; that affirmative action should be abandoned; and that "the heat is under the pot, but they (black students) do not melt as have all other groups." What can account for the current popularity of such ideas?

Clearly, Bloom's statements are indicative of a larger problem, one that is also apparent here at Williams. No longer does the vast body of students believe that racism refers to the large (and possibly growing) system of oppression by which America has historically subjected minorities, particularly blacks.

Currently, racism is largely perceived to concern only obvious examples of malice, or desires to be separate; a use of racial slurs is racist by this definition, but systematic acts that make some students feel estranged from the college community are not. By use of this limited and inaccurate estimation of racism, some members of the Williams community can call the Williams Black Student Union racist because of the allegedly "exclusionary" nature of Rice House. In making such an assertion, the Williams College community is in fact blaming the

by Craig Gangl

The problem of insufficient student parking on the Williams campus will only get worse during the next ten years if no additional spaces are added, according to Assistant Dean William Wagner.

Wagner chairs an ad hoc committee charged with examining parking on campus. The committee consists of Director of Security Ransom Jenks, Assistant Director for Construction Services Antonio Janairo, College Council (CC) Treasurer Mark Ralsbeck '88 and Committee on Undergraduate Life (CUL) representative Daniel Comiskey '88.

Seven hundred and sixty-eight students brought cars to the campus last year, although there is only sufficient parking for 674 student cars. The shortage of spaces forced students to park in unauthorized areas. Jenks said that Security did not ticket cars parked on the inner campus. This year, there were only 548 student cars registered as of the end of October.

But the problem is almost certain to worsen as the year progresses, Jenks said, because more students usually bring cars to school after first semester, and even more after spring vacation.

Jenks also attributed part of the parking problem to an increase in visitors at the Williams College Museum of Art, Adams Memorial Theatre and Chandler Gymnasium.

No cars for freshmen?

If no other alternative is found to alleviate the problem, Jenks said he would consider allowing only upperclassmen to bring cars to the campus. He said he would also consider raising the registration fee, which now stands at $55 per school year.

Jenks said he thinks that everybody should have a car on campus if they want one. He said that his main objection is to the everyday use of cars on campus, such as students using their cars to drive to class.

No possible locations exist at the center of campus for additional parking spaces, Wagner and Jenks said. The committee has found three possible locations for new parking spaces, all on the periphery of the campus.

Jenks said the three locations being considered are the area behind the Weston Language Center parking lot; a location north of the Stetson apartments and south of Cole Field House; and at the south end of Spring

Zinn takes part of CC meeting off the record

by Peter Balaban

College Council President Carter Zinn '88 took part of last Thursday's council meeting off the record, because, he said, of the sensitive nature of the issue being discussed and past inaccuracies in Record reporting of Council meetings.

Zinn said that he told Record reporter James Lee '91, who covered the meeting, that the council's discussion of women's athletics would be off the record, meaning that the content of the discussion could not be reported by the Record.

"I told him if he had a problem with that then he should leave before the discussion," Zinn said.

Article I of the College Council Constitution states, "Every Williams student, as a member of the Student Body, is entitled to attend and speak at all council meetings."

"I regret that I made the decision to take the meeting off the record," Zinn said, "I realize that (it) can be interpreted that I was violating the College Council Constitution."

"There is a lot of mythologizing and misinformation out there already (about women's athletics)," he added, "and to perpetuate further misinformation would mean that our efforts would have a negative impact. Because there were two factual errors in the November 3 issue ... I was worried that it would happen again."

Zinn said he was left with the impression after a conversation last Wednesday night with Record co-editor in chief Joe Thorndike '88 that a new reporter would be assigned to cover the meetings.

Zinn said he was very surprised that Lee came to the meeting and felt he had been backed into a corner.

Thorndike said, "I think I did indicate to Carter that we would consider changing our College Council reporter. That was on Wednesday night. The meeting was on Thursday. The decision is of a great enough magnitude that we needed more than one day to make it."

Thorndike said that in the future, the Record will not recognize anything as being off the record at council meetings.

Gay and Lesbian alumni organize to form network

by Jocelyn Shadforth

Dan Pinello '72 recalled the information on class reunions sent out by the Society of Alumni in past years. The reunion activities, he said, "at least as advertised by the college principally had to do with children and spouses. We (gay and lesbian alumni) never saw reunions as being meaningful for us."

The result of this perceived deficiency in alumni events is a newly formed organization of gay and lesbian alumni. The group held an organizational meeting and a dinner on campus on October 17th.

Pinello, one of the organization's founders, said that a group of gay and lesbian alumni met with Hodge Markgraf, vice president of the Society of Alumni in order to schedule an organizational meeting during the 1987 reunions.

Bridget Baird '89, a member of the Williams Bisexual, Gay and Lesbian Union, said that for a number of alumni attending this first meeting, "It wasn't

Christic Institute sues Secret Team

by Stephanie Jones

"The Contragate affair cannot be understood if it is looked at only over the past two years," said Robert Richie, a member of the Christic Institute, during Wednesday night's lecture on the Secret Team, the group behind the Iran-Contra affair.

The Christic Institute is an interfaith center for law and public policy. It is active in foreign policy, civil rights and environmental issues and was involved in the Karen Silkwood, Greensboro Nine and Three Mile Island lawsuits. Currently it is involved in the La Penca lawsuit, a legal action against members of what Richie calls the Secret Team - a group of former CIA members and military officers.

Richie said that although Oliver North and William Casey were involved in the Iran-Contra affair, they were not the masterminds. "Actually these things have been going on for a long time," he said. "A small group of people, most of them who used to be in the CIA or army paramilitary activity, have been able to take over our foreign policy."

The lawsuit stems from the bombing of a press conference of Contra leader Eden Pastora Gomez in La Penca, Nicaragua, in which eight journalists were killed and 26 injured.

The La Penca lawsuit is a civil suit filed under the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act (RICO) for over $19 million in damages. It is against the 29 people allegedly responsible for bombing the press conference. The suit cites the Secret Team as responsible for assassinations, drug trafficking and violations of the Neutrality Act by funding the Contras. The defendants include Richard Secord, Albert Hakim and Adolf Calero.

"Our lawsuit is telling a story that seems so hard to believe at first," Richie said. He said that

Ordinary citizens of Williamstown

Faculty pursue varied social activities

by Alex Oh

The beautiful setting of the Berkshires is an atmosphere verging on perfection for self-reflection and contemplation. Perhaps this setting is what attracts and motivates some of the academicians who constitute the faculty of Williams College. After all, Henry David Thoreau moved out to the wilderness of Walden to reflect on society and his own self.

There are some drawbacks, however, to being in such a small and contained society. Many Williams students might find it hard to envision living in this society with no parties on the weekends. They might find it even more difficult, however, to imagine their professors crowded around the keg with cups in hand, swaying to the beat of the Bust.

No social life

So, what do faculty members do when they get out of class? Common answers from professors interviewed went something like this: "Well, I go home and prepare for the next class." This turned out not to be a joke. "We don't have a social life! Our social life is here," said Associate Professor of Chinese Jing-Heng Ma, when asked about her social life. She said that she is in her office from 7:30 a.m. to 5:00 p.m. on most days.

Peter Murphy, an assistant professor of English who just joined the faculty last year, agreed that faculty members don't have much of a social life because of their work. He emphasized, however, that he is not resentful of the fact that he is constantly busy.

For those who do manage to tear themselves away from their work, there is the Faculty Club Bowling League, with eight teams of ten people each. Membership is limited to faculty and their spouses, administrative staff, local alumni and townspeople who pay Faculty Club dues. Games are held inside the Faculty House/Alumni Center on Main Street, which has two candlepin bowling lanes. Some of the more enthusiastic and talented bowlers, according to Assistant College Librarian Jim Cubit, are Bob Kozelka, a math professor, and David Booth, the Vice Provost.

Vodka tasting events

The Faculty House acts as a social center for various members of the faculty and the administrative staff. According to Maureen Dietze, part-time assistant professor of Classics and chairperson of the Program Committee for the Faculty Club, past events that have been held in the Faculty House include a crafts fair, business lunches, theme dinners, dances, and, occasionally, vodka or wine tasting events.

The Faculty House also hosts magicians, puppet shows and cookie decorating parties for faculty children, and this year, there will be a skating party for teen-age children of faculty, according to Dietze. It is Faculty House policy not to admit students into the center, although some are occasionally invited in for panel discussions, she explained.

Although there are regularly planned social events at the Faculty House, according to Dietze, "No one really 'hangs out' here." Many of the faculty interviewed spoke of having occasional small cocktail parties among their friends. Dean of the College Stephen Flx said, "We are ordinary citizens of the College, as well as the town." When asked to name the more enthusiastic socials on staff, Flx pleaded the fifth amendment.

Karate club faces first competition

by Daniel Drezner

Karate has become the newest club sport at Williams. Michael Szalay '90, who said he wanted to continue his training while at college, founded the Williams Martial Arts Society (WMAS) earlier this year. The WMAS includes seven men and one woman, and will participate in a series of tournaments throughout the year, according to Szalay, the club's captain.

This past Saturday, the WMAS competed in the New Hampshire Tournament of Champions, their first tournament. Szalay had the best performance, with a third-place finish in the brown belt division. According to Szalay, this gives him a national ranking as set by the Professional Karate League.

Szalay had no opportunity to practice karate competitively before WMAS existed. "I had about two and a half years of training in tae-kwon-do (Korean martial arts) before I came to Williams," said Szalay. "I took a uchi-ryu (Okinawan martial arts) P.E. course my freshman year," he continued, "but there was no sparring, which I enjoy the most."

White to black

Szalay said he put an ad in the Daily Advisor for people interested in forming a karate club, and the WMAS was born. Members range in expertise from white belt, the lowest order, to black belt, the highest order, and styles vary considerably within the group, said Szalay.

Karate originated in China and spread to most of the Far East, including Korea and Japan. There are different styles of martial arts in each region, and the differences increase at the local level, according to Piotr Madej '90, a member of the WMAS.

Techniques

Individual members of WMAS gave many reasons for joining the group. Freshman Kenneth Levy started practicing ken-po about three years ago, after he was harassed once at school. "That night I decided to start (ken-po)," said Levy, a green belt. Levy said he feels that WMAS helps him with self-defense. "I can take experience from here and use it out there," he said.

Jim Fogerty, a white belt, was equally enthusiastic about the self-defense aspect of the organization. "It's the next best thing to bullets," he said, "I lay. Madej, the only black belt of the group, agreed. "I joined karate for enhancing my self-respect, exercise, and the good clean philosophy of martial arts," he said.

In actual karate matches, points are awarded for kicks or punches which land on the stomach, chest, or head, explained Szalay. The first competitor to accumulate three points wins the match. Because of the emphasis on contact, karate is a relatively injury-free sport. "No one has gotten hurt in practice besides a few nicks," said Szalay.

Szalay said he hopes that the WMAS will receive official recognition as a club sport on the same level as the Williams Ultimate Frisbee Organization (WUFO) next semester, after the group has participated in a knew plenty of guys who did it (in high school), and I just wanted to see what it was about." Fogerty receives training in a variety of styles from all members of the group. "Each of us brings to the other people in the group our own techniques," said Madej, who is trained in tang-soo-do, an off-shoot of tae-kwon-do.

WMAS members said that the elegance of martial arts constitutes much of its appeal. "In tournament competition, it's not like boxing, where the focus is on injury. Karate places the emphasis on contact," said Szafew tournaments like the one in New Hampshire. Karate is a full year sport, according to Szalay.

All WMAS members receive P.E. credit for their participation in the group, said Szalay. The WMAS practices two to three times a week in Towne Field House; members bring their own equipment, which consists mostly of shin padding and gloves, Madej added. People with at least limited experience in any form of the martial arts, including boxing, are encouraged to join the club, according to Szalay.

Middlebury

Chain letters and word of mouth alerted Middlebury College students to a glitch in the college's phone system that allowed them to place long distance calls for free. Students could call family and friends nation- and world-wide, any time of day, sans charge, by dialing "9" and the asterisk button, and then reaching an operator and placing the call. The problem was eliminated by late October, but it had already existed for four to five weeks. The college hopes that students did not abuse the system's weakness, but does not know yet if it will have to foot the bill for students' apparently untraceable calls. An anonymous junior, probably one of hundreds to take advantage of the situation, said, "It was great. I called friends in California and Wyoming, you know, lots of west coast places." Middlebury's phone bill will also include 20 45-minute calls to his girlfriend in New York.

Dartmouth

Williamstown's freak October snowstorm pales in comparison to the weather Dartmouth College sophomore Emily Hill had to face on a bus trip from Lhasa, Tibet, to Katmandu, Nepal, in late October. Hill and nine other travelers walked 60 miles through a heavy snowstorm to reach Katmandu, leaving ten others on the bus where they had been stranded for six days. On their walk to Nepal, Hill and her companions ate half a cup of barley flour mixed with cold water a day, according to her mother. Mrs. Hill contacted the U.S. Embassy in Katmandu when she did not receive a call from her daughter, but the embassy could take no action since Hill's group was in Chinese territory. Finally, the State Department and the NBC television network located the travelers, who did arrive safely in Katmandu. Hill is fine now, suffering only from aching feet.

Swarthmore

A freshman woman and her parents have decided to press criminal charges against a senior male student who attacked her during a Phi Sigma Kappa fraternity party at Swarthmore College in late October. The incident occurred as the woman was on her way to the basement of the Phi Sigma house with another male student just before 1:00 a.m. The attacker approached the freshman, spoke to her, and then began to punch her numerous times in the head, apparently without motive. Security officers found the senior in an "unstable condition," either alcohol or drug induced. The victim received counseling and her assailant was taken to Crozier-Chester Medical Center for observation and has been temporarily suspended from the college.

More Middlebury

Vito Acconci, infamous among Williams Art History students as a mystifying figure whose art includes biting himself and lying nude on a table before spectators, is at the heart of a controversy which began at Middlebury College in 1983. Acconci, as a visiting studio art professor, constructed a box-like sculpture called "Way Station" that featured sliding panels spelling "God Man Dog" on one side, playing cards on the other, a painted door and a sliding glass door. The work immediately begat criticism. Before its completion, vandals threw eggs at it, dented its corners, and urinated on it. Then, later in the year, Acconci's first "permanent" structure was burned to the ground. Amid all the anti-Acconci uproar, the college never attempted to find the culprit. Limited support came from a student organization, Pisov, or People in Support of Vito. Now the damaged sculpture resides in a barn on Route 125, with no final plans to restore or exhibit it. Acconci was said to be bewildered at all the fuss. He said had only intended to create "a kind of area you could almost be alone in and study."

Fluxus: after 25 years, it's still kicking

by Travis Pierson

One question that presents itself to the viewer of Fluxus: 25 Years, currently on display at the Williams College Museum of Art, is to what extent can Fluxus, an art movement begun in the early '60s and unfamiliar to most of the American public, still speak to us after 25 years?

Is it fluent in our language, or do its objects approach us like old men speaking an archaic, almost forgotten dialect of generations past? Is Fluxus a dynamic, trans-historical vision which can move us even now, or does its presentation seem more like an antique show, consisting of remnants of some more innocent age past?

Remarkably, Fluxus, for its lack of pretention and often small scale, does stand up, and rather than revealing its age, actually demonstrates how

by Erik T. Burns

British playwright Harold Pinter's work traditionally deals with interpersonal and interfamilial relations on the level of the banal turned bizarre and the normal become twisted. Pinter's The Homecoming, the subject of the current Williams theatre production directed by David Eppel being presented at the Adams Memorial Theater MainStage, is no exception.

The play examines, under a dramatic microscope, a widowed father named Max (Blake Robison '88) and his brood, two sons and a decrepit brother, who are jarred from their quotidian routine of insult and aggravation by the surprise return of their eldest brother Teddy (Will Hooper '89) and sister-in-law, Ruth (Melissa Levine '90).

Their visit degenerates into a nightmarish saga of sexual intrigue and sordid family infighting, and climaxes with a turn of events that almost turns the stomach.

Mad Max

The abusive, frustrated Max is admirably played by Robison, whose shouty vituperation is a solid pillar for the other characters to either emulate, attempt to ignore, or agitate. Although he has some difficulty with Max's advanced age (the character is supposed to be 80; Robison is a convincing 60) he brings to Max the patriarchal attitude and the unwavering pride that befit a head of household.

Spirit is the key for Indian dancers slated to perform

by Heidi Zimmerman

The beauty of Indian dance is in the expression of the eyes, the hands, and the soul. It is a form of spiritual communication between the dancers and their lord, Krishna. The Indian group Ranjana and the Nataraj Dancers will share their form of prayer in a performance Friday at 8 p.m. in Lasell Gymnasium.

Ranjana Haksar-Watson, originally from New Delhi, studied under Guru Gopinath of Kerala, who helped her develop not only her body, but her mind, as well. "My guru put the whole feeling of dance within me rather than projecting it outside of me," said Haksar-Watson, according to The Morning Union in Springfield.

Expanding on what her guru taught her, she began choreographing in 1972. She adapted much of the moves that she had learned in India to suit the longer, leaner bodies of Western women.

In Friday's show, the company will perform a selection from the dance-drama "Gita Govinda" ("Song of the Dark Lord"). It is based on an Indian love poem which explores the relationship between Krishna and Radha, a cowherding maiden.

The group will also perform several Temple Dance pieces in the graceful and emotional Odissi style. Dating back to at least the seventh century, this form was part of daily rituals in East Indian cultures. The music for the performance varies from traditional chants to more modern compositions.

To Haksar-Watson and her company, dancing is a soul-searching experience. The movements are delicate, as opposed to the more overt style of many Western moves, and the facial expressions are intrinsic to the joyful yet sacred essence of the dance.

In an interview in the Advocate, Haksar-Watson described her philosophy as an artist: "... I don't ever want to feel like I am merely entertaining. I want to spread the spiritual quality of dance. It's universal. I worship Krishna, she worships somebody else or no one, but the divine is inherent in all of us."

In addition to Friday's performance, Haksar-Watson will be giving a lecture entitled "The Role of Religion and Dance" tomorrow at 4 p.m. Also, a master class on East Indian dance will be offered Thursday at 4 p.m.; the lecture and workshop are both free and open to the public.

WJE excites despite 'poor balance blues'

by Matt Reed

The Williams Jazz Ensemble opened its 1987-88 concert season Saturday night in Chapin Hall and welcomed guest saxophonist Frank Bongiorno with a set of American standards.

The pieces ranged from the '60s-inspired funk of Thad Jones' "Us" to Bob Brookmeyer's layered "Hello and Goodbye." The band wove through the intricate Latin-inspired rhythms of Don Menza's "Samba de Rollins," which featured the saxophone section on auxiliary percussion.

The second set featured Bongiorno on soprano and alto saxophones. Bongiorno, who is affiliated with the University of North Carolina and has issued both jazz and classical recordings, led the band through six of his favorite charts, including two, "The Last Page" and "Samba du Bois," written by saxophonist Phil Woods. David Baker's arrangement of "Love for Sale" featured senior Rob Pucclariello on bass, and the saxophone section was particularly strong on Don Sebesky's "Song for Cymbaline."

The concert was marred, however, by repeated difficulties with the sound mix, particularly in the first set in which the brass section frequently drowned out the rhythm players and the levels of the guitar and saxophones were inconsistent. The band had difficulty overcoming these obstacles and several solos, notably by Eric Hanson '88 on trumpet and Adam Schlesinger '89 on piano, were lost under the acoustic muddle.

While the performance suffered a loss of dynamism from the submerged soloists and emerged a bit rough, the concert reflected a considerable amount of talent in the group. Bongiorno expressed great confidence in the band and applauded these talents.

Still, more attention must be paid to these problems so that the audience will be able to fully enjoy the talents of Director Kechley and the band.

provocative its ideas still are. What is striking is not how sophisticated and mature audiences have become since then, but rather how they haven't, and how avant-garde works which are 20 years old still have the ability to surprise and delight.

Tough to define

Fluxus: 25 Years, curated by original Fluxus artist and visiting professor Dick Higgins, is a relatively small exhibition, but it is well-chosen and features many of the most potent Fluxus objects. It spans from the earliest days of Fluxus to its artists' contemporary works.

The main exhibition room, featuring mostly older works, reflects the Victorian look of Fluxus and the atmosphere of 19th-century parlour games to which Fluxus is closely related. The early Fluxus pieces are notable for their sense of humor, and, Higgins remarked, the artists consciously used elements of parody as a reaction to the very humorless and self-righteous art environment (revolving mainly around Abstract Expressionism) which surrounded them in the late '50s and early '60s.

One of the centerpiece objects is Wolf Vostell's T.O.T. (Technological Oak Tree), a weather-monitoring device hung on a tree outside the museum, connected to a metal cabinet inside, which, when activated by the wind, sonically reacts to the weather conditions outside. Included in the cabinet is a file with sets of instructions for the participant to follow in response to certain weather conditions, such as "Photograph the tire of a Greyhound Bus and destroy the negative."

Allison Knowles, one of the original Fluxus artists, still maintains her interest in intermedial objects involving everyday things such as beans and shoes, but she incorporates them into much more traditional looking pieces. A pair of these pieces are showcased in the exhibition's second gallery: a wall hanging from 1987 titled Overview, consisting of a yarn round circle in brown flax containing child's shoe, and Bean and Barclay, from 1986.

Fluxworks, often involving the literary and tactile, beckon the viewer rather than coldly stare him or her down. This desired interaction can create problems, however, when the majority of the pieces, by virtue of their delicacy and rarity, cannot be handled by the public. This exhibit has attempted to remedy this by laying out some Fluxus journals and a boxed re-issue of George Brecht's Water Yam for the public to actually handle.

Higgins commented that the reason for the exhibition is that "It's time to transmit." He remarked that there is no longer any compulsion to present public, informal art anymore since the bureaucratic costs are too prohibitive, and profits are too minimal because Fluxus-type objects have never traditionally been embraced by art institutions since they were designed to be inexpensive and non-pretentious. He insisted that it is time to begin the process over again and present their ideas to the new generation and tell them, "Now it's your turn."

Fluxus: 25 Years will be on view in the WCMA Rose Gallery through January 3, 1988. A lecture related to the exhibition entitled "The Arts in Fusion: Intermedia Yesterday and Today" will be given by art critic Peter Frank tomorrow night at 8 in the WCMA museum/art department auditorium.

Review has disclosed that "black students are not advancing and, in some cases, are losing ground" in access to education relative to the 1970's. In The New York Times Karen Russell, a graduate of Harvard Law School, pointed to the pressures imposed on many black students to conform to mainstream life, disparaging the subtle racism that people "have to negate my race in order to accept me." Meanwhile, Time magazine (and other institutions) would like to typecast Asian-Americans as vaguely inhuman superachievers, and Williams' growing Hispanic community remains largely unnoticed by most Williams students. The time to communicate is now. Many forums for discussion are available, from the minority organizations to the Society Organized Against Racism. The Williams community as a whole should make use of these outlets, so that no one group should suffer the burden of adapting to life at Williams.

A joint statement issued by Thorndike and co-Editor in Chief John McDermott '88 said, "We regret the inaccuracies in last week's article, but we feel that Carter's response was unnecessary and inconsistent with the College Council constitution."

"We feel that in general our reporting on the council has been fair and accurate. Whenever we have identified significant errors we have published a correction, and we will continue to follow this policy."

even their year. They came anyway though. In the past they had felt that there was no place for them." Baird said, "For the first time they felt their alma mater could offer them something."

Alumni Review publicity

Pinello said that the only problem that the group has faced in organizing itself was in placing a public announcement in the Alumni Review. He had requested that a brief statement be placed in the Bits 'n Briefs section. According to Pinello, Thomas Bleezarde, editor of the Review, wanted to place the announcement in the Letters to the Editor section since it was an individual announcement not relating directly to activities on campus. After consultation with the editorial board of the Review, Bleezarde agreed to place the announcement in the Bits 'n Briefs section.

"I'm sorry Dan thinks there was a conflict," Bleezarde said.

"I didn't think it was." The decision to run the announcement, according to Bleezarde, was a purely editorial one. He said that Pinello had originally requested the announcement be run twice in special type, declarations which Bleezarde viewed as non-negotiable.

Pinello had compared the decision to run announcements in Bits 'n Briefs to pieces concerning a group of black alumni in New York. He said, "I thought it was directly pertinent to what we were doing."

Bleezarde said that the two groups were not analogous since the black alumni group was directly supported by the Williams Society of Alumni, both financially and by a staff. Bleezarde said, "What they've done on campus has been done with the support and approval of the Alumni Office and Hodge Markgraf," but it is more comparable to individual fraternity reunions and other alumni groups which hold private functions on campus.

Pinello said that he was impressed by the enthusiasm and activity of the BGLU. During his time as a student at Williams, he tried to form a gay liberation group, and, as Editor in Chief of the Williams Advocate, he said he ran a front page article on the group's beginnings and invited a number of guest speakers to campus."

The group disbanded, however, after Pinello's graduation. "I guess the group died from lack of interest," he said. "Only one other student on campus expressed interest. No one was willing to continue it."

"Students seem more comfortable with themselves, more willing to socialize," Pinello said. "There is a level of consciousness that was not there when I was there."

The gay and lesbian alumni group plans to work with the BGLU in organizing panels on gay and lesbian life after Williams and in providing support and some networking for students after they leave Williams.

Learning how to examine your breasts properly can help save your life. Breast cancer found early and treated promptly, has an excellent chance for cure. Once a month, about a week after your period, when your breasts are not tender or swollen, use this simple 3-step self-examination procedure. Regular inspection shows what is normal for you and will give you confidence in your examination. Most lumps are not cancer, but only a doctor can make a diagnosis. Ask your doctor to teach you this method:

1. In bath or shower.

Fingers flat, move gently over each breast with the opposite hand. Check for any lumps, hard knots or thickening.

3. Lying down.

To examine right breast, put pillow or folded towel under right shoulder. Place right hand behind head to distribute breast tissue more evenly on chest. With left hand fingers flat, press gently in small circular motions around an imaginary clock face. Begin at the outermost top of right breast (12:00, move on to 1:00, and so on, around and back to 12:00). A ridge of firm tissue in the lower curve of each breast is normal. Make about three circles moving closer and including nipple. Slowly repeat procedure on left breast. Notice how breast structure feels. Finally squeeze nipple gently between thumb and index finger. Fluxus: after 25 years, it's still kicking

by Travis Pierson

One question that presents itself to the viewer of Fluxus: 25 Years, currently on display at the Williams College Museum of Art, is to what extent can Fluxus, an art movement begun in the early '60s and unfamiliar to most of the American public, still speak to us after 25 years?

Is it fluent in our language, or do its objects approach us like old men speaking an archaic, almost forgotten dialect of generations past? Is Fluxus a dynamic, trans-historical vision which can move us even now, or does its presentation seem more like an antique show, consisting of remnants of some more innocent age past?

Remarkably, Fluxus, for its lack of pretention and often small scale, does stand up, and rather than revealing its age, actually demonstrates how

by Erik T. Burns

British playwright Harold Pinter's work traditionally deals with interpersonal and interfamilial relations on the level of the banal turned bizarre and the normal become twisted. Pinter's The Homecoming, the subject of the current Williams College production directed by David Eppel being presented at the Adams Memorial Theater MainStage, is no exception.

The play examines, under a dramatic microscope, a widowed father named Max (Blake Robison '88) and his brood, two sons and a decrepit brother, who are jarred from their quotidian routine of insult and aggravation by the surprise return of their eldest brother Teddy (Will Hooper '89) and sister-in-law, Ruth (Melissa Levine '90).

Their visit degenerates into a nightmarish saga of sexual intrigue and sordid family infighting, and climaxes with a turn of events that almost turns the stomach.

Mad Max

The abusive, frustrated Max is admirably played by Robison, whose shouty vituperation is a solid pillar for the other characters to either emulate, attempt to ignore, or agitate. Although he has some difficulty with Max's advanced age (the character is supposed to be 80; Robison is a convincing 60) he brings to Max the patriarchal attitude and the unwavering pride that befit a head of household.

by Heidi Zimmerman

The beauty of Indian dance is in the expression of the eyes, the hands, and the soul. It is a form of spiritual communication between the dancers and their lord, Krishna. The Indian group Ranjana and the Nataraj Dancers will share their form of prayer in a performance Friday at 8 p.m. in Laseil Gymnasium.

Ranjana Haksar-Watson, originally from New Delhi, studied under Guru Gopinath of Kerala, who helped her develop not only her body, but her mind, as well. "My guru put the whole feeling of dance within me rather than projecting it outside of me," said Haksar-Watson, according to The Morning Union in Springfield.

Expanding on what her guru taught her, she began choreographing in 1972. She adapted much of the moves that she had learned in India to suit the longer, leaner bodies of Western women.

In Friday's show, the company will perform a selection from the dance-drama "Gita Govinda" ("Song of the Dark Lord"). It is based on an Indian love poem which explores the relationship between Krishna and Radha, a cowherding maiden.

The group will also perform several Temple Dance pieces in the graceful and emotional Odissi style. Dating back to at least the seventh century, this form was part of daily rituals in East Indian cultures. The music for the performance varies from traditional chants to more modern compositions.

To Haksar-Watson and her company, dancing is a soul-searching experience. The movements are delicate, as opposed to the more overt style of many Western moves, and the facial expressions are intrinsic to the joyful yet sacred essence of the dance.

In an interview in the Advocate, Haksar-Watson described her philosophy as an artist: "... I don't ever want to feel like I am merely entertaining. I want to spread the spiritual quality of dance. It's universal. I worship Krishna, she worships somebody else or no one, but the divine is inherent in all of us."

In addition to Friday's performance, Haksar-Watson will be giving a lecture entitled "The Role of Religion and Dance" tomorrow at 4 p.m. Also, a master class on East Indian dance will be offered Thursday at 4 p.m.; the lecture and workshop are both free and open to the public.

WJE excites despite 'poor balance blues'

by Matt Reed

The Williams Jazz Ensemble opened its 1987-88 concert season Saturday night in Chapin Hall and welcomed guest saxophonist Frank Bongiorno with a set of American standards.

The pieces ranged from the '60s-inspired funk of Thad Jones' "Us" to Bob Brookmeyer's layered "Hello and Goodbye." The band wove through the intricate Latin-inspired rhythms of Don Menza's "Samba de Rollins," which featured the saxophone section on auxiliary percussion.

The second set featured Bongiorno on soprano and alto saxophones. Bongiorno, who is affiliated with the University of North Carolina and has issued both jazz and classical recordings, led the band through six of his favorite charts, including two, "The Last Page" and "Samba du Bois," written by saxophonist Phil Woods. David Baker's arrangement of "Love for Sale" featured senior Rob Puccliarlello on bass, and the saxophone section was particularly strong on Don Sebesky's "Song for Cymbaline."

The concert was marred, however, by repeated difficulties with the sound mix, particularly in the first set in which the brass section frequently drowned out the rhythm players and the levels of the guitar and saxophones were inconsistent. The band had difficulty overcoming these obstacles and several solos, notably by Eric Hanson '88 on trumpet and Adam Schlesinger '89 on piano, were lost under the acoustic muddle.

While the performance suffered a loss of dynamism from the submerged soloists and emerged a bit rough, the concert reflected a considerable amount of talent in the group. Bongiorno expressed great confidence in the band and applauded these talents.

Still, more attention must be paid to these problems so that the audience will be able to fully enjoy the talents of Director Kechley and the band.

provocative its ideas still are. What is striking is not how sophisticated and mature audiences have become since then, but rather how they haven't, and how avant-garde works which are 20 years old still have the ability to surprise and delight.

Tough to define

Fluxus: 25 Years, curated by original Fluxus artist and visiting professor Dick Higgins, is a relatively small exhibition, but it is well-chosen and features many of the most potent Fluxus objects. It spans from the earliest days of Fluxus to its artists' contemporary works.

The main exhibition room, featuring mostly older works, reflects the Victorian look of Fluxus and the atmosphere of 19th-century parlour games to which Fluxus is closely related. The early Fluxus pieces are notable for their sense of humor, and Higgins remarked, the artists consciously used elements of parody as a reaction to the very humorless and self-righteous art environment (revolving mainly around Abstract Expressionism) which surrounded them in the late '50s and early '60s.

One of the centerpieces to the exhibit is Wolf Vostell's T.O.T. (Technological Oak Tree), a weather-monitoring device hung on a tree outside the museum, connected to a metal cabinet inside, which, when activated by the wind, sonically reacts to the weather conditions outside. Included in the cabinet is a file with sets of instructions for the participant to follow in response to certain weather conditions, such as "Photo-

Allison Knowles, one of the original Fluxus artists, still maintains her interest in intermedial objects involving everyday things such as beans and shoes, but she incorporates them into much more traditional looking pieces. A pair of these pieces are showcased in the exhibit on its second gallery: a wall hanging from 1987 titled Overview, consisting of a yarn round circle in brown flax containing child's shoe, and Bean and Barley, from 1986.

Fluxworks, often involving the literary and tactile, beckon the viewer rather than coldly stare him or her down. This desired interaction can create problems, however, when the majority of the pieces, by virtue of their delicacy and rarity, cannot be handled by the public. This exhibit has attempted to remedy this by laying out some Fluxus journals and a boxed re-issue of George Brecht's Water Yam for the public to actually handle.

Higgins commented that the reason for the exhibition is that "It's time to transmit." He remarked that there is no longer any compulsion to present public, informal art anymore since the bureaucratic costs are too prohibitive, and profits are too minimal because Fluxus-type objects have never traditionally been embraced by art institutions since they were designed to be inexpensive and non-pretentious. He insisted that it is time to begin the process over again and present their ideas to the new generation and tell them, "Now it's your turn."

Fluxus: 25 Years will be on view in the WCMA Rose Gallery through January 3, 1988. A lecture related to the exhibition entitled "The Arts in Fusion: Intermedia Yesterday and Today" will be given by art critic Peter Frank tomorrow night at 8 in the WCMA museum/art department auditorium.

Review has disclosed that "black students are not advancing and, in some cases, are losing ground" in access to education relative to the 1970's. In The New York Times Karen Russell, a graduate of Harvard Law School, pointed to the pressures imposed on many black students to conform to mainstream life, disparaging the subtle racism that people "have to negate my race in order to accept me." Meanwhile, Time magazine (and other institutions) would like to typecast Asian-Americans as vaguely inhuman superachievers, and Williams' growing Hispanic community remains largely unnoticed by most Williams students. The time to communicate is now. Many forums for discussion are available, from the minority organizations to the Society Organized Against Racism. The Williams community as a whole should make use of these outlets, so that no one group should suffer the burden of adapting to life at Williams.

A joint statement issued by Thorndike and co-Editor in Chief John McDermott '88 said, "We regret the inaccuracies in last week's article, but we feel that Carter's response was unnecessary and inconsistent with the College Council constitution."

"We feel that in general our reporting on the council has been fair and accurate. Whenever we have identified significant errors we have published a correction, and we will continue to follow this policy."

even their year. They came anyway though. In the past they had felt that there was no place for them." Baird said, "For the first time they felt their alma mater could offer them something."

Alumni Review publicity

Pinello said that the only problem that the group has faced in organizing itself was in placing a public announcement in the Alumni Review. He had requested that a brief statement be placed in the Bits 'n Briefs section. According to Pinello, Thomas Bleezarde, editor of the Review, wanted to place the announcement in the Letters to the Editor section since it was an individual announcement not relating directly to activities on campus. After consultation with the editorial board of the Review, Bleezarde agreed to place the announcement in the Bits 'n Briefs section.

"I'm sorry Dan thinks there was a conflict," Bleezarde said.

"I didn't think it was." The decision to run the announcement, according to Bleezarde, was a purely editorial one. He said that Pinello had originally requested the announcement be run twice in special type, decisions which Bleezarde viewed as non-negotiable.

Pinello had compared the decision to run announcements in Bits 'n Briefs to pieces concerning a group of black alumni in New York. He said, "I thought it was directly pertinent to what we were doing."

Bleezarde said that the two groups were not analogous since the black alumni group was directly supported by the Williams Society of Alumni, both financially and by a staff. Bleezarde said, "What they've done on campus has been done with the support and approval of the Alumni Office and Hodge Markgraf," but it is more comparable to individual fraternity reunions and other alumni groups which hold private functions on campus.

Pinello said that he was impressed by the enthusiasm and activity of the BGLU. During his time as a student at Williams, he tried to form a gay liberation group, and, as Editor in Chief of the Williams Advocate, he said he ran a front page article on the group's beginnings and invited a number of guest speakers to campus.

The group disbanded, however, after Pinello's graduation. "I guess the group died from lack of interest," he said. "Only one other student on campus expressed interest. No one was willing to continue it."

"Students seem more comfortable with themselves, more willing to socialize," Pinello said. "There is a level of consciousness that was not there when I was there."

The gay and lesbian alumni group plans to work with the BGLU in organizing panels on gay and lesbian life after Williams and in providing support and some networking for students after they leave Williams.

Once a month, about a week after your period, when your breasts are not tender or swollen, use this simple 3-step self-examination procedure. Regular inspection shows what is normal for you and will give you confidence in your examination. Most lumps are not cancer, but only a doctor can make a diagnosis. Ask your doctor to teach you this method.

1. In bath or shower.

Fingers flat, move gently over each breast with the opposite hand. Check for any lumps, hard knots or thickening.

3. Lying down.

To examine right breast, put pillow or folded towel under right shoulder. Place right hand behind head to distribute breast tissue more evenly on chest.

With left hand fingers flat, press gently in small circular motions around an imaginary clock face. Begin at the outermost top of right breast (12:00), move on to 1:00, and so on, around and back to 12:00. A ridge of firm tissue in the lower curve of each breast is normal. Art alumni applaud MassMoCA Panza

by Scott J. O'Callaghan

Several prominent art museum directors, who are also Williams College alumni, spoke positively about the proposed Massachusetts Museum of Contemporary Art (MassMoCA) last week.

"I don't think a museum of contemporary art is different there (in North Adams) than anywhere in the universe," said Robert Buck Jr., '61, Director of the Brooklyn Museum of Art. He said he thinks that the project of MassMoCA, has taken an unusual approach in laying out the design of the museum. He has said that he will use the large space provided by the Sprague Electric plant to display a smaller number of larger works.

Earl Powell '3d '66, Director of the Los Angeles County Museum of Art, called MassMoCA a "major tourist attraction, augmenting the Clark Institute of Art and the Williams College Museum of Art (WCMA)."

Thomas Krens, Director of the WCMA and the chief planner unusual approach in laying out the design of the museum. He has said that he will use the large space provided by the Sprague Electric plant to display a smaller number of larger works.

Arthur Wheelock '65, Curator of Northern Baroque Painting at the National Gallery, applauded this arrangement. "Not many people have the luxury of that kind of space," he said. "If you have really powerful modern objects, they need the '60's uses industrial techniques, and there is a connection there between how things are made (and where they would be housed)."

He said that it was not difficult to have his work displayed in museums, but that it is difficult to have it housed properly on permanent display.

Panza said, "I believe this museum will become a great attraction not only for the American people. This kind of art is well noted in Europe." He said only a few works of this type can be seen in Europe and that people are interested in seeing larger collections, so that many of MassMoCA's patrons would be people Europeans.

He noted that three-quarters of the work in the collection is by American artists, and so it is only natural for the work to come back to America.

'organic display'

The different rooms in the museum would be large spaces devoted to a single artist, resulting in "an organic display of the work (in which) each room will be related to another room without a disturbing element," Panza said.

In renovating the complex for use as an art museum, Panza said the structure inside the buildings of the complex would be changed, but the outside would remain as it is now.

At the conference, Panza said that he would be willing to wait another year for funding for the project if the Massachusetts Convention Center Bill is not approved by the House by Dec. 31.

Krens has said in the past that the project cannot succeed if funding is not approved by the 31st.

Stern said later in the week that Sprague Technologies Inc.'s agreement to donate its 28-building mill complex expires on December 31 and she pointed out that it costs Sprague about $1 million a year to heat the complex, which it is not using right now. "There are other things they (Sprague) could be doing with the building, and it costs them to maintain it," Stern said. Sprague might demolish the buildings, renovate them or turn off the heat.

In a related development, a petition that has been circulated in favor of the MassMoCA project has gained 10,700 signatures, according to Corydon Thurston, president of the Northern Berkshire Chamber of Commerce. Copies of the petition were scheduled to arrive at the State House yesterday.

Black Student Union (WBSU) might be helpful in understanding minority concerns.

Staci Williams '88 emphasized the importance of individuality and perspective in dealing with racism on campus. She said, "Each black person has a different experience."

Williams became aware of these differences soon after her arrival on campus. She said, "I came from a background totally different from Williams. At first I thought it was totally awesome. The problem began to start when I'd get into conversations with other people."

According to Williams, it became apparent that her perspective on politics differed from that held by others. "I made a concerted effort to try to understand," she said. But, "When it came to people trying to understand my point of view, they were silent, they didn't say anything. I asked, 'Do you have a point of view?'"

William Hoch '89 said he realized that the problem of race relations at Williams was just part of a bigger problem, that "people at Williams don't try to deal with differences." Hoch said that racism at Williams is not just a black-white issue and referred to Zinn's speech at the September Class Meetings about the baggage that all students bring with them to Williams.

"Our baggage is important to us," Hoch said. "We can't ever put that baggage down, it's our heritage and our culture." He encouraged students to show that baggage to others and to not try to force others into a mold. He said, "We often blame the victims for the problem. When we ask why the black students hang out together, the minority group stays together because of the oppression of the speaker."

Courtney Saunders '89 said that she had never noticed overt racism at Williams. When she mentioned this to her father, he said that this might be because she just ignored it. She said, "I haven't really run into racism. I have seen a lot of ignorance." Saunders also spoke of the need to look at people as individuals rather than as members of a group. She said, "Yes, I'm black. Yes, I'm female. But I'm also Courtney Lee Saunders."

John Rumsey '88, a former Junior Adviser, called the WBSU orientation for black freshmen as divisive and compared it to early practice for freshmen football players. He said that both tended to separate groups of students from the freshmen class during Freshmen Days and that, "I object to the timing."

Kin Ma '89 spoke of the assimilation of Asian students at Williams. He attributed this to the pressure to succeed through conformance. He said, "I haven't experienced blatant racism on campus," and that the message which Asians often receive from their parents if they do is, "Just go on, push ahead, don't worry about it...Get the education, get the job and you'll be fine."

Ken Alleyne '88 said, while he did feel racism exists at Williams, "I also think you'd be hard pressed to find any diverse group where it didn't exist." He encouraged students to look at individuals and said, "Our professors urge us to look beyond generalizations. This doesn't carry from the academic realm into the social realm."

Jose Calero '89 said students at Williams tend to ignore the fact that he is Hispanic. "You're not black, you're not white. You're somewhere in the middle," he said.

Calero pointed to statistics that, while Hispanics are the second largest minority group in the country, they are the least represented at Williams. Reasons for this, he said, may be the lack of a program in Latin American Studies and the absence of Hispanic faculty.

When he was looking at Williams, Calero said, "I thought it would be a real challenge. Believe me, it has been a challenge."

During a brief question and answer period, many students brought up the issue of education and whose responsibility it is to educate students about race relations. Calero placed a large part of the responsibility on the college and said, "I don't have the time to educate." Williams agreed with him and said, "If the person doesn't have the time to understand, I don't care."

Following the panel, students were encouraged to return to their houses and entries for follow-up discussions. The panel was jointly sponsored by the Commission on Campus Race Relations and the College Council.

Women discuss working

by Alice Maurice

To what can a woman aspire in the university system, and what barriers will she face? A panel discussion entitled "Women in the Academy" addressed this question and raised issues ranging from child care to sexism in the classroom.

The panelists were Assistant Director of Admissions Karen Flischer, Williams College Food Service Nutritionist Virginia Skorupski, Professor of English Lynda Bundtzen, News Director Ellen Berek and Katie Kent '88.

Kent said the panelists were chosen to represent women working in many different capacities within the university system. However, she noted that because there was no diversity of race or sexual preference among the panelists, they could not speak for all women.

Kent read from the works of feminist writer Adrienne Rich, who said that women, whatever their role in the academy, are ultimately used to support the male ego. In order to move up, according to Rich, women must identify with the men in power, resulting in fragmentation among women of different rank in the academy.

Fisher noted that "problems (for women) are intensified in this atmosphere of high achievement." Although she said that role models in the uni-the Secret Team began with the creation of Operation Forty, which was initiated by then Vice President Richard Nixon within the CIA to overthrow Cuban leader Fidel Castro.

Richie said the connections to the underworld began with the creation of the Shooter Team, an elite assassination team which was trained by the Mafia. Five of the defendants, as well as Watergate burglars E. Howard Hunt were on the Shooter Team.

In 1962, Operation Forty became Operation Mongoose and was run by Theodore Shackley.

Richie said that during the Vietnam War, Shackley made a connection with Vang Pao, an important opium trafficker in Laos. According to Richie, Shackley helped Vang Pao eliminate his competitors in return for assassinations of suspected Communist sympathizers.

Richie said that the Secret Team began to break away from the CIA when they financed operations in Vietnam by bringing heroin into the US for a cut of the profits. Richie said the team expanded its operations to the Middle East and Latin America and trained and armed the Contras between 1979 and 1981.

Cindy Terrell gave background information on the work and goals of the Christic Institute. "I think our general hopes is that people at the national level, as well as the grassroots level and all the levels in between, keep talking about the current scandal," said Terrell. She said the Christic Institute currently has a mailing list of 45,000 people.

that kind of space around them."

The ability to group an artist's works in one area is an added bonus that the proposed museum offers, Wheelock said, because it will create an atmosphere in which the works of one artist will not compete with the works of other artists.

Describing the effect the museum could have on the art world, James Pilgrim '63, Deputy Vice-Director of the Metropolitan Museum of Art, said, "I think the opportunity to see some of that large scale, that large conceptual work, in some consistent way is positive." He cited the lack of outlets for work of this type as a strength of the proposed museum.

At present, two major collectors have agreed to long-term loans of parts of their collections: Giuseppe Panza of Milan and Charles Saatchi of London. Buck called the two collections "staggering and almost without equal."

James Wood '63, Director of the Art Institute of Chicago, referred to Panza as one of the most important collectors in Europe in the 60's and 70's. "He was buying early enough that you didn't just have to have money. And, he bought what he liked." Wood added that this has given the Panza collection a certain personality. "He's been trying to place this material for a long time now, trying to find a home." He said that Panza wants his collection to be seen, which is not possible now, because many of the works are in storage.

Wood described the Saatchi collection as having a different type of personality than Panza's. He said this difference was caused by the short time span over which Saatchi collected the art and the high purchase prices of the works. He called the collection "trendy", but also said that works.

Women

versity are invariably men, she warned against intimidation. Women must take risks, she insisted, to redefine these models.

Skorupski talked about the balancing act most women must perform in juggling roles of wife, mother and worker. "To do all these things is frequently an impossible task," she said, but she pointed to the need for clear choices and determination.

Although she emphasized Williams students' excellent opportunities for choices, Skorupski quoted Food Service employment statistics which say that few women possess administrative or managerial positions and that women hold 83 percent of the secretarial and clerical positions and 100 percent of the salad department positions. Salad department workers are the lowest paid, she added.

Bundtzen also quoted Rich: "The token woman is encouraged to see herself as different from other women." One of the first women to become a tenured faculty member at Williams, Bundtzen said the primary danger she faces is being denied her identity with other women. "I must not celebrate my ostensibly insider's position... I am not going to be token again."

Berek also talked about fragmentation. She said that a woman's expectations should not be limited by anyone's views but her own.

The majority of the panel was to a question and answer period. The issue of child care sparked several questions. Bundtzen said that she felt Williams is unwilling to look deeply into the issue of child care because it is not thought to be the business of a college.

Gail Henderson '87 talked about the diversity of women's experiences with respect to race. "While white women are struggling for a job as C.E.O. ... so many women of color are struggling for food every day ... the battles are very different."

Assistant Professor of English Anita Sokolsky raised the point of women's participation in classroom discussions. Sokolsky said that she noticed in her classes that women do not speak up as much as men. The audience seemed to agree that women usually speak softer in class and that men tend to interrupt women - including professors - more often.

The discussion was sponsored by the Feminist Alliance.

Parking

Street, in Denison Park, to accommodate the parking needs of spectators at Weston Field.

250 more spaces possible
These three potential parking areas, if built, would provide an additional 250 spaces. Jenks estimated that the cost for the entire project would be $500,000.

"If we went along with the three new places, it would suffice for five to ten years," Jenks said.

The college has retained the services of a Boston architectural firm to design plans for the new lots, Wagner said.

There has been no serious problems with faculty and staff parking, Jenks said. Although there are only 477 spaces reserved for faculty and staff parking, Jenks said that many of the 890 faculty and staff members either walk to campus or travel in carpools.

The problem has also been kept to a minimum, he said, by the enforcement of rules that prohibit students from parking in many areas of the inner campus, which is predominately reserved for faculty and staff parking.

In the beginning stages of the committee's activities, there was some consideration given to the idea of building a parking garage on campus, but that idea was frowned upon by too many people, Jenks said.

Last year, some consideration was given to expanding the I-lot, north of the Old Infirmary, but the idea was rejected, according to Jenks, because of possible plans to develop that area.

When it completes its examination of the parking situation, the committee will submit a recommendation to the administration, which will make the final decision, Jenks said.

Raisbeck chairs a CC subcommittee which serves as a liaison between students and the ad hoc committee. Raisbeck said the CC subcommittee is also looking into ticketing and fining procedures.

According to Raisbeck, Spencer house has voiced opposition to locating a new parking lot behind Weston Language Center, because it uses the area for cookouts and other functions.

Now that you've gotten into Williams, IBM can help you get more out of it.

The road to graduation is paved with term papers, lab reports, cramming, all-nighters and, of course, exams.

To ease that journey and awaken your professors to your exceptional abilities, we suggest the newest member of the IBM® Personal System/2™ family: the Model 25 Collegiate.

It's a high-powered personal computer with advanced graphics capabilities, designed to fit on your desk without adding to the clutter. And it comes with a generous 640 KB memory, two 3.5" diskette drives and an aid package every student can appreciate—a big discount, plus Microsoft® Windows 1.04, Write, Paint, Cardfile, IBM DOS 3.3 and a mouse.

Pop in the load-and-go diskette and your Model 25 Collegiate is set to help you write and revise long papers and illustrate your points by combining words and graphics. So your professors will draw favorable conclusions about your work.

Homecoming

life of the family from falling into monotony.

Also worthy of note is Douglas Hunt '89 who plays Sam, the decaying and supraloyal brother of Max. His mix of sincerity and enthusiasm bring life to the slowly dying Sam, and his boyish gawkiness is often cause for laughter.

Pinter's drama is one of human interaction. Normal situations become bizarre and it is the reaction, or non-reaction, to the oddness that reflect the playwright's themes of group alienation, sexual ambiguity, emotionality, and the breakdown of family relations.

There is a searing emptiness to The Homecoming that is initially established by the family's non-recognition of the expatriate Teddy's absence. This emptiness is amplified by their blasé acceptance of his sudden, unexpected return as a married man and culminates in Teddy's own willingness to give up his wife to his family, to provide them a new mother, and to leave, defeated.

The Homecoming leaves the viewer feeling disembodied, infused with a gentle and terrifying chill, and startlingly aware of the absurdity of human affairs.

Eppel directs with an eye for subtle and, at times, distressing humor not readily evident in the text. A reader of the play would be hard-pressed to call it a comedy, and yet there are numerous times during the production that are quite funny.

Emptiness
The emptiness of the play is emphasized by the technical aspect of the show. Arden Fingerrhut's scenic design is fabulously drab, emphasizing the individuality of furniture and the bareness of the house. The soaring verticality of the room gives the impression that the actors are very small and insignificant and gives movement onstage an eerie wraithlike quality.

The scenic design is brilliantly matched by Southy Walton's costumes. Colors follow characters: Robison's color scheme is a mix of that of his three sons and matches his chair as well, as do a number of other characters, most notably Ruth. The family's first view of Teddy and Ruth is striking — they descend the stark stairs like happy monarchs, swaddled in royal purple bedclothes while the drab men look on like non-plussed peasantry.

On the whole, the production is very well done, suffused with stifled energy and vitality and fueled by a genuine understanding of the material. The cast works well together and suffers only from an occasional tendency to stumble on Pinter's trademark pauses. In general, the production works like a well-oiled machine, with all of the technical and theatrical elements meshing to form a unified whole.

The Homecoming will be presented Thursday, Friday and Saturday evenings at 8:00 at the Adams Memorial Theatre MainStage. Tickets, $2 or $1 with a Williams I.D., are available from the MainStage box office (reservations at 597-2425).

Hockey loses only to Trinity on season periods, but the play raged all over the field. With less than a minute left in the half, the Ephs were robbed of a goal when the official blew the ball dead just as a Williams player found the net. "That hurt" said Mason, "The official should have let us play the advantage but she blew the whistle and gave us a penalty corner instead."

The players battled to a scoreless tie through nearly all the second half before Trinity's Jan Brewster scored her second goal of the game with a minute remaining.

Despite the loss, Mason was pleased with her team's performance. "We played a much better game than we did the first meeting. Last time we were real tense out there, but this time we were passing well and getting the ball downfield. The difference in this game was that we weren't getting off quality shots off but they were."

The team thus ends its season with a second place finish in New England and a tie for the Little Three Crown. The prospects for the future are even brighter, however as only two players will be lost to graduation. Those two players, Tene-rowicz, who sparked the offense with a team high nine goals, and Suzanne Falcone '88, who lead the defense that held nine of fourteen opponents scoreless will be sorely missed.

However, with a fantastic sophomore class, including Mo Flaherty (six goals, seven assists) and defender Beth McNulty, as well as the return of juniors Kirsten Nuese and Hohlt, next year's team will look to challenge Trinity for mastery of New England.

regular season contest against Amherst tomorrow at Cole Field. The Ephs won the first leg of the Little Three battle by winning 2-0 at Wesleyan last Saturday.

Sunday's match was played before a large and vocal crowd. The first half was a tight defensive struggle by both teams, with neither side mustering many offensive threats. Just a couple of minutes into the second half, the visitors broke on top with a cross and shot that keeper Rob Black '89 couldn't save. For much of the half, things looked bad for the Ephs, as time ran down and repeated Williams chances were turned aside.

Ephs tie it!

With 15:20 left in regulation play, the Ephmen finally tallied the equalizer. Wingback Steve Bailey '91 made a run up the left flank and chipped a cross into the goalmouth. All American Mike Masters '89 rose above a crowd of defenders and headed the ball inside the far post.

That score of 1-1 was to last for the rest of regulation play, sending the match into a twenty minute overtime period. Williams wasted no time as they scored just 32 seconds into OT when Ambi Stearn '90 pounced on a rebound in the penalty box and rifled it into the net. The Eph defense held on during the last few minutes to seal the victory.

"I'm on top of the world right now. The way we came back really shows what we're made of," said sweeper Dan Calichman '90. Eph captain Nick Nachamkin '88 said "I thought at the start of the year a reasonable goal for the team was to merely make the playoffs. To win the championship while going 14-1 is just amazing."

Williams entered Sunday's final game by defeating Westfield State at home on Thursday by a score of 4-0. Nachamkin tallied twice as Masters and Emil Mugnaini '89 also scored. In Saturday's Wesleyan game, Nachamkin and Stearn scored for the Ephs as goalie Black recorded his tenth shutout.

If the Ephs continue their winning ways and emerge victorious in this week's games, they could finish with a staggering 17-1 record and a place among the top Division III schools in the nation.

game ending whistle marked a 34-3 victory and a chance for the Killer-B's to secure the Little Three Title they lost last spring.

The Lord Jeffs of Amherst, the shameless defectors of 1821, slink into the Purple Valley this weekend. The A-side has once this season faced and vanquished this hated foe and their chances for recapturing the Little Three mantle they forfeited a year ago seem promising.

For the B-side the challenge of Amherst on the pitch will be a fresh one. If their play in recent weeks, capped by Sunday's performance, is an apt indication of the second fifteen's ability, homecoming weekend in the Berkshires could prove awfully trying on the rugger from America's fourth ranked (and distantly so) college. Back in black on November 14th is the only way to end the '87 season.

Featuring a temperature ten degrees higher than Williams-town's, running conditions at last Saturday's ECAC meet at Tufts helped the women's team perform strongly and set personal records. Finishing with a score 425, the Ephs placed 17th out of 28 teams.

Williams does not usually enter a team in the ECAC meet, and Coach Larry Bell purposely did not enter his top seven runners in the race, both to give them a rest before the NCAA race to be held on November 14th and to give other team members a chance to run in a championship race.

Leading the team last Saturday was freshman Mary Moule, who sliced 40 seconds off her best time to finish 54th out of 194 runners with a time of 20:22. Moule was followed by: Sarah Hams '89, 69th at 20:42; Kate Holliday '91, 106th at 21:24; Gillian Ladd '89, 116th at 21:54; Margot Cowan '89, 131st at 22:29; and Karen Chilcote '88, 140th with 22:53.

Coach Larry Bell commented on their performances, "They ran an excellent race, considering that they ran against other schools' top seven runners. For most of them, this was the fastest they've run all year, if not the fastest they've ever run." Cowan echoed Bell's satisfaction with the race: "It was a beautiful day, a good course, and a tremendous way to end the season."

Next Saturday the team travels to Southern Massachusetts University for the NCAA national qualifying race. Because Williams belongs to the NESCAC, it is automatically disqualified from entering in the nationals. However, Bell hopes that one or more of the runners he is entering will qualify in the individual category. To do so, the Ephs will really have to put in their best effort, as only the top 13 of the over 250 expected runners qualify for nationals. Cathy Cocks '89, Ann Dannhauer '90, Jen Garret '89, Captain Sarah Pierce '88, Anne Platt '91, Stacey Smith '90 and Ingrid Wiesel '90 will represent Williams at the race.

W Rugby

Between the thrill of victory and the agony of defeat lies the frustration of the tied game, as the WWRFC learned last weekend in two scoreless matches at Wesleyan. The A-side squad got off to a sluggish start, finally waking up with a scoring drive that was sadly cut short by the end of the half.

Frustration turned into frenzied play and the second half became, as one spectator noted, not the elegant violence that is the hallmark of women's rugby, but just plain violence. Injuries and penalties abounded. After several thwarted scoring attempts and a narrowly missed three point penalty kick, the game remained tied at zero, even in overtime.

The B-side seemed afflicted with the same inability to take any offensive initiative, although they came tragically close to getting the ball in the try zone on a clever scrum play by Andrea Neumaier '91 and a breakaway run by Kerry Killander '89. On defense, Julie Norton '89 rallied her scrum buddies in the rucks and mauls and Audrey Chan '89 made many devastating tackles, which relentlessly drove back the advancing Cardinals. Nevertheless the final score was 0-0.

The C-side match was cancelled by Wesleyan, adding insult to injury, but the C's once again demonstrated their patience and sportsmanship. Although their season has consisted of little playing and much sideline cheering, their dedication and enthusiasm has been greatly appreciated by the club. A Wesleyan tie still gives the WWRFC the opportunity to capture the Little Three Title with a victory over Amherst next Saturday at Cole Field.

Sailing

On the weekend of October 11th and 12th, the Williams Sailing Club won its first award in years (perhaps decades). A team of five sailors finished third in their division. This regatta differed from the usual intercollegiate regattas which Williams races in because large boats, ranging from 30 to 42 feet, were used, as opposed to 14 foot long boats.

Each team raced on a boat owned by a member of the Corinthian Sailing Association, while the owner remained on board to act as a coach. The Williams team consisted of skipper Geoff Oxnam '91, and crew members: Dave Baxter '90, Andy Saunders '90, Jeannine Swift '90, and Katherine Kevill '89.

This regatta ended a busy and successful fall season for the sailing club which participated in six other regattas in the New England area, and held practices for the first time. The club owns a few lasers, (small, one-person boats) which it sails on Lake Pontoosac in Pittsfield.

Sports 15

by Al Mottur and Ted Hobart

This weekend the men's soccer team will travel to Long Island for a regional ECAC playoff showdown. Thus far this year the squad, now 14-1, has defeated every Division III opponent it has faced, and battled Division I Dartmouth in a narrow 3-2 loss. Currently ranked first in New England and fifth in the nation among all Division III schools, this team is obviously of the highest caliber among small schools in the country.

However, those who would like to see the Ephs face the likes of Division III powerhouses such as Scranton and Binghamton (two teams currently ranked ahead of the Ephs) in national playoff competition are disappointed by the fact that Williams teams in the New England Small College Athletic Conference are prevented from playing in NCAA playoffs by league rules. As it stands, all NESCAC teams can advance no farther than the finals of the regional tournament.

However, in individual sports, Williams is able to, and does send representatives to national competitions. Last year, several members of the ski team, along with Athletic Director Robert Peck, flew to Alaska for national competition. Similarly, individual Ephs participated in national tennis, golf, and wrestling tournaments last season.

The principle behind not letting NESCAC teams into NCAA tournaments comes from the league's basic philosophy that small liberal arts institutions have an academic reputation which would be damaged by imitating collegiate athletic powerhouses. Further, the league saw national playoffs as an interruption of academic proceedings and as an unnecessary additional expense to be borne by small colleges.

Ironically, for example, each of the four members of a 4x100 meter relay team could qualify to compete individually in the Division III nationals, but the four could not compete as a team in the relay. Similarly, even if many individual members of a team did very well in a national competition, Williams could not be considered in the team standings.

We feel this situation is unfair and inappropriate. Why can Harvard and Duke, two outstanding academic universities, send their teams to the NCAA competition for national recognition without damaging their academic integrity, while Williams and Amherst, to name two, cannot?

Certainly, allowing our teams to participate in national competition would not radically alter our stated policy toward athletics (recruiting and academics), nor would it compromise our vaunted academic standing. Furthermore, the NCAA now provides monetary aid to Div. III schools to send teams to national tournaments. It also has scheduled the majority of these contests on weekends to limit academic conflicts.

Besides, how can one golfer be allowed to go to the Div. III national tourney and not our soccer team? By going alone, does he not injure his, and the institution's, academic integrity, as a team would if it went as a whole?

Letting a team participate on a national level can be beneficial to a school's athletic and academic image without endangering its moral integrity. Putting Williams on the map by advertising it to outstanding scholar-athletes is a step that can only help the college. We would urge NESCAC officials to rethink their stance.

11-2-1 Field Hockey 2nd at NIACs, beats Bowdoin

by Marc McDermott

The Field Hockey team ended the regular season with a 1-0 victory over visiting Connecticut College to push its record to 10-1-1 -- the best regular season record in school history -- before travelling to Hartford, Connecticut to play in the two-day NIAC tournament. The second seeded Ephs thoroughly outplayed nationally ranked Bowdoin College in the semi-finals before bowing to undefeated host Trinity, the only team to beat Williams this year, in the championship bout.

In the tournament opener versus Bowdoin, the Ephs opened fire with an offensive barrage of seventeen shots on goal with eighteen penalty corners (compared to eight and four respectively for Bowdoin) but could not find the net. Williams goalie Wyn Hohit '89 kept the Ephs in the game by turning away all Bowdoin offerings, and the game was forced into overtime.

During the three ten minute overtime periods, Bowdoin continually pulled back players to help on defense and thus managed only one shot on goal the entire time. Williams smashed nine more misguided shots at the superlative Polar Bear netminder before the third OT's final horn sounded, signalling a game deciding shootout.

Tenerowicz Scores

After Hohit turned back the first of five Bowdoin attempts, senior co-captain Lisa Tenerowicz finally solved the puzzle of the Bowdoin keeper, slamming the ball home for the game's only score. Hohit held off the final Polar Bear attempts to preserve the 1-0 shutout and put the Ephs in the finals.

Thus on the second day of play, the Ephs had to face Trinity, a team coach Chris Mason acknowledged as a better club than Williams. The Bantams took the lead on the strength of goals in each of the first two

by Al Mottur

Powered by an awesome ground attack, an efficient passing game, and a defense that held its opponents to 226 total yards, the football team crushed Wesleyan on Saturday by a 35-7 score and set up a pivotal Little Three Championship finale at Weston Field against Amherst this Saturday.

The win over the hapless Cardinals puts the Ephs' record at 3-4 and gives them a chance, with a win over Amherst, to improve on last year's season. (The Ephs last year went 4-4, but lost the Little Three Crown to the Jeffs in the final game). Beating Amherst will be no small task, however. The Jeffs, who beat Trinity 13-10 this weekend, are now 6-1 and will probably carry the number one ranking in New England into Williamstown this Saturday.

Before game time, head coach Richard Farley advised his players not to think of the Amherst game, for it would be less meaningful if they failed to defeat Wesleyan. Taking the coach's words to task, the Ephs jumped out to a 20-0 lead and never looked back, thanks in large part to the running of the super sophomore tandem of Neal Chesley and Mo Holden, and the blocking of fullback John Perryman '90.

Chesley, who rushed for 79 yards on the team's opening 84 yard TD drive, and 156 yards overall, continued to shine while Holden, bouncing back from several weeks of limited running action, pounded out 106 yards and scored two TD's. Meanwhile, junior quarterback Scott Kennedy was busy having his best day of the season, dissecting the Cardinal secondary for 162 yards on 8 of 12 passes as he threw for two touchdowns.

Defense shines

And, as the offense put forth its best effort of the year, the Williams defensive unit excelled as well, keeping the Cardinals from mounting any sustained momentum. The defense was well prepared for the Wesleyan veer running attack after a week of grueling practice. "We had some pretty physical practices which ultimately paid off. Credit has to go to Rob Gotti '89, Carey Simon '90 and Tim Oliver '90 for running the (Wesleyan style) offense so well," said Farley.

Individual standouts for the defensive corps were: Dave Montgomery '89 and Dan Pritchard '88, each of whom had two sacks, co-captain Dave Crompton '88 who registered one sack, and defensive backs Bill Wurm '88 and Rich Williams '90 who each had an interception.

Little Three Title?

With the win, the Ephs now have an opportunity to salvage what had appeared several weeks ago to be a lost season. Said Farley, "In view of what happened early on, it would be a great way to finish ... We've had some adversity we hadn't planned on -- injuries to Dave Clawson '89 and Cliff Wright '90 -- and it (a win over Amherst) would make for a very fine year."

Farley did say that most oddsmakers would have to favor the Lord Jeffs, but was quick to point out that "we've generally risen to the occasion. And we have the opportunity to make our season." The first-year coach said that to win, the Ephs have to establish the ground game because "if we can't, we're going to have some problems. Another key will be the specialty teams."

"Amherst has a talented QB who runs well, and they are deep in the skill positions. I think it will be a very competitive game. What happened yesterday, (the rout of Wesleyan) pretty much sharpened our confidence."

Male ruggers embarrass Wesleyan by 23 points

by Andy Harris

Rallying from a 7-6 halftime deficit, the White Dogs of the WRFC ripped four second half scores against the Wesleyan Cardinals as the A-side romped to a 30-7 victory, securing the first jewel in the Little Three Crown. In the second match, the Killer B's cavorted to a similar tally behind a pair of tries from J. Chapman Petersen '90, and outstanding loose play by junior Chris Falmedo.

The 7-6 Cardinal margin lasted only until very early in the second half when the Williams line, sparked by the precision kicks and consistent passing of flyhalf Mike Goldstein '88, provided three quick tries. Chris Swindell '88 delivered the final notice of White Canine superiority as he swirled into the try zone off a scrumdown in Cardinal territory.

Surviving the adversity of impossible angles and negotiating the dervish winds that teased the ball all afternoon, fullback Jon Hollenberg '88 converted all 5 of the Williams kicks, giving him ten points on the day.

The B-side game mirrored the earlier Williams triumph from the starting whistle. Wesleyan took an early 3-0 lead off a penalty kick, before the 'RFC rebounded with some nifty line work and a tryzone pass from Micheal Scheibe '88 that enabled Steve Felix '90 to touch-down for the points. The B's turned up the heat in the second half, despite injuries to two starting linemen.

The hard driving scrum consistently won the ball on the hooking prowess of Jon Dillon '89, while the trickery of the backs frustrated an over-extended Cardinal line. When the dust finally settled, the

by Al Mottur

It was well worth the wait. Breaking a six year drought, the Williams football team trounced Amherst by a stunning 25-7 score to capture the 1987 Little Three Title and round out the season with a 4-4 record.

"We beat Amherst with good, old-fashioned football. That was the name of the game," said an elated Richard Farley, who is now 1-0 against Amherst as head coach at Williams.

The upset over the previously 6-1 Lord Jeffs, before a sellout throng of 8000 fans at Weston Field, was made possible by a swarming defense that held the Amherst offense to a measly 125 total yards while forcing five turnovers. Cooperating in the effort in no small part was the Eph offense, which pounded its way for 315 yards, 153 of which came from the slashing running of sophomore Neal Chesley.

Beating the Jeffs was no easy task, however, and at halftime the score stood at 7-3 in favor of Amherst. The two squads felt each other out in the early going, and it was not until the 1:31 mark of the first quarter that Williams got on the board when a 32 yard Bill Crowley '91 field goal capitalized on a costly Amherst fumble. As if awakened from a daze, the Jeffs took the kickoff and pounded for 60 yards and a Dan Tate TD run. The Eph defense was unable in this drive to contain the Jeff option game, and left the field at halftime trailing by four.

When Amherst returned the second half kickoff all the way to the Eph 42, things looked bleak for the Williams faithful. During that opening series, however, came the emotional turning point in the

Fix invites comments on ID locking system

by Peter Balaban

Williams moved closer to the possibility of having locks installed on dormitories and selected academic buildings last week when Dean of the College Stephen Fix sent a letter to the Williams community about the proposal.

The letter, which appeared in student mailboxes last Thursday, said that student input on the final decision will be gathered from a several sources, including an open meeting on Tuesday, December 1 at 7:30 in Bronfman Auditorium for all interested in discussing the proposal.

The Committee on Undergraduate Life (CUL), the College Council and the Housing Committee will also be discussing the proposal. According to the letter, House Presidents and Junior Advisors will be discussing the subject in their houses and entries.

College Council President Carter Zinn '88 said the Council will discuss and vote on the proposal this Thursday after Council members ask students at house and entry snacks how they feel about the proposal.

Zinn said voting will give the Council "a feeling for which way the consensus is going ... it's not a yes-or-no final thing that will make any subsequent discussion meaningless."

The CUL will also discuss the proposal at a meeting tomorrow, according to Professor Olga Beaver, who chairs the committee. She said she plans to forward committee members' questions about the proposal to the Deans office, as well as the committee's opinion on the proposal if they reach a consensus.

Daniel Comiskey '88, chairman of the Housing Committee, said the committee will probably discuss the proposal on December 8, after the open meeting, and that he will forward committee member's opinions and specific objections to the Dean's office. He said that House Presidents probably will not bring up the proposal in house snacks before the open meeting, but they might.

The system the Dean's office is considering installing, according to the letter, would cost between $300,000 - $450,000, depending on how many academic buildings are included in the project. It could be programmed to lock dormitories and selected educational buildings during particular times of the day, it said.

Director of Security Ransom Jenks said that only educational buildings where students would be working late at night would be included in the system. He said that the system could make buildings like Goodrich Hall and science quad buildings more accessible to certain students by allowing them access at off hours.

"It would open up the possibility of a department head allow-

'Guerrilla Girls' accuse Krens of slanted displays

by Scott J. O'Callaghan

Thomas Krens, director of the Williams College Museum of Art (WCMA) and the originator of a proposed Massachusetts Museum of Contemporary Art (MassMoCA), last week denied charges that the WCMA's purchases and selection of exhibitions discriminate against women and minority artists.

The charges were made in a letter from an organization called the "Guerrilla Girls, Conscience of the Art World," a group of anonymous female artists centered in New York City. Krens said he received the letter on November 6. A copy of the letter was sent to the Record in a campus-mail envelope.

The letter said that 87 percent of the WCMA's exhibitions, projects, major purchases and borrowings were works by white male artists. According to the letter, six percent of the works were by female artists, and seven percent by minority artists. The statistics cover the period from Fall, 1985, through next Spring.

'A little skewed'

"It looks to me to be a little skewed ... The statistics are selective," Krens said of the letter. He said the statistics do not take into account a recent purchase of several Lauren Ewing works, and current negotiations for works by Jennie Holster, Ida Applebrough and more works by Ewing. Krens also said that the letter did not take into account the artist-in-residence program, which in ten years has included seven women artists and 13 men.

He said that a single-person exhibition of the works of Leslie Park is planned for the summer of 1988 at WCMA, and that he is planning to have three exhibitions of Afro-American artists' work in 1989.

Krens criticized the letter for including WCMA's borrowings from the Sonnabend Gallery. "I think that's a ridiculous category," he said. "If a collector offers you ten works on a long-term loan and only one of them happens to be by a woman, we didn't turn it down on the grounds it's not evenly balanced."

Krens said that 13 of the 60 artists whose work he would like to see at MassMoCA are women.

Stern: selective statistics

Zelda Stern, publicity director for the WCMA, said the time frame of the statistics in the letter was not representative. "It didn't go back far enough to include the Irish Contemporary Art show ... which was primarily by women." Stern also pointed out

Two alumni return to teach peace

by Stephanie Jones

David Yaskulka '84 and Dominic Kulik '86 slept on church floors and at a nudist camp and stayed with peace activists and Marines during their 10,000 mile bicycle trip around the United States. Yaskulka said that "the people in the country, who were so uniformly kind and generous to us in all regions" are what he remembers most.

Yaskulka and Kulik began their year-long journey, called the Gaudino Project, on October 1, 1986. Its purpose was to publicize student-student pedagogy and the problem of securing world peace. They traveled to 36 states and 25 colleges and universities and ran over 40 workshops. Yaskulka said that they were especially interested in bringing their message to students and tried to visit the most influential schools in each region. At least ten student-run courses and a Peace Studies Program have been created as a result of the project.

The two gave a talk about their experiences last week called "Taking a Year On: Common Security, Non-Violent Sanctions, and a Thousand-Mile Bicycle Journey."

When Yaskulka and Kulik first began planning their trip, they had no money. "It began as something of a leap of faith," Yaskulka said. Before they began the journey, they received a $2000 grant from the Gaudino Memorial Fund. In December 1986 they received a $12,000 Newland Foundation Grant which made up 75 percent of their working budget. College president Francis Oakley also donated money from the President's Fund toward the project. They continued to receive small stipends and grants as they traveled around the country.

Support from Williams

They said they received a good deal of support from Williams faculty and students who are involved in the student-initiated course "Nonviolence and Social Change". The Gaudino Committee and Gaudino Scholar Kurt Tauber, who served as an advisor for the project, were also very helpful, they said.

Yaskulka and Kulik's message included the idea of common security and nonviolent sanctions. They said that they tried to look at the deeper question of the problem of defense. "Ask the question 'what for?' whether than 'how much?'" Yaskulka said. They said that the United States was spending $40 billion to protect its oil interests in the Persian Gulf when a better way to spend the money could be energy conservation.

Yaskulka said that students around the country were very

Locks and Logic

Last year's Committee on Undergraduate Life (CUL) recommended to the Dean's office a lock system which would make dormitories and certain other buildings accessible to possessors of Williams ID's. Such a system allows for flexibility as to which buildings would be locked and when. In a letter addressed to the Williams community Thursday, Dean of the College Stephen Fix invited comments on this proposed system.

This invitation reflects a practical concern of the administration: to ensure support for a system that would cost $300,000-$450,000 to install $20,000 annually to maintain.

No price is too high for the safety of the community, but the college cannot afford a system that would not only fail to improve security but might actually decrease it. The proposed system falls into that category.

The CUL, according to Fix's letter, asserts that the ID lock system would limit access to holders of Williams ID's. Yet how many of us have visited other colleges with locked buildings where we entered a building when someone held open a door for us? It is hard to imagine students refusing to hold open doors for people walking in behind them.

The ineffectiveness of the proposed system would be compounded by the false sense of security that it would create. Although students will not enforce entry by ID's, they will assume that the dormitories are safer, and even fewer students will lock their room doors than do so now.

The proposed system will therefore facilitate access to students' rooms — by people from on campus or from outside of campus. While the system is ostensibly aimed at outsiders, insiders can also steal and rape. The assailant who reportedly raped a Williams student in January was never identified by police as either a member of the Williams community or an outsider.

What students need — this system will affect primarily dormitory residents, who are students — is to have their rooms protected when they are in or out of them. Students need effective locks on their doors, and they need to use those locks regularly.

If the college installs strong locks on room doors — not locks that can be kicked in or opened using a credit card — then each student will have the possibility and responsibility to protect himself or herself. The Dean's office can distribute literature periodically reminding students of the possible dangers an open door invites and urging that doors be locked. The college perpetuates the myth that Williams is safe, and the college can correct that myth. If arriving freshmen are told of the necessity of locking doors, they will by and large accept it.

Other facilities, such as science labs and art studios, do need increased security, allowing certain people increased access and prohibiting entry to everyone else after a certain time of day. The proposed lock system poses the same problem as it does for dormitories of not effectively restricting access. If the college is prepared to spend more than half a million dollars to protect community members it should spend that money in a way that encourages responsibility, instead of creating a false and misleading sense of security.

Love from Kyoto: '87 alumni send thoughts on early Williams season

To the Editor:

It was with great anticipation and gratitude that we received the October 13 issue of the Williams Record in Osaka, Japan. While we were disheartened by the third straight loss of the football team and the controversial Rosemarie Tong affair, we were reassured by the nascent spiritual rejuvenation of Cliffe Knechtle.

Despite your accurate reporting, some critical questions remain concerning the folled robbery attempt at Wesleyan. A follow-up would be welcome.

We await your reply.

Millenium of Christianity in USSR finds Soviet intolerance, repression

To the Editor:

I would like to call the college community's attention to a matter of international significance that is little spoken of both at Williams and at large. I am referring to the policy of religious persecution adhered to by the atheistic Soviet regime. The plight of Jews and dissidents in the USSR is a well-known fact, but I would also like to point out an issue that is much less publicized: the persecution of Christians.

This issue is particularly relevant today because we find ourselves on the eve of the millenium (988-1988) of Russian Christianity. Many believers living under Soviet rule will not be able to share in this joyous holiday since they are made victims for confessing their faith. It is a well-documented fact that since 1917 thousands of Russian Orthodox churches have been destroyed or converted into warehouses and anti-religious museums. A great number of priests, monks, nuns and faithful have been killed by the Communist government.

Today, many thousands are incarcerated or forced to undergo psychiatric "treatment" for practicing their faith. Still other open believers jeopardize their careers or even face dismissal from their jobs. Any form of religious teaching aimed at children and adolescents is expressly forbidden by the Soviet regime.

The Helsinki Act, Article 18 of the International Treaty of Civil Rights and Political Rights and even the Constitution of the USSR guarantee freedom of religious confession; yet these documents seem to be ignored by Soviet officials. In my three years at Williams I have observed how members of the college have been active in supporting the cause of human rights in various parts of the world.

I appeal to all those who value the freedom of religion we enjoy to demand the release of all prisoners of conscience by the Soviet government. I call upon you to demand an end to the outrageous hypocrisy that has gone on for 70 years in the Soviet Union, so that Soviet Christians may celebrate the upcoming feast unhindered, in peace and freedom.

Williamstown has a host of events to offer for faculty's participation

To the Editor:

As a new member of the college staff, I would like to add to Alex Oh's list of activities for the "ordinary citizens of Williamstown" mentioned in the article "Faculty pursue varied social activities" (November 10).

In addition to the bowling league, vodka and wine tastings, and Faculty Club events, how about films at Images, hikes on the Williams Outing Club trails, and the lectures and debates and performances most every night on campus as listed in the Weekly Calendar! In the last few weeks, I have enjoyed a political talk, a jazz concert, Little Three athletic events, and Matewan at Images.

In addition, Oh did not mention how many faculty and staff jog, swim, shoot baskets, play squash, or do aerobics on a regular basis to keep trim and fit.

Most of all, as a newcomer, I am impressed by the great amount of civic work which the faculty and staff undertake to make Williamstown and North Berkshire a very special place in which to live.

My sense is that we adults do have a decent social life here in the Purple Valley.

What do we at Williams mean as we share views on racism?

by Hee-Sun Hong '90

The November 8th panel discussion sponsored by the Commission on Campus Race Relations (CCRR) was aimed to "root out internalized anger and uninformed opinion, and to expose it to the rigors of informed discussion," according to the recently published College Council Report. Without a doubt this goal is a crucial one, but one that will take more than one panel discussion to achieve. Frankly, in a room filled with 500 people, a truly rigorous discussion is limited, and the rooting out of internalized anger or even the recognition that one's opinions are "uninformed" is unlikely.

By the same token, we must keep in mind that the eight panelists were not necessarily an accurate cross-section of Williams students. Each student was an individual and not a token representative of his or her race, class, gender, economic group and so forth. As I listened to the panel discussion, however, I feared that the 'Asian perspective' (I use this term with hesitation, since I wish to stress that there is no single perspective for any race) presented by Kin Ma would be generalized by some students to be the perspective of Asian students at Williams. Kin's view of the success-oriented Asian who works hard to assimilate into the United States, while often denying his background in order to do so, is a view that is commonly held both at this college and nationwide. Time magazine's August 31 cover story entitled "Those Asian-American Whiz Kids" clearly illustrates that this stereotype is being applied more and more.

Many people view this characterization as a positive one, and therefore feel that the stereotype, unlike negative ones, is not harmful to Asians; but any stereotype, either positive or negative, is limiting and therefore detrimental. I myself remember my freshman year how "deindividualized" I felt when my advisor, assuming that English was my second language, suggested that I take a remedial writing course to get a grasp on rudimentary grammar. This event passed after I merely told him that I wasn't satisfied with my writing style. To any other student he probably would have suggested the writing workshop; because I look Asian he felt he could make certain assumptions about me.

While we all make generalizations about people, when these generalizations become assumptions, we do a terrible injustice not only to the person we are generalizing about, but also to ourselves. Whether people are of a different race or of the same race, there will always be many unique experiences, but also some common ones. Instead of focusing solely on these differences and often subsequently forming assumptions and barriers from them, focusing on the entire individual without attempting to pigeonhole that person might, in the long run, provide not only for better race relations but also for the fostering of better individual relationships.

Issues of racism are not black and white. Rather, racism can be better understood as a spectrum from the blatant to the subtle, from the institutional to the individual. Also, just as we must be careful not to generalize or label people, not all misunderstandings involving two or more people are related to race. Ignorance can often provide for racist attitudes, but it is not synonymous with racism. At the same time, while we must be sensitive to acts of racism, we cannot expect to find the causes or answers to our problems at Williams overnight. An unrealistic yet zealous attitude often manifests itself with a finger pointing blame at various institutions, individual groups, and, most sadly, at the victims themselves. Even at the panel discussion this approach could be seen in the amount of time spent discussing the Williams Black Student Union's pre-freshman orientation. Some viewed this process to be a major underlying cause of some of the tension at Williams; in fact, only about six freshmen this year were involved.

The CCRR's stated aim for arranging the panel discussion was a significant one, but more needs to be done in order to prevent the discussion from becoming a mere token gesture on the part of the College Council to acknowledge that there is a problem of racism and misunderstanding at Williams. I say this though I admit I have no easy solutions.

Again, I must stress that I am not a spokesperson for Asians at Williams College.

Remember who you are — Solomon studies Alzheimer's

by Marilyn Germano

Professors usually seem to care about how much people remember, but Associate Professor of Psychology Paul Solomon spends his time researching how much people forget.

Solomon has been conducting research that may eventually uncover some of the mysteries of Alzheimer's disease (AD), a debilitating illness that leads to severe mental and physical degeneration and draws many of its victims from the elderly population.

Solomon has been studying memory for about 15 years, with a specific interest in memory deficits. Earlier research he had conducted found that damage incurred by a particular area of the brain, the hippocampus, caused severe memory deficits. Other research on the effects of aging on memory, conducted around 1980, discovered that patients with AD had severe hippocampal degeneration; there was more damage found in the hippocampus than in any other area of the brain. "That's what got our attention," he said.

This research relates to Alzheimer's, because one of the effects that the disease has on its patients is a steady deterioration of memory. There seemed to be a connection between the severe damage to the hippocampus in Alzheimer's patients and their loss of memory processes. To study these memory deficits further, Solomon and his colleagues began to experiment with subjects in four conditions: aged animals, aged humans, humans with AD, and animals with conditions that mimic Alzheimer's.

Rabbits and humans

One way to produce some of the pathology of Alzheimer's in animals is to inject them with aluminum. Solomon explained that in the 1960's it was found that aluminum could produce some of the conditions in humans that are similar to those of AD.

"When we inject the rabbits with aluminum," he said, "a number of things happen. The memory deficits produced are very much like the memory deficits in Alzheimer's patients. Neurochemical changes also take place in the brains of rabbits, and when we compare

Prime time viewing — watching tv watch AIDS

by Beth Broadrup

When Tim Cook was watching television some years ago, he did not like what he saw. "I had been distressed by the media's coverage of AIDS," said Cook. "Its urgency was being downplayed by the media and politicians, and it was virtually ignored by television."

Cook, an assistant professor of political science, said his concern with the lack of attention devoted to the AIDS (Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome) epidemic was one of the factors prompting his current research on the media's coverage of the disease.

Cook's interest in doing collaborative research with former Williams professor David Colby, now at the University of Maryland Baltimore County, was also an impetus to his research, he said. Cook specializes in mass media and political institutions; Colby's area of expertise includes social movements and health policy. Cook and Colby's resulting research on AIDS and the media was a combination of their individual interests in social movements and mass media.

Under the umbrella topic of "social movements and mass media," Cook and Colby had the opportunity to address issues ranging from the gay movement to the reaction of mass media and political institutions to AIDS. Until now, research concerning the media's coverage of AIDS had primarily spotlighted the print media, including newspapers and magazines, Cook said. His research is breaking new ground with its focus on television coverage of the epidemic from 1982 to 1985.

'Cyclic effect'

The primary sources for Cook's research were videotapes of televised nightly news broadcasts, obtained from Vanderbilt University's video library, spanning the three-year period.

Cook's findings exposed what he called the "cyclic effect" of television's AIDS coverage. Between 1982 and 1985, the number of AIDS cases increased from 1,000 to almost 10,000; during the same period, medical articles on AIDS grew steadily from practically none to 1,900. Yet television coverage was inconsistent with the growing reality of AIDS. It increased and decreased in cycles, including months in 1984 when there was no coverage and then a storm of news when Rock Hudson died of AIDS a year later.

Although AIDS cases were reported as early as 1977, Cook said "the media discovered the disease" in the late spring of

Timothy Cook

1983. "The initial coverage was fairly explicit; patients' lesions ... were shown. It was very depressing and upsetting," Cook explained. The initial coverage, which had depicted AIDS as mainly a gay disease, escalated into what Cook termed "the epidemic of fear."

Cook said that the AIDS hysteria was largely created by television reports, which included stories of police wearing plastic gloves when dealing with homosexuals and nurses refusing to treat AIDS patients. "It is a classic example of the news media's unwillingness to recognize they have created this phenomenon," he said.

A guide to dining hall
ambiance

by Erik T. Burns

Dining at Williams is a singular experience. There are five main dining halls, the presence of which provides Williams students with something almost non-existent at other small colleges: a choice of where to eat.

Of course, many people simply eat wherever it is most convenient — in other words, the dining hall nearest to their location at mealtime. But some have more aesthetic considerations in mind when choosing a spot to dine. It is for these discerning souls that the following descriptions and reviews of the major gustatory facilities on campus is provided.

Driscoll

Driscoll Hall is by far the most intimate dining area on campus. The peculiar "basement effect" that the sunken interior creates provides diners with a quiet and dark atmosphere, almost as if one were eating at a cozy restaurant. Some complain of the lack of light, others hall it. The staff at Driscoll put in an extra effort to make diners feel loved and at home.

The Driscoll Experience, as it is known, is one of dining fun, eating with close friends, and sequestering the self from the maelstrom of the outside world, if even for a brief moment. The major complaint with Driscoll is perpetual long lines caused by the odd logistics of the serving area and friendly servers who pass the time of day instead of passing the chicken cutlets.

Greylock

Greylock Dining Hall is the social arena of the upperclass. Well-lit and spacious, Greylock provides ample opportunity for extramasticatory activity, including the subtle observation of other diners. Frequented by the faculty (who seem to be perpetually saying "Lunch? What about Greylock?"), Greylock is the ultimate grazing ground for the epicurean esthete — the huge picture windows overlook both the graceful brickbuilt quad and the picturesquely named "Swamp," a grassy playing field with mountains for a backdrop. This hall seems huge, with high ceilings and plenty of dining space, avoiding the cramped, elbow-to-elbow scuffling that a small hall like Driscoll promotes but also losing out on some of the intimacy as well.

Located "in the belly of the beast," one of the Mission Park Dining Hall's biggest attractions is the effortless flume.

Mission Park

Located in the belly of the beast, Mission Park Dining Hall is not what one might consider an elegant place to eat. Functionally built, like all of the Park, the hall is there solely for the purpose of eating. Lines move quickly, the flume is a blessing (just drop your tray on the conveyor belt and off it goes to God-knows-where), and the service is perfunctorily pleasant. This utilitarian attitude towards mealtime is responsible for the extremely common "Let's go to Mission, eat, and get out" mentality.

Even so, the Park is a hub of social activity, especially with the influx of teams after 6:00 p.m. The Park is the evolutionary offshoot of Baxter Hall, infused with the same chaotic hub-bub and is dearly loved by many for whom dining is not a big-to-do. Complaints have to do with the tables, many of which wobble, and the odd shape of the trays. Pluses are ease of sneaking in if you forget your card and the everpopular flume.

Dodd

Dodd is the quintessential brunch location, furnished with wooden tables that call out for coffee and waffles and an overlook that is hauntingly reminiscent of home. The dining room from the old Williams Inn is by far the closest approximation that the college has of a true restaurant. This is where you take your parents to eat, or prospective. The intense, somewhat dark atmosphere lends itself to reflective over-dinner conversations or even romantic hand-holding and eye-gazing.

Diners at Dodd are the most conspicuous regulars on campus, for although Driscoll has a cadre of dedicated feasters and the Park has its residents, the character of the Dodd hall seems to remain constant. If you eat at Dodd, you eat there every day without fail, and visitors, although they do not feel out of place, do feel like visitors.

Menu-planners try to please student tastes

by Alex Oh

"Imagine yourself suddenly employed as the cook for a family of 2000 people....," read the Food Service messages that adorned every dining hall table last week. "What will you make for dinner tonight?" Well, how do they know what to make for dinner tonight?

"The diversity of the Williams student body makes it a challenge to cook for them," said Virginia Skorupski, the college nutritionist. As the nutritionist, Skorupski is the one who writes out the rough menu three weeks ahead of the actual serving time; she doesn't, however, have absolute control over what the students get to eat, for there are various other factors that need to be taken under consideration before the menu can be finalized.

For instance, Skorupski said she has to confer with each of the unit managers for approval and with the purchasing people, who actually buy the food, to see if things will be available and if the price will be within budget.

Also, since Williamstown is not exactly a busy commercial center, the actual process of getting food delivered can be a factor in deciding menus. Other factors to be considered before finalizing the menu include nutrition, dining hall facilities — whether or not each individual dining hall can produce the dish — and most importantly, student acceptability.

Savory Tofu Pie

Skorupski cited the tofu dishes — Savory Tofu Pie — as one of the occasional failures in terms of raising student interest; others include lima bean salad and lentil salad. The more popular dishes, according to Skorupski, are chicken cutlets and chicken tenderloins.

Once a menu is finalized, it is sent to each dining hall. The individual dining halls act as separate units in terms of cooking, with Baxter's Central Storage area, located behind the mailroom, serving as a kind of a supermarket. Each dining hall manager will look at the menu and order the food for each meal. The order will then be processed at the storage area, and the required amount of food will be delivered to each separate unit.

Mike Sale, the First Cook for Mission Park dining hall, said that for an average dinner consisting of beef and fish, he would order about 150 lbs. of beef and 30 lbs. of fish. These orders would then be processed at Baxter and delivered to him either the day before, or on the day of the meal.

Sale said that most meat comes in fresh from the market, although he occasionally uses frozen meat. He also emphasized that most foods used in preparation of meals were fresh, including eggs, fruits and vegetables.

Leftovers

With regard to leftovers, both Sale and Skorupski said that there is a policy which prohibits a dish from being served at more than two meals. Whether the leftover will be frozen and served at a later date, or served the day after, according to Skorupski, is up to the individual unit managers. If after two meals the same food is still left, then it gets thrown away, according to Sale.

For desserts, there is a single bakery located in Baxter that bakes for all five dining halls and the snack bar. Contrary to popular belief, the pastries that are sold at the snack bar are not leftovers from breakfasts at dining halls, but separately ordered from the bakery by the snack bar manager.

Wesleyan

The Wesleyan Student Assembly (WSA) is planning to appoint four students to a Dining Task Force to review dining at Wesleyan and recommend improvements. The idea for the Dining Task Force came from the Report of the Task Force on Residential Life issued last spring. According to WSA member Jeanette Hsu '89, the Residential Life Task Force found that "dining has a lot to do with residential life."

Connecticut College

The Connecticut College dining service measured 700 pounds of food waste after one dinner, so it estimates that 4900 pounds of food per week, or 127,400 pounds per year, are wasted by students at the college. "It is obscene to waste food in a world where children die of hunger," said acting Chaplain Larry LaPointe. According to Rob Cardeiro '90, it is not the students' fault, because "the food tastes terrible."

Hamilton

Hamilton College's meal plan lottery, where students could reduce or cancel their meal plans, closed early this fall due to the unanticipated number of students who wanted to make a change. This year only seniors were allowed to reduce their meal plans. "I don't think the quality of the food has changed (from previous years)," said Associate Dean of Students Donna Savage. "We've gotten the usual complaints which we're looking into, but nothing out of the ordinary."

Dine print exhibit boasts bathrobes and much more

by Michael Barsanti

Most of the art found in museums consists of finished products. However, the new exhibit at the Williams College Museum of Art, "Jim Dine Prints 1977-1985," shows art as a process, and fits each piece into a history.

The exhibition, which will be on display in the museum's atrium through January 17, contains many works that expand upon fundamental themes derived from day-to-day life. The way in which Dine varies these themes, in creating prints of everyday objects like bathrobes and tools, lets the viewer see the way in which an idea grows and evolves.

The space for this exhibition is split between two rooms. One has prints of natural themes: trees, gates, and floral images. The other contains more traditional objects, like the bathrobes and hearts that made up his first exhibit at Williams in 1976 that was organized by WCMA director Thomas Krens. In both rooms, prints of the same object are grouped in sequence. Each sequence begins with a basic original print that gets recolored, added to, sanded down, or somehow modified to convey a different idea.

Goodrich Gallery showcases local talent

by Travis Pierson

The name "Goodrich Gallery," which refers to the exhibition space located in front of the Goodrich art studios, may not sound familiar. Somewhat overshadowed by the Williams College Museum of Art which resides next door, the Gallery has nonetheless showcased a number of artists from the Williams community whose work is often as intriguing as that presented in its neighboring building.

Under the supervision of Art Department Chairman Ed Epping and art history graduate student Priscilla Vall, the Gallery displays the work of Williams students and faculty, and has recently started showing the works of Williams graduates under the Alumni Exhibition Program.

During the current school year, the Gallery has featured a number of engaging one-person shows. One outstanding example of work earlier this year was senior Cathy Salser's I/mage Mag/ic Imagination Mage Mag/net Imagensis. A powerful exploration into the strength of womankind, the exhibit consisted of primarily female images threatening to break away from their two-dimensional state.

Woman as warrior

In Salser's self-portraits, her face is streaked with reds and blues that resemble war paints, evoking the image of woman as warrior and creating a statement of positive control. In her self-portraits, the artist takes charge of painting herself and does the representing rather than being the represented, as has been the case for women throughout most of art's history.

One particularly dynamic picture features a small figure in the background taken from a Gustave Klimt painting, who is curled up in a fetal position, while in the foreground, another woman, who, while similarly reclining, does not act as an icon of submissiveness, but instead pushes her feet towards and mockingly peers out at the viewer.

The Goodrich Gallery, located between Lawrence Hall and Lasell Gymnasium on Main Street, currently houses an exhibition by Visiting Professor of Art Karen McCoy. (Chan)

Adding to the spirit of Salser's paintings were a number of quotations from authors such as Monique Wittig and Starhawk and also from the magazine Woman of Power. The exhibition reflected well one of the chief advantages of the Gallery: namely its ability to allow artists the space to create an entire environment in which to develop their message.

Another exciting exhibit is the recently-closed collection of works by Saxton Freymann, a 1980 graduate who currently lives in Manhattan. His painting/objects explore people's unspoken relationships with each other and with themselves. Most of the pieces incorporate a small window with a picture, text or object behind it, which acts as a whispered clue to the true state of the larger subject surrounding it.

One especially effective work features half-lit male and female nudes, viewed from the side and facing each other from opposite ends of a dark canvas. Between them sits a little window with a diagram of a lit candle in the process of being covered by a clear jar which is extinguishing the flame. The text below the picture states that in order for something to burn, there must be something to burn, and that where there exists no fuel, there can be no fire.

Sunday marked the opening of an exhibition by Visiting Assistant Professor of Art Karen McCoy. A posted text in the Gallery reads, "My work both in drawings and sculpture exhibits a salient concern with process, transformation, and time." This statement seems accurate since her sculptures are designed equally by her and by the elements of nature.

Her primary motif is the elongated oval, which she explains as being tied to her concern with transformation — it can represent a cocoon, a mummy, a papoose, a boat, or a number of objects relating to transitory stages. She describes her work as a "dialogue with the natural flux of the world."

In her White on White: Surface Alteration, begun in May of 1980, she sealed solid sticks of white paper in clear plastic bags with originally-white food items such as egg whites, cottage cheese, and sour cream. The resulting combination of time, mold, and deterioration has created a series of objects which incorporate many more colors than white.

At first, her experiments seem scientific, like experiments in deterioration and composition, but the collaboration of herself and nature raises her creations from being merely analytical, leading to works in which beauty can be found in what is normally perceived to be deathly. Burial Progression is comprised of hemlock stones placed in long fabric sacks and then buried below the earth from May to July, 1982.

The photographs of the burial, hung next to the actual dug-up remains, dramatically show the contrast between the white, pristine objects originally placed in the earth and the brown, dirty remains in various states of decomposition. Also featured are some more traditional wall hangings, made up of collected dirt, stones, and wood which were placed on handmade paper and put outside for several months, and subsequently fashioned by the climatic elements.

McCoy's exhibition, consisting of works that are sometimes bewildering but always inventive and satisfying, is but one example of the fresh ideas of the artists, currently within or once a part of the Williams community, who are featured at the Goodrich Gallery.

McCoy's work will be on display through Friday.

Council to vote on locks Thursday

by Bill Savadove

College Council will vote on a proposal for a new ID activated lock system for campus buildings on Thursday, according to Council President Carter Zinn '88.

Zinn asked council members at last week's meeting to discuss the proposal at house and entry snacks.

Also at the meeting, Vice-President Nicole Melcher '88 reported on the progress of the search for a 24-hour study area. The council discussed the possibility of using a student residence, such as Tyler House or the basement of Prospect House. Suggestions from the council also included Jesup Hall, Stetson Hall, Bronfman Science Center, Clark Hall and the classrooms in Greylock.

Location and security will dictate the final decision. "As it stands, I'll tell them we want the Greylock classrooms," Melcher said.

It was reported to the council that the Office of Career Counseling wants to expand the internship program, hold more alumni panel discussions, encourage freshmen and sophomores to use its resources, satisfy the needs of students from the West Coast and the South and generally improve student knowledge of clamor, the media then turned to more "reassuring news," according to Cook, with stories focusing on scientific breakthroughs like blood screening tests and vaccines against the disease. News coverage of AIDS decreased during 1984, even though the number of victims was rapidly increasing with the spread of the disease.

The decreasing phase of coverage ended suddenly in 1985 with the death of Rock Hudson, the first celebrity to fall victim to AIDS. "This legitimized the issue again," Cook said. Media coverage of AIDS skyrocketed, ending the old cycle of coverage, according to Cook. He said that a new cycle may have started early this year, with news of the ease of AIDS transmission by heterosexuals, and is already over.

Cook's research is continuing; he has not yet examined media coverage of AIDS after 1985. The result of Cook's research on the period from 1982 to 1985 is a paper, co-authored with Colby and Timothy Murray '84, entitled Social Movements and Sickness on the Air: Agenda Control and Television News on AIDS. Eventually, Cook said, "I think we'd aim toward a book," half devoted to the gay movement and half concerning the media's coverage of AIDS.

While the primary focus of Cook's research was the cyclical nature of television news coverage of AIDS and the way it did not reflect the overall increase of the disease, he noted a few other discoveries he made during his work. Cook said he was surprised at the lack of sensationalism in media coverage. The media was, to an extent, homophobic in its limited reporting of the disease while it was thought to be restricted to gay men, but, Cook said, "the media has not been as overtly homophobic as I expected them to be."

what they have to offer.

Committee on Undergraduate Life (CUL) liaison Virginia Demaree '88 said a proposal on freshmen advisors was being considered by the committee. Instead of assigning advisors by entry, freshmen would have an advisor from the department they might major in. A proposal concerning a facilitator for student activities is also being discussed, she said.

Concerning the November 8 panel on race relations, Zinn said, "It was really moving that all those people came. We are trying to find out what the campus needs now." Zinn said some possibilities are sponsoring a series of winter study lectures and bringing in more of an "expert" panel.

Zinn said that the Council may pay for the distribution of the report on the proposals and activities of the Gaudino Committee and Gaudino Scholar from 1984 to 1987. "There's a lot in the report that the campus could really benefit from. I think there's a real negative bias based on a few phrases." The council decided that the best way to distribute the report would be at dining halls. Zinn said the report probably will not be distributed until sometime after Thanksgiving break because it has to be condensed down to 20 pages.

Also at the meeting, Zinn informed the council of a memo from the Provost's office saying that two new policies concerning women's athletics will be enacted by the Department of Physical Education. The policies, which were not spelled out in the memo, concern field usage in the case of a conflict between men's and women's sports teams and a printed uniform rotation list, so that sports teams will know when it is their turn to get new uniforms.

many ways. One of his greatest innovations in printmaking has been the use of power tools in making plates. The tools not only save time in the painstaking carving process but can produce unique and dramatic effects. In a series of portraits of his wife Nancy, for instance, Dine creates the effect of her face fading away, from print to print, as he sands down the original plate.

This group of "Nancy Outside in July" prints, which includes several works taken from the 27-piece series, shows an especially striking progression. The first print is a stark, black-and-white portrait which shows her from her shoulders up with wide, open eyes. Each one that follows adds color, detail, and also flowers. The flowers start harmlessly in front of her chest, and in following prints, rise up and encircle her face like a wreath. In the final print, they have overwhelmed her portrait: a few tulips show up against a dark background with only a ghost-like remnant of her face from the original portrait.

The variations on ordinary objects that are contained in other parts of the collection, such as his bathrobe prints, seem to reflect attempts to turn the object into a symbol. The bathrobes are not worn by anyone but stand alone in confident poses: hands on hips and feet firmly-set. By changing the color and size of their basic form, with such techniques as adding or subtracting clear contours and lines and changing the character of the background, each of these objects assumes a particular character and becomes analogous to a person, possibly the artist.

The WCMA is the exhibition's last stop on a tour that has included shows across the country, from the Toledo Museum of Art to the Los Angeles County Museum of Art.

Now that you've gotten into Williams, IBM can help you get more out of it.

The road to graduation is paved with term papers, lab reports, cramming, all-nighters and, of course, exams.

To ease that journey and awaken your professors to your exceptional abilities, we suggest the newest member of the IBM® Personal System/2™ family: the Model 25 Collegiate.

It's a high-powered personal computer with advanced graphics capabilities, designed to fit on your desk without adding to the clutter. And it comes with a generous 640 KB memory, two 3.5" diskette drives and an aid package every student can appreciate—a big receptive to what the Gaudino Project was saying. He attributed their enthusiasm to common security's emphasis on trying to find alternatives to current policy rather than just criticizing it. "I'm sure we're smart enough as people to come up with a much better security policy than we've been putting out, and this is our challenge," he said.

Student-student pedagogy, which Yaskulka and Kulik promoted during the project, is the basis of the Williams course "Nonviolence and Social Change", which is now in its sixth year. They will be running a Winter Study course this year called "Pedagogy and Empowerment", which will also use student-student pedagogy. "We do know enrollment is small and we encourage more students to take the course," Yaskulka said.

They said they do not have anything formal planned with the college after the course, but they plan to remain involved with the nonviolence course and with the new Interdepartmental Program for Experimental and Cross-Disciplinary Studies (IPECS), which Tauber chairs.

"One of our long-term hopes is either a Peace Studies or a Common Security Studies program," Yaskulka said.

Currently, Yaskulka, Kulik and Jeff Sultar '84 are running the Center for Common Security on Spring Street to continue the work they began through the Gaudino Project. "It's the result of the enthusiasm we saw around the country," Yaskulka said.

that Phyllis Tuchman was curator of the "Six in Bronze" show and will be curator of the upcoming "Big and Little Sculpture" show.

"We do try to be sensitive ... but it's also tricky when you have quotas on aesthetic issues," Stern said.

Assistant Professor of Art Matthew Rohn said the letter is fairly accurate in its statistics. He said there needs to be a greater awareness of what is available on the part of the curatorial staff.

Rohn said that he expressed his disappointment with the Wailworks program to Michael Govan, curator of special exhibitions at the W.C.M.A. Rohn said Govan could not name any female artists currently doing murals. "That was ignorance on his part," Rohn said. "There are female artists and artists of color who do murals."

Laura Gasiorowski '88, an art history major, said, "Very few people are aware of the fact that the museum (MassMOCA) administration has been chosen." She said that eight white males have been named as being a part of the future museum's administration.

Krens denied this, saying that MassMOCA does not yet have any staff.

Krens also noted that women hold six of the college museum's eight senior positions.

Skorupski emphasized the importance of student input with regard to menu planning. Food Service, according to Skorupski, is open to student ideas, as long as they are reasonable, in terms of trying student recipes or recipes from home. As a matter of fact, Skorupski said that they have a few recipes that students brought from home and use them occasionally.

According to Skorupski, they try to experiment with new ideas, such as the oreo cookie muffin served last week, to see if students like it. "You can't please them all," she said, noting that student responses to the muffins which were mixed, with half hating and half loving, the muffins.

these changes to the changes in the brains of AD patients, we find an 80 percent overlap."

Other research that he and his colleagues have done include post-mortem studies. "Our research shows that the physical damage that has been produced in the brains of the rabbits is strikingly similar to the damage in AD patients," Solomon said.

Varied causes

Solomon said that the cause of AD remains undetermined. "We are finding that AD may not be one thing," he said. "There may be a type that is genetic, which would account for a small portion of the cases. But there may also be an induced AD, also known as acquired AD, that is caused by outside factors but may have some genetic predisposition." Still, the argument for a genetic component is open to debate.

Solomon gives much of the credit for his AD research to the undergraduate students that work in his lab. He says that there are about 35 students who have done honors theses or independent studies with him. "Many are co-authors on papers that have been published," he said. The findings that come out of Solomon's neuropsychology lab are the result of the collaborative efforts of many people.

Solomon devotes time to AD patients in his clinical practice as well as in his research. He said that he has probably seen several hundred AD patients.

He noted the difficulty in diagnosing Alzheimer's, saying that one of the people who came to his clinic was referred to him by a physician who thought he had AD. "As it turned out," Solomon said, "the man was taking the wrong combination of prescription drugs. When this was changed, he was fine."

Solomon attributed the recent increase in attention given to Alzheimer's to the growing percentage of society that falls into the category of people most likely to contract the disease. "Right now," he said, "the fastest growing segment of the population is over 85 years old, and 20 percent of the people over 85 have Alzheimer's."

As of right now, said Solomon, much research on Alzheimer's is still necessary. A cure has not yet been found, though progress in the field seems to be steady. "Research is a slow process, so we aren't really coming up with any 'breakthroughs,'" he said.

He said he plans to continue publishing what he does find, via scientific journals. "The best way scientists find to disseminate information is through journal articles," Solomon said.

Dining Halls

The logistics at Dodd are the worst on campus, mainly due to the lack of available space. There is hardly room to move in the service area and plenty of reckless nudging in the beverage arena. For homey, friendly dining, try Dodd but spend as little time as possible getting fed and watered. Many treat the hall as they would a restaurant at home, frequenting it perhaps twice a month, just to capture the pulse-quickening thrill of "eating out."

Baxter Hall is the grandpappy of food service, the hub of the campus. Everybody eats here at some point, running up the stairs before classes end to beat the lines or straggling in the never-ending barely moving queue Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays at 12:00 p.m., and Tuesdays and Thursdays at 12:15. Baxter is divided into two main areas, each with its own serving line. The North, or lighter, side, is blessed with bright lighting, soaring verticality, a central salad bar, and a loyal following of diners. The south side is darker and, some argue, gloomier. But the South side is more suited for comfortable eating, whereas it sometimes seems as though the North side is utilitarian and stark like the Park.

Both Baxter sides are hives of freshman activity, which is sometimes eschewed by the snootier upperclass, who have abandoned the rash idealism of their first year and now would not deign to set foot in either side. As far as amenities are concerned, both sides are equal, except that the south side may have the slowest water dispenser on this planet, which frequently causes a confused cluster around the beverage area. Both sides share the infamous flume, whose continuous flow and march has caused many a besmirched shirt and not a few "flume faux pas" including the dropping of a well-carved and fully loaded tray into the raging tide or the breaking of numerous tumblers, both of which cause frustrating line clotting and lanced pride.

Buy a printer with your Macintosh and conserve paper.

A Macintosh personal computer and an Apple ImageWriter II printer will save you hours of time. Not to mention gallons of correction fluid and reams and reams of paper.

And, if you buy both now, the first ream of paper you'll save will have a lovely green glow. You'll save a bundle of cash when you purchase an ImageWriter II printer along with your choice of a Macintosh Plus or a Macintosh SE. Either way you'll be able to turn out beautifully written and beautifully printed papers.

And we'll even try to help you pay for your purchase with a variety of financing options. We feel compelled to tell you, though, that a deal like this can't last forever. So it's a good idea to see your campus microcomputer center today. And join the conservation movement.

Win over Jeffs puts gridders' slate at 4-4 game. Senior co-captain and defensive end David Crompton was felled by a painful leg injury which ended his day early. As he was carried from the field to the ambulance, the team, inspired by the injustice of the event, rose to stifle the Jeff offense on this series and for the rest of the game.

Said Farley of the moment, "There was no question after... he got chop-blocked that we just came together like a group of guys that were really possessed. We were emotionally on a different level. They (the players) were on a mission at that point."

Taking over after a flubbed punt, the Ephs marched decisively downfield as Chesley ran rampant over the Amherst defense, thanks in large part to the superior blocking of the Williams offensive line. And at the 6:59 mark of the third quarter, Chesley burst into the end zone from seven yards out, staking Williams to a 10-7 advantage, a lead they would never relinquish.

For the remainder of the contest, the Ephs controlled all phases of the game, piling a safety, and two touchdowns on the hapless Jeffs. "We just dominated them up front. (Joe) Thompson '89 and (Andy) Coyne '89 did an outstanding job and John Perryman '90 was a devastating blocker. (Defensively) Dave Montgomery '89 batted down a few and Eric Moe '89 had two interceptions. We finally put it all together," said Farley.

'Alumni Special'

Despite the domination, the Eph coaching staff was not averse to trying a little trickery on the worn down Amherst defense. With just over nine minutes left to play, Williams was faced with a fourth and 16 on the Amherst 27. When Chesley limped off the field, feigning an injury, sophomore wide-out Todd Strieter came into the game in his place in the tailback slot. The ensuing play, dubbed the 'Alumni Special,' which Farley and the rest of the staff had drummed up during the week during a "fiddle-diddle session on the blackboard, ... worked like a charm," according to Farley.

Strieter took a pitch from junior QB Scott Kennedy and faked a reverse handoff to the split-end. Instead, he dropped back and looked upfield to find a wide open Lewis Collins '88 lurking in the Amherst end zone. Strieter's floating TD pass gave the Ephs an 18-7 lead and broke Amherst's back.

The humiliating afternoon was not over for the Jeffs, however, as another Amherst QB Brian Jurek's aimless passes was picked off. Sophomore strong safety Rich Williams intercepted the throw and scrambled to the Amherst two, where the ball popped loose to be recovered by linebacker Mark Meyer '88 in the end zone for the final score.

Beating Amherst in any year is a cause for celebration. However, to down a highly touted 6-1 Jeff squad after struggling for much of the season is an especially impressive feat. When the Ephs started out at 0-3, few thought the season could end this way. However, this team proved its doubters wrong.

"I'm really pleased with the way we finished. I thought we were playing better football each time we walked on the field. I don't think it (the victory) was a fluke. I also have great respect for the Amherst program," said Farley.

When the team was winless, the players "just hung together," according to the rookie skipper. "The seniors gave good leadership, and steered the rudder in the early going, when things were not going so well. Their support was something I really appreciated. I know they'll carry this experience with them for the rest of their lives."

Outlook

Although this year's squad only equalled last year's 4-4 mark, it did capture the Little Three Title for the first time since 1980 and finished with four wins in its last five games. Next year, the team will drop Union and Bowdoin from its schedule and add Bates and Colby, a change that should prove beneficial in the won-loss column.

Losing only two senior offensive starters, Jimmy Walker and Lewis Collins to graduation, the squad should be potent once again next year. (This year the team outscored its last five opponents 120-68.) Defensively, more quality players are lost: Scott Powers, Don Aselton, Dave Crompton, Rick Fearon, John Edie, Mark Meyer, and Greg Kelley will all be gone. However, injured standouts Dave Clawson '89 and Cliff Wright '90 will return along with Dave Montgomery, Mike Simpson '90 and Rich Williams to anchor the perennially strong Eph Defense.

"Hopefully we'll be able to get started more quickly next year," said Farley. "I and, I think, the kids are optimistic. Anyway, to have back-to-back wins over two arch-rivals is a great way to end."

Despite bad footing and course conditions, the women's cross-country team ran to a strong sixth place in the 28 team field in the NCAA race at Southeastern Massachusetts University on Saturday, the women's team's best finish ever in this race.

The top three non-NESCAC teams in this regional qualifying race went to the national meet, so Williams is not even considered. However, Coach Bell expressed the hope that the Ephwomen would qualify through the individual division. Leading the Ephs was Anne Platt '91, who finished 18th out of over 200 runners with a time of 19:34. Platt missed qualifying for nationals by five places, as only the top thirteen qualify. Platt was followed by: Stacey Smith '90, 42nd in 20:12; Cathy Cocks '89, 54th in 20:27; Captain Sarah Pierce '88, 60th; Sarah Hams '89, 68th, and Ingrid Wiesel '90 and Jen Garrett '89.

The strong Smith contingent came in first with 111 points, followed by Wellesley, Tufts, Colby, SMU, and Williams. Tufts and Colby were the only NESCAC teams finishing ahead of the Ephs, which makes the squad's fifth place finish at the NESCAC meet more disappointing.

Team members expressed dissatisfaction with the course, parts of which were covered with two inches of snow and other parts turned into mud by melting snow. Smith commented, "It was the kind of race for a tough endurance runner, not a finesse-type speed runner." Despite the bad running conditions, however, it was still a satisfying end to the season. Most of the team will be continuing to participate in the winter track season.

The combination of low temperatures, mud and snow on the ground made the 5 mile course at Southeastern Massachusetts University "less than pleasant to run on," according to Gil McCabe '89. Nevertheless, the New England Division III Championships went as planned this past Saturday and the Ephs were present to match their top seven male runners against those of over twenty other teams.

Despite the injuries that have plagued the team all year, Williams managed to finish 17th overall. Dylan Cooper '91 was the team's first finisher, coming in 49th and beating all but one of the Amherst runners. Mac Hines '88 finished up his collegiate cross country career with his best race of his life, crossing the finish line in 91st place despite falling down twice due to bad conditions during the race.

MacCabe, coming off a bad ankle injury finished 105th and following him was Steve Brody '90 who had an excellent race ending up 118th. Senior Dave Sprague and sophomore Dale Johnson were soon to follow, 121st and 126th respectively.

Although Williams finished lower in the final standings than it normally does, the future looks good for the team. Only two of the top seven runners are graduating, and with the maturing of younger runners like Cooper, the leadership of the veteran McCabe, and the continued coaching of Peter Farwell, the Ephs look forward to next season.

M Tennis

"This year's tennis team is about the deepest team we've had in my four years at Williams," team captain Hoyt Ludington '88 said before the team's first fall tournament at RPI. The statement rang true all fall as positions on the ladder changed constantly. Every position was up for grabs with the exception of the 1st and 2nd spots for which there was a dog fight between Ludington and talented sophomore Marc Caltabiano.

At RPI, the team fared well, finishing third, behind Central Connecticut and Albany. The team easily beat RPI 7-2, and squeaked by Skidmore 5-4. The next weekend, the team played in the Great Dane tournament at Albany, but did not do as well, getting fifth place out of eight teams.

After the completion of these three tournaments, all that remained was a host of challenge matches and the annual all-college tournament known as the "Rockwood Cup," which attracts not only varsity performers, but weekend hackers as well. In the Cup, the team's top freshmen Jim Welles and Mike Grey showed their colors. Welles advanced all the way to the semifinals before losing to Ludington while Grey lost a close match to sophomore Steve Buxbaum in the quarterfinals. As expected, Ludington and Caltabiano met in the finals, with the super-sophomore Caltabiano gaining a tough 7-5, 6-4 victory.

The fall season for the men's tennis team is really only a warmup for the spring season, in which it will battle for the Little Three Championship and defend its NESCAC Championship.

by Julie Norton '89, who dragged half the Amherst side into the try zone with her to triumphantly touch the ball down. Katie Carr '91 kicked a difficult conversion kick for the extra two points. Heather Adams was on fire the whole game, sprinting gleefully through a line of dazed Lord Jeff lasses. Dagny Maldman '90 played an outstanding game, scoring a picture-perfect try by cutting through gaping holes in the Amherst opposition. Maldman's try put the final score at 10-0.

With a fall record of 7-3 and the Little Three Title firmly in their grasp the women look forward to a festive spring season and yet another victory over Amherst.

Women's soccer ends year with 2nd place NIAC finish

by James Lee

The women's soccer team persevered in a 1-0 shutout victory over Connecticut College in the semi-finals of the two-day NIAC tournament ten days ago, before suffering a 4-1 loss to number one seed Bowdoin on Sunday. The loss concludes what has been the team's most successful season in years, as it finished with a 10-2-3 record, a second place NIAC finish and a 4th place position in the final New England Division II polls.

The tournament opener against Conn. College was a close game which was determined at the 35:30 mark of the first half when Lala Grandison '91 rifled a shot into the net from 21 yards out. The ball came to the freshman when it rebounded off the Conn. College defense. Said co-captain Elise Phillips '88, "It was a close game, but I think we dominated."

In the championship final, a fast and strong Bowdoin squad capitalized on excellent passing to register a convincing victory over the Ephwomen. The Polar Bears opened fire in the first half, at the 16 minute mark, when a shot from the right side evaded Eph goalie Joyce Rogers '88 and fullback Carin Cole '91, both of whom had slipped in the mud.

Six minutes later, Bowdoin scored again when the upper left corner of the Eph net was cut by a shot from the left. After two more Polar Bear goals, the Ephs finally connected at the 35 minute mark of the second half when Lori Schaan '89 hammered in a rebound of a direct kick. "They were a stronger team but the score wasn't indicative of the actual game itself," commented Phillips, referring to the fact that the Ephwomen actually outshot their opponents by a 22-17 margin. "There were some scoring opportunities; we just didn't turn them into scores," said Phillips.

Summing up her feelings about her team this season, Phillips said that "The team became stronger and stronger as the season went on. It was really exciting to play in the NIAC finals and be a part of the team effort."

stretch. It's nice to see them go out in the winning way they did," he said.

Most squads would be hard pressed to match this team's accomplishments. However, next year's soccer team is capable of doing so. Without Dartmouth on the schedule, a team that won ten games in Division I this year, the Ephs have beaten every opponent this season that they will face next year. Returning will be All-American Mike Masters, as well as All-New England sweeper Dan Caltichman and star goalie Blanck. The three of them, along with a talented supporting cast, should lead the team to another stellar season.

Women's rugby shuts out Jeffs 6-0

by Cecilia Malm

The WWRFC sent the Lord Jeff defectors sulking back to the 'Herst Saturday, having wrested from them their precious jerseys and the coveted title of Little Three Champions. Rallying for their final rugby match of the season, the women gave the game their all, displaying truly outstanding endurance and athleticism. The superiority of the Williams A-side scrum became apparent early on in the match as they rucked and mauled over the floundering Lord Jeff lasses. Purple and black jerseys piled up in the try zone after a ferocious scrum drive, and beneath the stack of bodies was Nora T. Harrington '88, unquestionably in control of the ball, giving the women the try that would win the game. Lauren Boeschstein '89 successfully kicked a two-point conversion, making the half-time score 6-0.

Negotiating the large chunks of snow and ice that littered the field, the line burst into action in the second half. The magical combination of Jean Janson '88 at wing and Jane Amidon '88 at outside tricked the slow-thinking Amherst line every time, while fleet-footed Raquell Holmes '90 evaded all her tacklers with the greatest of ease. The Defectors played on bravely in the shadow of defeat, frustrating any further Williams scoring attempts, but in the end they were no match for the Spirit o' Morneen and a superior rugby club.

The B-side also beat Amherst, as tradition dictates, although they were denied the jerseys they so richly deserved. Victory may be its own reward, but Amherst shirts are a must for the B-side in the spring. The first try of the game was scored

by Chris Michaeles

After a valiant battle through the mud, blood, and slush, the score stood at 16-4. The White Dogs of the WRFC donned their new black jerseys, the Jeffs stood defeated and shirtless, and order was restored to the Valley.

The Black Defectors came out strong and fiery, taking advantage of the somewhat less rested, though better coached Williams team with an early try. The Dogs returned with a penalty kick by Jon Hollenberg '88, but they still trailed 4-3.

It was then that the real action began. Bill Meade '88, using what many consider the strongest weapon in the club's arsenal, passed back to Kurt Oeler for a deft and timely dropped-goal. The crowd roared, the clouds parted, and the boys in White brought back that zany, frothy type of rugby that the Dogs are so used to playing.

a season of male-bonding and comradery, brought in the first try. Williams dominated the rest of the match and finished the Jeffs with a final score as Michael Goldstein '88 dashed by the Amherst fullback/ballet star and left him groveling in his tights.

The Killer-B's upheld the WRFC pride, but finished with the bittersweet result of a 3-3 tie. Amherst scored first with an early penalty kick. The White Dogs proceeded to ruck the 'Herst up and down the field, but failed to penetrate their try zone. Steve Felix tied up the game with a penalty kick, sending the contest into overtime. Again the White Dogs dominated, but after a heinous call by the referee from North Adams which disallowed a brilliant try by Chris Palmedo '89, the final whistle blew.

The WRFC capped its season at 7 wins against only 2 losses; but in the season that counts, the legendary Little Three, the club reigns undefeated.

17-1 men's soccer takes ECAC and Little 3 Titles

by Ted Ruger

With championship wins to capture the ECAC and Little Three titles, the men's soccer team capped an exceptional season with a victorious flourish. By beating host Drew University 2-0 on Sunday to take the East Coast Athletic Association Championship, the Ephs finished with a final record of 17-1.

The seventeen wins is a new school record, as is the twelve shutouts posted by the squad. The Ephs defeated Alfred University 2-1 Saturday to advance to Sunday's final, and edged arch-rival Amherst 1-0 at home Wednesday to win the Little Three Crown.

Wednesday's match against the Lord Jeffs was played in the midst of a snowstorm at Cole Field. The game shaped up as a defensive struggle as several Eph chances just missed and keeper Rob Blanck '89 thwarted Amherst's chances.

Lake wins it

The game remained a scoreless duel until only 8:42 remained, when freshman Rob Lake fired a shot into the Amherst net to boost the Ephs to the Little Three title.

In Saturday's Alfred game, Lake put the team up again on a first half goal assisted by Mike Masters '89. Captain Nick Nachamkin '88 put in another tally with a penalty kick nineteen minutes into the second half. The Ephs went on to clinch the championship Sunday by defeating Drew two goals to none. Masters and Nachamkin both scored to boost the squad to the tournament win.

Nachamkin blasted in a shot off a feed from Johnny Walker '89 in the first half, and Masters tallied a breakaway insurance goal in the second period. "This period was really the icing on the cake for us. It was the culmination of a super season, undoubtedly my best ever. This group had a particularly special chemistry and composure," said coach Michael Russo.

Russo credits the contribution of the four seniors, Nachamkin, Mike Morris, Mike Roach, and Kurt Schroeder to the team's success. "These guys provided the leadership and mental toughness we needed down the

CAP taps five of ten professors for tenure

by Peter Balaban

The Committee on Appointments and Promotions (CAP) will recommend five professors for tenure to the Board of Trustees in January, several faculty members said last week. Ten professors had applied to the CAP for tenure.

William Lenhart

According to Acting Dean of the Faculty George Goethals, the Trustees' acceptance of the CAP's recommendations is usually a formality.

The assistant professors to be recommended for tenure are: Emily Apter, Romance Languages; David Dethier, Geology; Gall Hershatler, History; William Lenhart, Computer Science; and William Wooters, Physics.

Apter specializes in French literature. She received her B.A. from Harvard University in 1977 and her Ph.D. from Princeton University in 1982. She has contributed articles to the French Review, the Romanic Review and the Stanford French Review.

Dethier specializes in geomorphology, the study of the geologic processes that shape

Car accident kills 1 student, injures 5

One Williams student died and five others sustained injuries in an automobile accident on Route 2 in Shelburne Falls at 3:35 Saturday morning. The group was returning to Williamstown from Smith College.

Charles Hufford '89 was pronounced dead at the scene of the accident. Bryan Jennings '89 was flown to Hartford (Conn.) Hospital where he was treated for multiple fractures. A nurse at the hospital said Sunday that Jennings was "doing very well" and was expected to be released Monday.

Timothy Duncan '89, the driver of the car, Steven Hollender '89, Debra Kline '89 and Clifton Wright '90 were taken to the Franklin Medical Center in Greenfield. Hollender was released Saturday; Duncan and Kline were released Sunday afternoon; Wright was expected to be released Monday, a center nurse said.

Shelburne Falls State Trooper Ron Godin, who investigated the accident, said that Route 2 had begun to get icy at the time the vehicle approached a curve in Shelburne Falls that he described as "somewhat notorious for accidents."

According to Godin's restructuring of events, the brakes of the car locked, causing the car to skid and hit the shoulder of the road. A resulting tire blow-out combined with the design of the car, a Toyota Land Cruiser, to cause it to overturn, Godin said. The weight of the six passengers contributed to the instability of the vehicle.

The police report said that no other vehicles were involved.

Godin said that charges are still pending. "It's very rare that in an accident involving a death there are no charges," he said.

Godin said he did not think alcohol played a part in the accident. "I know there was drinking done that night, but I don't think that played a part in it. I think he (Duncan) was a designated driver," he said.

Charles W. Hufford, 19

Charles Hufford '89, who died in an automobile accident early Saturday morning, was returning to Williamstown from Smith College with five other Williams students when the vehicle in which they were traveling skidded on an icy section of Route 2 in Shelburne Falls and overturned.

Dean of the College Stephen Fix notified the Williams community of the accident in a letter distributed Saturday morning.

Hufford came from Birmingham, Mich., where he had attended Seaholme High School. At Williams he was a Dean's list student who majored in political economy. He was a member of the Williams Rugby Football Club and played french horn in the brass ensemble.

He served on the political economy department liaison committee and worked this semester as a teaching assistant for a political science course taught by Professor George Marcus.

"He was very generous with his time," Marcus said. "He didn't put himself first, but was very generous with others around him."

A memorial service was held in Thompson Memorial Chapel Sunday night, and Hufford's family will come to Williams for a memorial service to be held at 4:00 p.m. Friday in the chapel. A memorial service will also be held tomorrow afternoon in Michigan.

Hufford is survived by his parents, Jack and Susan Hufford, and a younger brother, Benjamin.

Students give locks proposal thumbs down

by Stephanie Jones

The majority of students who voiced opinions about the proposed lock system over the past three weeks have opposed it.

Dean of the College Stephen Fix sent a letter to the Williams community November 12 outlining the proposal and inviting student comment. The proposed system would include locks on residential buildings and some academic buildings, all of which could be opened by Williams ID's and could be programmed to regulate the time and identity of building entrants. It would cost between $300,000 to $450,000 to be installed.

Fix said that the period until December 11 was a time for comment on the lock system. The Committee on Undergraduate Life (CUL), College Council and Freshman Council have all had meetings to discuss the locks, and the Housing Committee is discussing them today. Much of the student reaction to the ID card system has been negative.

"We really do need to know the opinions of students, because it will affect you most of all," Fix said at an open meeting to discuss the proposed lock system last Tuesday. Fifty students attended the meeting, and they all voted against the proposal.

At the open meeting, Fix said that the proposed IDenticard system would reduce personal harassment and property theft and make students feel more secure. He defended the need for the system by saying that even after the reported rape on campus last year only about half the women students he talked to locked their doors at night.

Many of the objections to the system centered on fears of being locked out at night. People mentioned its possible effect on the campus environment. "I think it destroys the openness and atmosphere you have here at Williams," Judy Conti '91 said, adding, "I think what it comes down to is we're all old enough and responsible enough to lock our own doors if we choose to."

Many people also said that they did not believe the system would be effective. "The only things I can possibly see this system reducing are external threats to property," College Council President Carter Zinn '88 said. He said it would not prevent attacks, which would likely take place outside.

Questions were asked about the extent of external crime. Director of Security Ransom Jenks said, "It's still unclear to me at this point whether the majority are external or internal. It's hard to tell." Jenks said he believed that external crime was a significant problem.

People objected to the system on the grounds that they did not believe that the system would be able to reduce even external property theft; that the system would be unable to restrict entry of outsiders as they could convince students to open doors for them; that the system could cause a feeling of false security and fewer students would lock their room doors.

Several students suggested that stronger locks for individual doors would be a better way of preventing crime. "The improving of the room locks seems, in my mind, absolutely uncontroversial," Fix said. Students also said that they believed the magnetic card system would work well on non-residential buildings that students might need to be in at night.

The CUL members did not reach a consensus about the magnetic card system, chairperson and Associate Professor of Mathematics Olga Beaver said. "There were people who were very much in favor of it. There were people who were worried it would make people lax about locking their doors. There were people who were worried about the mechanics of it." The CUL members did conclude that there should be a general educational campaign to have students lock their doors, Beaver said.

Rebecca Borden '91, president of the Freshman Council, said that the council members held an informal vote in which they unanimously opposed the lock system. House presidents who brought up the issue at snacks said that they found

Pub owner calls cops on underage students

by Peter Balaban

Police charged two Williams students for attempting to purchase alcohol with false identification at the Purple Pub, 4 Bank Street, in separate incidents last month.

Sherwood Smith '89 has been issued a summons to appear in Northern Berkshire District Court on December 16 to be arraigned on the charge of "minor purchasing alcohol." Authorities would not reveal the name of the second student because a complaint has not yet been issued against him. A date has not yet been set for the arraignment of the second student.

Smith and the other student are the first to feel the effects of Purple Pub owner Mary Michel's decision to call police — and not Williams College — when under-age students are caught trying to purchase alcohol with false identification at her bar.

Michel made the decision, she said, after about 15 Williams

A Thanksgiving Turkey

Thanksgiving break was quite a break, but it was not quite the "reading period" that it was billed in a series of Dean's office announcements issued the week before.

Students who remained on campus during the period between November 20 and November 30 had to face limited hours at the campus's most important facilities as they prepared for the end of the semester.

The limited resources on campus during Thanksgiving recess — as it is called in the 1987-1988 Student Handbook — are part of a second case against the altered college calendar which debuted this year. (The first case was the reduction of the mid-October reading period from four days to three).

True, the Thanksgiving break was refreshing for many of us; indeed, a majority of students left campus, presumably headed for enjoyable times at home. But the college fell through on its crucial commitment to those students who stayed on campus, and in doing so violated a pledge it made quite loudly the week before.

Those who chose to remain on campus — either to save money on travel expenses or to catch up on academic work — were led to believe that the college would work to facilitate studying during the recess. In point of fact, however, the limited hours of the library and computer center made much substantive work largely impossible.

Part of the explanation for the curtailed hours undoubtedly lies in the college's large reliance upon student workers to run many facilities. Even given that reality, however, greater accommodation to student needs was and is possible; the college should work to ensure that next year the situation is substantially better.

But all of that brings us back to the issue of the calendar in general. The new calendar has shortened our October break/reading period, extended our Thanksgiving break/reading period, and monkeyed around with our December reading period to the point where it promises only limited usefulness — and that only to students whose exams fall in the latter half of exam period.

It may be too soon to pass judgement on the upcoming reading period (although the temptation is overwhelming), but the two changes we have already survived point up the basic flaws of the new calendar. We now have two non-class periods in the first semester, both of which suffer from severe identity crises.

The stretch from early September to November is too long to proceed relatively uninterrupted; one extra day may not seem like much, but it does significantly alter the psychological impact of the recess.

And Thanksgiving break is now so long that it seriously disrupts the continuity of the semester, as a number of faculty members have complained. Not to mention that it inconveniences most students who don't live in the Northeast.

We have, then, a failed calendar, just as students have long maintained. All that is necessary is for the upcoming reading period to prove itself the failure that it undoubtedly is, and then maybe we can begin figuring out how to get out of this mess.

Sixth Man Club announces support of women's hoops, seeks members

To the Editor:

I would like the college community to know that the Sixth Man Club has gone co-ed and will begin its season of support for Williams basketball with a luncheon at noon this Friday (December 4th) in the River House.

For two years the club has sponsored luncheons and a post-season awards dinner for the men's varsity team. This season the women's team will be given equal support; some members and the coaches will be present at the luncheons, and all members and the coaches will be guests at the dinner.

We welcome members from the Williams faculty and staff and are frankly puzzled at our inability to recruit them, especially since many of them attend basketball games.

We are also puzzled by our inability to break into the news columns of the Record, despite our requests, despite our newsworthy events, including the presentation of awards and the breaking of the sex barrier, and despite the presence of a Record sports reporter as a guest at one of our dinners.

Membership information may be obtained from me, Ray Warner, at 458-3096, or Jim Fitzgerald, at 458-3150.

Judging racism on a personal level sheds light on minority perspectives

To the Editor:

I'm a white male student, and when I first read Farhan Haq's article in the November 10 Record, I dismissed it as yet another example of the Williams community's annoying habit of blowing an "issue" all out of proportion. Then I reread it and began to hear what he was saying. What I found in it then was something to which I could relate. The subtle racism he was describing was something that had affected my own family. Memories of stories my Irish-Catholic relatives had told me over the years came back: the "Irish Need Not Apply" signs that had hung under "Help Wanted"; my family's loss of their Irish name when the English teachers in New England couldn't pronounce it; my mother not being allowed to join the Girl Scouts because the meetings were held in a Protestant church's basement; and the relatives in my dad's Protestant family that I didn't meet until I was in high school — because he had converted to Catholicism, and they blamed my mother. All those and more came back and I realized that the vast majority of us here have similar experiences, we were all minorities once. I've even experienced that racism here, when defending my religion against those that don't understand, and think Catholics are still in the dark ages.

Perhaps if we all go back to our relatives' experiences with racism, something not normally associated with the white majority, we will become more tolerant of today's minorities. When you bring racism down to a personal level, it becomes much more understandable, and you're not as inclined to disregard a minority student's experience. I know a lot of other students felt as I did, that there was no "racism" issue on campus, but that feeling has to disappear if we are to fully accept everyone on campus.

College officials thank students for aid in recovery of Chapin banner

To the Editor:

We would like to thank the students who assisted in the recovery of the College banner which hangs between the columns of Chapin Hall at Convocation and Commencement, and which was taken at some time during Convocation weekend this past September.

What many may not know is that the banner was specially designed and made for the occasion of the 10th anniversary of the College's decision to endorse co-education. In fact, the banner was commissioned by Daniel O'Connor, then Dean of the College, designed by Martha Halley, then costume designer of the A.M.T. and made by Betty Beals and Annie O'Connor, two local friends of the College. (Annie is now an alumna, class of 1986). The banner has hung at Chapin since 1979.

We are grateful for its return.

Valedictory: with year's end, a has-been editor looks back

by John Canty '88

Tonight marks the end of my year-long term on the editorial board of the Williams Record. Although I have eagerly looked forward to the release of responsibility and the chance to enjoy a less-restricted schedule, I confess now, with the advent of the cold winter's wind and December's somber evening skyline, an unexpected gratitude to this newspaper for the talented people with whom it was my good fortune to work and come to know. I was lucky for the ringside seat it gave me on the currents of change here at Williams; none of us here can complain of not being informed of this campus' current events.

Lastly, in leaving there is a strong feeling of gratitude for the feeling that occasionally I was a part of something that gave a vision, at times belated, often contentious, but always honest and dedicated, of what could be done to make this community a better one. I will suffer the reader through a journey of some of my reflections on this past year.

Our College's concern with the evil of racism reflected itself in our first issue. "Dream within a dream, Our dream deferred," wrote Langston Hughes. As Americans, we at Williams continue to strive in bridging the gap between the ideals posed by our national values and those dark chapters of our past which carry the legacy of bigotry and injustice.

Last January, one of the Op-Ed page's first pieces confronted the issue of race (Averil Clarke '87, "Leaving a cloud of anger within," January 13, 1987). Eloquent and forceful, it challenged our community to open itself to the black experience in Williamstown and the experience of "invisibility." In February, our whole community witnessed the effect of racism when Bolin Fellow Wahneema Lubiano shared the story of her child Jefe's encounters with tragedy. Lubiano subsequently left the College, praising it but not believing this town to

With the release of the WBSU's letter in the spring, this institution began to react. This fall we have all seen the first results of what began inside of twelve months ago. Though by no means complete, the efforts of the CCRP, the College Council, and the administration do give hope that both our institutions are responsive and that the members of our community, from our College President down to the hundreds of students who turned out for the panel on racism, deeply care. While our community is not a perfect one, its determination on the principles of justice can be more precious than fine gold. Skepticism about progress in fighting racism misses the underlying resilience of our ideals and our unwillingness to give them up. We see racism as not something threatening one segment of our community but all of us. As one who has watched the events of this fall with rising hope, I believe that this duty is one that we will meet. Perhaps we shall overcome.

In a similar light, we should all gain pride in the embodiments of this College's conscience. At a time when the word "idealism" excites no small measure of derision from our cynicism-tinged generation, we should take heart from the selflessness witnessed by the workers in the Berkshire Food Project, by the activists in MassPIRG, by current Junior Advisors, and by our representatives on the College Council who give themselves despite the constraints of time and the school work that is always remaining to be done. Somewhere in this equation the Williams Record should come in for some praise, too. All of this praise is rather obvious, but it is not said often enough.

Finally, the caution with which students at Williams approach issues and our much-discussed "apathy" raises the question asked by many of where our generation is. Well, where were previous

In memoriam: Charles W. Hufford

Several years ago, one of my very close high school friends, Charlie Mercker, committed suicide. I received the following poem in the mail the next day; as it had no enclosed explanation, I'd like to believe that it was from Charlie. Because it and the following weeks and months of sadness and anger and loss taught me the meaning of courage and acceptance, and even happiness, I share it now with all of you in the hopes that it might provide our community with a similar sense of strength.

Message to my loved ones whom I've left behind
Death is nothing at all
I have only slipped away into the next room.
I am I and you are you.
Whatever we were to each other that we are still.
Call me by my old familiar name,
Speak to me in the easy way which you always used.
Put no difference into your tone;
wear no forced air of solemnity or sorrow.
Laugh as we always laughed at the little jokes we enjoyed together.
Play, smile, think of me.
PRAY FOR ME.
Let my name be ever the household word that it always was.
Let it be spoken, without effect:
without the ghost of a shadow on it.
Life means all that it ever meant, it is the same as it ever was:
There is absolute unbroken continuity.
What is this death but a negligible accident?
Why should I be out of mind,
because I am out of sight?
I am but WAITING for you, for an interval, somewhere very near,
just around the corner.
All is well.
I love you still.

generations?

Recently, P.J. O'Rourke, formerly a New Left activist and currently something of a philosopher, traced his journey from the passions of the 1960s to the 1980s. Writing of "What I Believed in the 1960s," O'Rourke said, "Everything. You name it and I believed it I believed my parents were Nazi space monsters. I believed the university was putting salt-peter in the cafeteria food. I believed stones had souls I believed I would live forever or until I was twenty-one, whichever came first I believed wearing my hair long would end poverty and injustice. With the exception of anything my parents said, I believed everything."

With the end of the 1960s and decades of self-doubt and paralysis, it seems that Americans are once again able to locate their national virtues and to see in their fulfillment a legacy to be redeemed. As our society has re-awakened both to the worth of a free society and to the ability to effect change, so have we come of age to bear the candle of responsibility. As O'Rourke comments of what he believes in the 1980s, "I believe it is our first duty to protect this civilization. I believe it is our second duty to improve it."

I will miss this place. I will miss the gift of humor at one o'clock on Monday morning, the infinite resignation which one can only feel in losing an article on our computers, and the people who here shared their light with me. But most of all, I will miss the knowledge that this place was some kind of a test of how to face and apply cherished values. In this sense, in the most important sense, this education did not let me down.

Faculty address day-care

The chairman of the faculty Steering Committee, Suzanne Graver, told her colleagues at the November 18 faculty meeting that the committee has found a solution for one of the conflicts faced by professors who are parents of young children.

The committee has arranged for the college's day care center to close at 6:15 p.m., rather than the usual time of 5:30 p.m., on days when monthly faculty meetings are scheduled.

Karen Kwitner, a professor of astronomy and a Steering Committee member, brought attention to the subject of day care limitations last spring. She noted that parents often had to leave faculty meetings before important votes were cast. The meetings begin at 4 p.m.

Graver said the change was agreed upon by the Steering Committee and Child Care of the Berkshires, the firm which operates the Williams College Children's Center in two Park Street facilities.

The college will pay the firm for the additional day care time this year, according to College Provost Neil Grabois. He said the college is providing the funds to avoid the difficulty of altering the existing fee schedules for parents. But Grabois added that there is no implication that the college will pick up the tab in future years.

Kwitner said the Steering Committee is continuing to study questions involving the hours of day care. She noted that faculty parents have to excuse themselves from various meetings and events every day, and that some must arrange for additional day care in order to teach 8 a.m. classes.

"I view this 45 minutes on faculty meeting days as very helpful as a temporary fix, but it does not solve all of the problems," Kwitner said.

At the November meeting, Graver's announcement was greeted with mild applause — a much warmer reception than most of the items before the faculty receive.

In other business, the faculty: approved a proposal to grant Division I credit for introductory courses in modern foreign languages.

The measure, recommended by the Committee on Educational Policy, passed on a voice vote. There were no "nay" votes.

With the change, the only courses which do not fulfill a division requirement are a remedial writing course (English 103) and the interdisciplinary Freshman Residential Seminars, according to Bruce Kleffer, who spoke in behalf of the motion.

Kleffer, a professor of German, said the exception for introductory language courses (numbered 101-102) was a longstanding rule which may have been intended to accompany the college's foreign language requirement, which no longer exists.

• nominated, for a seat on the faculty Steering Committee, two tenured Division III professors, one of whom will be elected by the faculty Wednesday. The nominees are Raymond Chang, a professor of chemistry, and Reinhard A. Wobus, a professor of geology. The seat is being vacated by Kwitner, who will be on leave for the spring semester.

Council gets 24-hr. study area open

The College Council announced that the search for an all-night study area has concluded. The basement of Baxter Hall, including the Rathskellar and a computer room, became available for late night study on Saturday.

Assistant Dean of the College Steven Wright said the study area will open nightly at 11:00 or 11:30. Access is through the same door that WCFM radio personnel use.

In other action, the Council decided to sponsor the distribution of excerpts from the "Report of the Gaudino Committee," according to minutes of the November 19 Council meeting.

New Republic Senior Editor Fred Barnes assessed the Reagan Presidency last Thursday. He said Reagan's idea of homelessness is Ferdinand and Imelda Marcos. (Lebauer)

New Republic editor discusses the President

by Todd Owens

Fred Barnes, senior editor of The New Republic and nationally known political commentator, in assessing the Reagan Presidency and its future legacy, concluded that "on the balance - just barely - Reagan should be considered a successful president."

Barnes stated his conclusion at a lecture last Thursday. He said that Reagan is in trouble for several reasons. First, he has no agenda and that hurts him because he is an ideological leader. The Iran-Contra debacle greatly demoralized the President. Reagan is also struggling with a wounded economy, a Democratic Congress and an uphill battle to institute some of his prized policies, most notably aid to the Contras, funding for the Strategic Defense Initiative (SDI), and appointment of a Supreme Court Justice. Finally, his wife, who according to Barnes, Reagan leans on more than most politicians, lean on their wives, is sick.

Because Reagan is clearly struggling, Barnes said he fears that "there is a chance that the President can be bamboozled by Gorbachev." In the summit in Washington. "My worry right now is it's a bad time for this president to meet with Gorbachev. Reagan is desperate for success," Barnes said.

However, Barnes cautioned students, "Don't confuse a failed second term with a failed presidency." Reagan has

House may vote on MassMoCA bill

by Scott J. O'Callaghan

The House Committee on Ways and Means will send a bill that would provide key funding for the proposed Massachusetts Museum of Contemporary Art (MassMoCA) to the House floor for a vote next week, according to legislators from the Northern Berkshire delegation.

The Massachusetts Convention Centers bill, which would provide $35 million in state funding to the MassMoCA project as well as capital funding for several other regional projects, has been sitting in the Committee on Ways and Means for several months.

According to State Representative Daniel Bosley (D-North

Adams), the ways and means committee's deletion of the controversial Section II from the bill, a provision to fund the potential deficit of the Hynes Convention Center in Boston, is a key element that will help the bill move through the House.

The new version of the bill calls for $100 million of state funding, Bosley said, a reduction from the $150 million which was being considered by the ways and means committee. The state administration and finance department has suggested the $50 million increase. The $100 million currently being asked for coincides with the state Senate's version of the bill.

Bosley said last week that he expected the Ways and Means Committee to vote favorably on the bill yesterday, releasing the bill to the House. He said he expects the House to vote on it as early as next Monday. He said that House confirmation is probable.

Representative Sherwood Guernsey (D-Williamstown) also said that he expected the bill to have been voted on yesterday. But he said he thought that a House vote on the bill would come later next week.

Both Guernsey and Bosley said that they think the Senate will not concur on the bill, since it is a different version than the

CEP and CCRR examine curricular treatment of minority concerns

by Stephanie Jones

The Committee on Educational Policy (CEP) met with the Campus Commission on Race Relations (CCRR) last Monday to discuss the CEP's review of the curriculum as it relates to racial and ethnic minorities and the world outside of Europe and the United States.

The CEP reviewed the curriculum in this way seven years ago, and the study is being repeated at the request of College President Francis Oakley.

The CEP is especially interested in the content of introductory courses.

When he created the CCRR, Oakley charged the commission with "acting as a resource for the Committee on Educational Policy as it reviews the responsiveness of our curriculum to minority experiences, achievements, and concerns."

The CEP sent questionnaires asking for information about courses which contain coverage of these issues to each academic department. All the information had not yet been collected at the time of the meeting, but History Professor John Hyde, chairman of the CEP, asked the CCRR for questions and issues that they thought should be raised.

Assistant Professor of Political Science Timothy Cook, chairman of the CCRR, said that he had spoken to the Black Student Union (BSU), the Hispanic student organization VISTA and Asian Students in Action (ASIA). According to Cook, one of the greatest concerns of these organizations was the limited number of course offerings related to minority and third

Holiday Season Soiree

Armstrong House sponsors party at WCMA

by Anne O'Malley

"The Residents of Armstrong House request the honor of your presence at our Holiday Season Soiree to be held at the Williams College Museum of Art, Friday, December 4, 1987, 6:00 to 8:00 o'clock in the evening."

Dean of the College Stephen Fix talking with Lisa West '89, Evan Davis '89, and Tal Klein '88 at an Armstrong House party held at the Williams College Museum of Art on Friday. (Albright)

So said the engraved invitations announcing an Armstrong House party held in the 1935 Gallery of the WCMA on Friday night. "It's the first student-initiated event in the museum," said Kathleen McNally-Wassenar, Director of Foundations and Corporate Relations in the Development Office and a lecturer in economics, who is also Armstrong's senior house associate.

According to McNally-Wassenar, Chris Giglio '89, president of Armstrong House, and Michael O'Malley '89, the house treasurer, first suggested the party, which was financed with house cultural funds. "Chris and Michael were the instigators and I was the facilitator," she said.

Each residential house receives $550 per semester in cultural funds, which are administered through the senior house associate, according to O'Malley. "We've got this money to spend, and we wanted to make it nice," said Peter Dahling '89.

The house ordered hors d'oeuvres, including cheese fondue and bacon wrapped scallops, through the food service department and also served a variety of fruit juices, soda and wine. Part of the funds were used to pay for the additional security needed to open the museum, and student monitors were hired so that the guests could wander throughout the museum's galleries. The cultural funds were also used to have invitations printed at McClelland Press.

Each Armstrong House resident was allowed to invite one guest, and about 40 faculty members were also invited, according to O'Malley. There were more than a hundred students and faculty members at the event. Although McNally-Wassenar said that many faculty members sent regrets, College President Francis Oakley and Dean of the College Stephen Fix were among those in attendance.

"The museum has been extremely helpful and food service was wonderful," said McNally-Wassenar. "I think everybody's on best behavior." An unidentified female guest was overheard saying, "I feel so

by Erik T. Burns

The first final of the fall semester is neither a written test nor an hour exam nor a self-scheduled exam. The first final is instead an all-night melee, a rigorous test of stamina and mindless knowledge — a delightfully circus-like extravaganza of the senses known to devotees of the event merely as "Trivia."

This simple six-letter word, long a guilty pleasure of henpecked intellectuals, struck the fancy of hot polio like a steam train loaded with dictionaries in the earthly form of a square blue box embossed with the legend, "What mighty contests rise from trivial things." For a few years Trivial Pursuit was the center of every social gathering, and everybody knew who Weeb Eubanks was. The craze has passed, the blue box relegated to dust-gathering shelves. But on the last day of classes each semester, a small bastion of trivia breaks out and takes over the hearts and minds of Williams college.

Trivia Night is sponsored by WCFM and is broadcast on the station from midnight until 8:00 a.m. Just think of it as the first all-nighter of finals week, and by far the most enjoyable. The format is simple: the winning team from the last trivia contest (this semester the ebullient and creative "I don't have to answer that question") creates and runs the show, devising questions and choosing music to play. A question is asked on the air and a song is played. Teams have until the end of the song to both answer the question and identify the tune. Points are given for each correct answer, and the team who amasses the largest score rises bleary-eyed from the rubble of crumpled paper, empty soda cans and sweaty reference books and strolls triumphantly up to Baxter Lounge Saturday morning to bask in the warm glow of victory — and the right to run the next contest.

Members of "I don't have to answer that question" (a quote by erstwhile presidential candidate and unfortunate tryster Gary Hart(pence), which makes interviewing a definite experience) are reluctant to reveal even the slightest hint about the content of the questions in this year's game but grudgingly mumbled a few incoherencies about the structure of the night.

"The bulk of the work (on the questions) was done over the Thanksgiving break," said alleged Trivia czar Paul McGreal '89. "We have over 150 questions, eight hour bonuses, two super bonuses and some action trivia questions." Action trivia requires team members to dash up to the WCFM station and act out the answer to a question.

Eclectic and obscure The music is arguably the most difficult portion of the contest, because the selections are eclectic and obscure. This semester the songs are being gathered, to a large extent, by aural guru Mike Best '86 and are guaranteed to send teams searching blindly through the

Georgetown University

The District of Columbia Court of Appeals ruled that Georgetown University "must offer equal treatment to homosexual student groups, but the Roman Catholic university need not recognize them officially." The decision, the fourth judgment in the bitter seven-year court battle between the university and two homosexual student groups, granted the plaintiffs, the student groups, equal access to the "tangible benefits" previously denied by the university. Some of these benefits included: use of a mailbox, a computerized mailing service, mailing facilities and the right to apply for financial support from the university. Judge Julia Cooper Mack, who wrote the majority opinion, held that "eradicating discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation was more important than preserving Georgetown University's religious freedom to follow an anti-homosexual doctrine." Kevin T. Baine of William & Connolly, the firm that represented Georgetown, said, "The university is currently studying the court's decision to determine what additional steps it must take."

University of Chicago

Fifty elected officers of the Student Government Assembly of the University of Chicago resigned after a student investigative committee found that students were involved in election fraud. The elected president of the assembly resigned, after admitting to stuffing ballots, and the vice-president resigned when the committee found that he had not been registered as a student. Other improprieties included improper monitoring of polls and placing unqualified candidates' names on the ballots. A second election was held with all the appropriate adjustments, according to the university officials.

Dartmouth

The Committee on Student Life of Dartmouth College recently voted to recommend abolition of single-sex housing by residence halls. The changed policy will provide students with the choice of either living in residence halls that are either co-ed by floor or by room. The recommendation arose as a result of student opinions that single-sex housing sustained sexism, according to a committee member. The recommendation will be acted upon by the college Office of Residential Life in the future.

In Other Ivory Towers was compiled by Record reporter Alex Oh from material printed in other campus newspapers unless otherwise noted.

eustachian alleys of their collective memory to try and find some lost nugget of noise.

The presence of Best highlights another aspect of trivia. Many alums return to the Purple Valley each year to recapture some of the reeling excitement and heady thrill of their college years. According to McGreal, one team, "The same thing every year," returns annually to play. "They're three guys who just keep coming back," he said. "They come in fourth or fifth consistently but they always have a good time."

Evil Ninjas

A good time is the main goal of the whole shebang. There is an aura of competition about the contest, but the emphasis is decidedly on fun. "I don't have to answer that question" is hoping that many teams will play and are especially interested in stringing up some excitement among the uninitiated freshmen. Freshmen should either make up their own teams or find an upperclass team with which to play. A team can be any size, but the larger the team, the more likely they are to come up with an answer.

"The key thing about a team is the name," said McGreal. "Humor is definitely appreciated. The best names are something from trivia." Names in the past have included "All the sugar and twice the caffeine" (Jolt Cola's slogan), "Phasers on Stun," "Evil Ninjas from Hell," "Maximus Drott" and "And Ann B. Davis as Alice."

Trivia will begin promptly at midnight on Friday, December 11 and will be broadcast on WCFM, 91.9 FM. The contest is expected to run for eight hours and will culminate in the awards ceremony on Saturday morning. All respectable mavens of miscellany should gather their wits about them and sequester themselves in a comfortable room with lots of munchies, a reliable over-the-counter source of caffeine, a stack of reference books and a telephone to prepare for an all-night seige.

One final clue: "I don't have to answer that question" is expecting teams to bait and pester them over the phone in order to get answer. Said McGreal, "Half the fun is trying to eisel hints out of the team in charge."

Town/gown committee talks off-campus housing

by Craig Gangi

The Town-Gown Committee examined the question of Williams students living off-campus and heard a report from Assistant Dean of the College William Wagner on student parking at its meeting last Thursday.

Town Selectman J. O'Brien Locke chairs the five-member committee, which includes Williamtown residents Dagmar Bubriski and George Milne, Williams Director of Public Information James Kolesar and Associate Dean of the College Mary Kenyatta.

At the meeting, the committee passed a motion which asks the Williamstown Board of Selectmen to consider limiting the availability of off-campus housing for Williams students. Another motion encouraging the college to inspect prospective rentals and impose and enforce rent controls also passed.

The first motion, which asks the selectmen to look into and review the town by-laws regarding the relationships between off-campus student housing and neighborhoods and to review by-laws to limit such off-campus housing, passed by a vote of 4-0, with one abstention.

Kolesar, who abstained from the vote, said that it puts unfair pressure on the selectmen to

Collegium Musicum breathes new spirit into ancient music

by Michael Reisman

The Williams College Collegium Musicum presented its first performance ever in the Kohnstamm Lobby adjacent to Brooks-Rogers Recital Hall Thursday night, playing traditional Christmas and religious music from the Baroque and Renaissance periods.

The early music ensemble, which is directed by Professor Jennifer Bloxam, was created in September in the spirit of traditional European college music ensembles.

The Collegium opened with "The Boar's Head Carol," a traditional English Christmas song. This was followed by two works by William Byrd, the great composer of the English Renaissance. "In Winter Cold" and "November Drear" certainly reflect the feelings of many Williams College students around this time of year.

"Lullay, Lullay Thou Tiny Child" and "There is No Rose" followed, two anonymous 15th-century English carols. The first of two pieces by Heinrich Schütz featured Eileen Weld '88 on harpsichord. "Verbum caro factum est" was written during the Thirty Years War and is a devotion to God written in Latin.

Magic can't save one-man theatre piece

by Travis Pierson

Fred Curchack's Stuff As Dreams are Made On, loosely based on Shakespeare's The Tempest and performed Friday and Saturday at AMT Downstage, promises its audience a magic carpet ride, but its edges are frayed, and it steadily unravels, leaving its spectators grounded and unfulfilled.

Curchack does not attempt to perform The Tempest as a cohesive whole, but chooses instead to extract potent scenes and key characters and paste them into his hybrid of farce, drama, and commentary. Donning different masks and voices, Curchack assumes the roles of Prospero, a magician and rightful Duke of Milan, his daughter Miranda, who is represented by an old doll and a falsetto voice, Ferdinand, Miranda's courtier, Prospero's spirit-servant, Ariel, and his deformed slave, Caliban. He also plays himself, who is sometimes a bumbling stagehand, and sometimes a superior and master of his masked characters.

Around these creations, he creates a magical mood using a few, cheap props — lighters, a flashlight, a candle, mirrors, and their resultant shadows. By using these minimal sources, he creates a magic all of his own, which can scare and delight the viewer more than any elaborate props could.

Actor Fred Curchack portrays Ariel from Shakespeare's The Tempest, one of several characters he played in his one-man performance Stuff as Dreams are Made On, presented Friday and Saturday at AMT's Downstage. (Somers)

The Tempest is about power and perceptions. It deals with Prospero's magical power over others, the playwright's power, and the director's power. Curchack, playing all of these roles himself, attempts to combine and resolve them. The theme of the masque within the masque, as when Prospero creates a show of faeries in The Tempest, and when Curchack redefines the boundaries of his play, challenge the spectator's perceptions of what is meant by real and perceived magic. Both plays contain elements of drama, romance, and comedy, and are loosely structured, making them somewhat abstracted works, freely changing and evolving into different moods.

Guest conductor leads BSO with grace and skill

by Tom Carpenter

Guest conductor Michael Charry joined the Berkshire Symphony Orchestra Sunday evening in the group's second Chapin Hall concert. Charry, who earned his reputation as assistant conductor of the Cleveland Orchestra alongside the legendary George Szell, showed off both his abilities and those of the orchestra to the fullest.

The three pieces performed were Rossini's Overture to L'Italiana in Algeri, "Faure's Pelleas et Melisande Suite and Brahms' Symphony No. 1 in c minor. All three pieces were written in the Romantic era and represented the work of composers from three different national heritages. Charry's conducting clearly brought out both the similarities and the differences among these works.

Communication

The concert opened with the Rossini Overture. The sense of a very real communication between conductor and orchestra was immediately evident. Charry led the orchestra gracefully from the subtle opening to the piece's closing. He clearly brought out the dramatic contrasts in volume and timbre that gave the piece a strong emotional intensity.

Whereas the Rossini piece relies on the interchange of fairly short phrases for its power, the Faure piece beautifully makes use of long, flowing melodies. Charry perfectly elicited these melodic lines from the orchestra. The first section features the violin section, and the smooth sound Charry drew from them perfectly fitted the mood of the music and was a contrast to the more percussive character of the Rossini piece.

This intensity was by no means limited to Charry's work with the violins; later in the piece, both woodwinds and flutes sounded just as beautiful. Throughout the piece, the energy and emotional intensity of both the conductor and orchestra remained high. This was certainly the high point of the performance.

This is not to suggest that the Brahms wasn't excellent, though. Although the performance of the piece seemed to have less energy than that of the Faure, Charry's conducting was still outstanding. The Brahms symphony was "bigger" than the two earlier pieces, but Charry still seemed to know it perfectly. Obviously

by Jocelyn Shadforth

Seven students spoke about their experiences as homosexuals, lesbians and bisexuals at Williams in a panel discussion entitled "Sexual Orientation at Williams" Friday night. The discussion, which drew a crowd of approximately 70 people, focused on the students' feelings about "coming out" and their families' reaction to their sexual preferences.

"Coming out is central to being gay and bisexual," Doug Krehbiel '88 said. Krehbiel, who moderated the discussion, said there are three different aspects to coming out: the time when one someone realizes that he or she is not heterosexual, the decision to act on that realization in a sexual way and the recognition of the broader political and social implications to that realization.

John Tyler '90 spoke of the denial that he went through before he came out. "During late high school I had two sexual relationships with men. I was very disturbed by them and I went through a big process of denial," he said. "When I came to Williams I had even heavier denial."

Tyler said that he attended a meeting of the Bisexual, Gay and Lesbian Union (BGLU) his freshmen year, which was then called the Gay and Lesbian Union, and realized that he was a bisexual. He came out to his parents this past summer, he said.

Brian Watson '88 said that he had been aware of his homosexuality since he was 11 or 12 but did not come out to himself until this August. "Then I went into this mad rush to tell everyone I knew," he said.

Bridget Balrd '89 said "I went through a stage of thinking I was exclusively homosexual. I really wanted people to deal with the fact that I was attracted to women." She said she now considers herself a bisexual.

In general, the panelists said that their parents had reacted in a supportive manner, although there were some adjustment problems.

Balrd said that her family was supportive but somewhat confused by her bisexuality. "A lot of people think you have to choose somehow or otherwise it's a copout," she said.

Kirsten Swenson '88 said that she had not yet told her parents. She said, "It's just not the right time."

The panelists also spoke about the social reaction to their homosexuality. Chris Nealon '89 said he felt that the world was going to end if he came out. "It was either me or the world and one of us was wrong." He said he fit the social stereotype of what it was to be straight this confused many people. Eventually, Nealon said, "I started to calm down and laugh at it."

Swenson said that she has experienced difficulty in knowing how open to be in her friendships. She said, "Sexuality is an intrinsic part of someone's nature. But it's weird to walk up to someone and say 'Hi, I'm Kirie. I'm blonde and bisexual.'" She said that while she world concerns, especially the lack of a Latin American Studies program.

Part of the problem, according to Hyde, is ensuring that enough students would take courses if they were offered. Oakley said that Williams has no courses on many European ethnic groups, and students often do not take these types of courses to justify hiring new faculty.

Cook said that the most important problem was integrating minority components into introductory courses. "We're concerned about getting at what we think of as the average white Williams student," he said. Cook mentioned the discussion of the Afro-American novel in English 101 at the Race Relations panel which he said convinced him that it had become routine. "There's still the problem that merely by having something included does not necessarily make it a part of the course," he said.

Professor Jason Kuo, a member of the CCRR, pointed out that a student can graduate from Williams without taking any courses on minorities or the non-Western world.

Oakley said that the CEP had once studied the possibility of creating a division requirement for those kind of courses, but said it was rejected after a study showed that the number of students taking the courses had increased steadily over the years. Eighty percent of the students in the most recent graduating class the CEP examined had taken these type of courses, Oakley said.

Hyde said that the CEP review would not be completed until Spring and that the CEP would continue to work with the CCRR. Several members of the CCRR asked that the CEP keep the issues in mind while looking at the course package in January.

Buy a printer with your Macintosh and conserve paper.

A Macintosh™ personal computer and an ImageWriter™ II printer will save you hours of time. Not to mention gallons of correction fluid and reams of paper. And, if you buy both now, the first ream of paper you'll save will have a lovely green glow with Presidents on it. So here's the deal: You'll save a bundle of cash when you purchase an ImageWriter II printer along with your choice of a Macintosh Plus or a Macintosh SE. Either way you'll be able to turn out beautifully prepared papers. And we'll even try to help you with a variety of financing options. We feel compelled to tell you, though, that a deal like this can't last forever.* So it's a good idea to see your campus microcomputer center today. And join the paper conservation movement.

composer, featured a cast of vocalists as well as the entire ensemble of instrumentalists. "Historia di Ezechia" is a mini-opera that tells the story of Ezechia's prayers to the Lord. The part of Ezechia was sung by John Andrews '89, who at times had trouble filling the long and difficult part. However, the performance sparked at the conclusion, with the full ensemble joining in the song.

The second half of the concert opened with works by Thomas Weelkes, a late Renaissance composer, and Kensey Purcell, of the Baroque period. "To Shorten Winter's Sadness" and "Next Winter Comes Slowly," both again reflected the seasonal theme. Featured on "Next Winter Comes Slowly" was bass Brian Watson '88, who amply sung the lamenting song to the accompaniment of the string section.

Three anonymous pieces followed, featuring different members of the ensemble. The second piece by Schutz was performed next-to-last. "Ein Kind ist uns Geboren (For Unto Us a Child is Born)" again featured harpsichord and provided more of the beautiful baroque harmonies. The ensemble closed with "The Holly and the Ivy," a traditional English Christmas song.

The initial offering of the Collegium Musicum left one with an uplifted Christmas season feeling. Even for those unfamiliar with the music of the period, the ensemble provided an excellent evening of entertainment.

consider altering town by-laws. Kolesar also expressed disapproval of the portion of the motion which seeks to put a limit on off-campus housing.

Bubriski and other town residents, including Sheila Barry of 36 Thomas Street (where a house has been rented to five Williams students), expressed concern over the proliferation of students living off-campus and their ability to pay higher rents has caused an increase in rental prices in Williamstown. This, they said, has caused a decrease in the available housing for townspeople.

"We're concerned with the neighborhood being changed. It will not change for the better, the impact will be negative. What I see happening on this (Thomas) street, in a short number of years, is that it will probably be 100 percent student housing," Barry said. She said that Thomas Street has traditionally been low and moderate income housing.

Kenyatta told the committee that an administrative committee on housing, which she sits on, has considered recommending the construction of an apartment building on campus for upperclass students.

The committee, which the college formed as part of a fundraising campaign linked with the college's bicentennial in 1933, is still in the process of evaluating the housing situation on campus, Kenyatta said later in the week.

Currently, there are 60 students living in six co-ops and 115 students renting residences throughout Williamstown, according to Kenyatta.

Bubriski agreed that another residence is needed on the campus. "You'll have to provide housing for each and every student, or we will have to get strict with you. You (the college) are making life difficult for the community," Bubriski said.

Kolesar pointed out that compared to other colleges, Williams lets a small number of students live off-campus.

The Town-Gown Committee also passed a motion 3-0, with two abstentions, encouraging the college to inspect prospective rentals and impose and enforce rent controls.

THE WILLIAMS RECORD

Kenyatta, who also abstained, said that it is the students' responsibilities to check their own off-campus housing.

If too many complaints are lodged against a house in which students are living off-campus from either neighbors or other students, Kenyatta said, the students will be forced to move back into a dormitory. Kenyatta said she recalled that action being taken in one case.

In other business, William Wagner, Assistant Dean of the College, told the committee that the parking committee which he chairs has nearly completed its task of proposing a solution to the shortage of parking spaces on the campus.

Wagner said his committee will suggest a dual policy, in which parking facilities are expanded and the number of students allowed to bring cars to campus is limited.

Wagner said after the meeting that his committee will most likely recommend that freshmen not be allowed to have cars on campus. Currently, freshmen are permitted automobiles during winter study and second semester.

In early January, the recommendations will be presented to the College Council, the Committee for Undergraduate Life (CUL), and the Williamstown planner, Barbara Bashevkin. After soliciting their input, a final report will be presented to the college administration in late January, Wagner said.

For the first part of the work, Curchack's face is masked behind his various exciting, but false, disguises. After he reveals his actual face, the play begins to realize its deeper goals, but, at the same time, it begins its downfall. His characterizations become weaker, more repetitive, and less purposeful, and the speeches taken from Shakespeare become more erratic and less comprehensible.

This breakdown is not without a purpose, for just as The Tempest involves the loss of Prospero's control, Curchack intends to reflect the deterioration of his control and direction as well. But intentionally bad theatre does not good theatre make.

Clearly Curchack knows what he should be doing, as well as to what limits he should do it. His voices are clever, his gestures dramatic, and his effects entertaining, but he consistently takes them too far. He drags a joke out too long, overdoes a gesture or a voice until they lose their fizz and become as exciting as a carbonated beverage left out too long.

Often he realizes when he goes too far, and attempts to correct it by stepping out of character, discussing the mistake just committed, apologizing for it, and then, with some effort, squeezing back into character. Meanwhile the audience has lost the flow of the play, and is forced to start again, rebuilding confidence in Curchack until he lets us down again.

This mishandling creates an unintended irony when Curchack tells the audience: "Now my charms are overthrown, And what strength I have mine own, Which is most faint." Taken from Prospero's epilogue, this speech transforms Curchack into Prospero, whose magical powers no longer have their effect, Shakespeare, for whom the epilogue is often considered to be an autobiographical conclusion to his last play, and Curchack himself, who, now stripped of his disguises, is apologizing for the limits of his theatrical effects and magic. His weaknesses, unfortunately, have been all too clear throughout the play, so this speech, rather than challenging our perceptions of what we have gained from his play, only serves to highlight his faults.

Stuff As Dreams Are Made On reaches for great things. It criticizes Shakespeare and theatrical traditions, embraces them, and attempts to create new conventions simultaneously. Curchack is a dynamic performer, and his special effects entertain, but too often his work crosses the line between casual and clumsy, and ultimately offers a toothless bite. It bears a resemblance to the Faerie Queen's castle: something striving towards the heavenly, containing the potentiality of grand and beautiful architecture, but which is also set in the sand and made of shaky, unmortared brickwork ready to fall.

most people were opposed to it.

James McNulty '89, the president of Mark Hopkins house, said, "People see some good parts to it, but they see a lot of bad parts too." He said that people were afraid it would spoil the openness of the campus and decided that it would be better if people were allowed to lock their own doors.

John Bellwoar '89, president of Mills, said that no one he spoke to at snacks had a strong feeling in favor of the system. "A lot of people felt it would actually reduce the amount of security," he said.

Members of the College

Council voted against the proposal 26-0 with four abstentions at last Thursday's meeting. Discussion before the vote centered on Tuesday's open meeting concerning the proposal. Zinn said it was the opinion of many attending the meeting that, "We definitely should be concentrating on the security of individual doors."

The council also voted to support "Increased security of rooms, doors and locks across campus where deemed necessary." The vote was 28 in favor, one opposed, and one abstention.

Council Vice President Nicole Melcher '88 said, "I think the issue might be more of students locking doors, not a new lock."

Education was discussed as another possibility in raising awareness of property violations and security. Zinn said the Council may want to consider educating students by making data available on security violations.

The final vote of the evening concerned College Council support for the employment of the Identecard system on academic buildings only where deemed necessary. Nine voted in favor, 14 were opposed, and seven abstained. These figures will be reported to the Dean's office so that "The people who are making decisions will know how the council feels," Zinn said.

achieved much of what he set out to accomplish, including a growing economy, a stronger military establishment, and not raising taxes.

The Reagan legacy, Barnes said, is a strong one. "It's hard to believe now, but Reagan has made the presidency a more vigorous position." Also, many of his ideals still find favor in a nation where the political feeling is still moderate to conservative. Specifically, Barnes said, Reagan's emphasis on the traditional values of the family, his tough stance in foreign affairs and his support of SDI are likely to be continued, for the most part, by the next president.

However, there will be some changes. Barnes said he anticipates a shift in emphasis from military to domestic spending, especially for the homeless. "Reagan's idea of the homeless is Ferdinand and Imelda Marcos," he said. Also, according to Barnes, the next president is likely to do more to combat the federal deficit.

Politics are likely to change as well because, Barnes said, "You won't have a larger than life presence in the Oval Office." Barnes said he sees no candidate with the ability to move people as Reagan has done and believes that ideologically driven politics are on the way out. The next president, Barnes added, is not likely to have the sense of humor which Reagan has.

Barnes also talked about the 1988 presidential race. The first thing to note, according to Barnes, is that "Reagan has given the Republicans a more popular image." This fact, among others, may make it very difficult for the Democrats to win the election. One of the other reasons, Barnes said, is that the strongest Democrats - Mario Cuomo, Bill Bradley and Sam Nunn - are not running in 1988. If that does not happen, the Republicans will likely hold onto the office.

Barnes said he is hesitant to say who will be the next president because the candidates are changing every day. "You never know - Michael Dukakis might loosen up appear affable, even friendly," Barnes said he plans to vote for Jack Kemp, whom he knows personally, or possibly for Bob Dole.

one they passed last July. The Hynes Convention center measure, which the Ways and Means Committee cut from the bill, is strongly supported in the Senate.

If the Senate does not concur with the House version of the bill, a conference committee will be called, which would include three members of each legislative body. Guernsey said this will probably happen before Christmas.

A version of the bill must be passed by January 5 in order to be included in this legislative session. If a bill is not passed by then, the bill's proponents will have to start from scratch in the next legislative session. Both Guernsey and Bosley said they were both confident that modifications can be made by January 5.

Bosley and Guernsey attribute the action taken on the bill in the Ways and Means Committee to the lobbying efforts by MassMoCA supporters.

"It's a huge task to convince the Ways and Means Committee that any bill is important enough and fiscally sound enough to be considered," he said.

Bosley cited petition drives in the Northern Berkshires area and letters from 567 North Adams State College Students and about 130 its alumni as the keys to raising the Ways and Means Committee's awareness of community support for the MassMoCA project.

never denies her bisexuality in a conversation, it is also not the first thing she puts on her resume.

Swenson also said, "I am proud to come out before so many friendly listeners... In spite of the scariness I'm glad to be here." Katie Kent '88 said that she felt it was her duty to participate because, "By necessity, in our society to be a lesbian is political." She said, "This society is so silent, so heterosexual, that I have to assert that I'm here. I'm a lesbian."

Krehbiel spoke about how Williams has changed for bisexuals and homosexuals students had been caught trying to pass false identification in her bar since September. "I had just gotten to the point where too many kids were trying to do it. It's not my fault they changed the law to 21. ... I did my best to avoid the situation," she said.

Michel said she had been forwarding Williams I.D. cards that students had tried to pass, as well as the names of some of the students who were passing the cards, to Ransom Jenks, Director of Security, and that she had called Dean of the College Stephen Flx's office, hoping that the college would take some action. She said she thought the college would send a letter out to the student body, informing them of the law and her policy. When the problem continued, she said, she decided to take action.

Jenks said Michel had given him several Williams I.D. cards that had been confiscated from people trying to pass them as identification at the pub, and that he had talked to the students named on the cards. He said the college could take no since he first arrived. Originally a member of the Class of 1987, Krehbiel said, "I was appalled by the attitude of people in my class." He said that now, students seem more exposed to homosexuality and more confident about the topic and that the number of freshmen active in the BGLU has increased from one when he was a freshman to seven this year.

Krehbiel pointed to the first openly gay faculty member to receive tenure, Assistant Professor of Political Science Timothy Cook, the formation of an alumni organization for gay and bisexual alumni and the student participation in the National Pride march in Washington October as further evidence of this attitude action against these students because the students almost invariably told him that the cards were stolen.

With regards to sending a letter to students, Jenks said "We don't feel that we should be notifying students what the drinking law is, that's something Mary Michel should be doing."

For students who had passed the cards, (Michel forwarded 3 or 4 names of these to Jenks) Jenks said "Those things that happen out in the community are really matters between the student and that institution." For individual students, Jenks said all he can do is inform them of the law.

Michel that some of the cards proffered over the course of the year had been forged, some were cards of students who had graduated last year, and some were cards of friends or brothers of the students that tried to pass them.

The Pub has been having some problems with its liquor license. According to the Advocate, Michel has been ordered to pay court costs and a victim/change.

In retrospect, the panelists said that coming out was a relief for them. Tyler said, "I still feel really good although the euphoric feeling wears off." Watson said, "I wish I had done it a lot earlier," and said students should not wait until their senior year. Nealon described the most difficult period as the time before one comes out. He said, "Hell is before you come out (of) ... the closet." Swenson added, "It's really claustrophobic in there."

The panel was followed by a discussion period. Both the panel and a party afterwards in Currier Ballroom were sponsored by the Bisexual, Gay and Lesbian Union.

second half. Crouchley had 16 points, Hedeman added 14, and Julia Beasley '89 chipped in 9 more as the squad cruised to the 70-50 victory.

After the game Coach Roberts said, "We held together well defensively, and I was very pleased." Robert's team is now undefeated after earlier victories over Skidmore and Colby-Sawyer, both by wide margins.

Fast breaks and presses figure prominently in Robert's plans for the team. A quick three guard, two forward lineup will be used for this style of play, but Roberts can also field a larger lineup for half court situations. Roberts is counting on Hedeman, Crouchley, and Cadigan to score consistently for the Ephs, who lost only one player to graduation from last year's 14-8 squad. The second year coach is cautiously optimistic about the new season, commenting, "The potential is there for a great season. It just depends on keeping a good attitude and how hard they're willing to work."

performed steadily so far with occasional inspired flashes, and as they work together more the goals should come more frequently for the threesome.

Freshman Sean Seguin, whom Coach McCormick described as a real pleasure to have at Williams, centers the line of Walt Hoffman '89 and Rob Abel '91. Hoffman's experience should help these two talented freshmen to develop, as both have shown good skills and hard work on the ice.

Early woes

The Ephs opened the season with perennially tough Connecticut College and ECAC West tournament finalist Hamilton, both on the road, and fell to both by narrow margins. Against Conn. College, Hoffman and Dave Bakken scored for Williams to tie the score at 2-2, but a Conn College goal with just 2:19 remaining broke the tie and sent the Ephs packing. Against Hamilton, the Ephs were down by one goal, 4-3 and pressing the Continental zone with an extra attacker when Hamilton put in an empty-net goal to make the final 5-3.

In the home opener against American International College last Monday, the team displayed some excellent hockey but was plagued by errors and inconsistency in a 7-5 loss. Several apparent goals and shots off the post had the large home crowd on its feet, but AIC answered with breakaway goals to silence the Eph faithful.

Caswell opened the game's scoring at 9:03 of the first period, but AIC scored four times before the Ephs could get on the board again, when Bakken scored in the second period on a power play. Van Belle tallied a hat trick in the third period, but the squad was unable to keep AIC off the board in that period.

Last Wednesday, the squad lost to Norwich 8-4 on the road. Norwich had two players with three goals apiece, as Williams was again unable to mount a sustained attack. Captain Caswell said of the team's inability to put the puck in the net, "We have to work on getting our shots down, and hitting the nets for the rebounds a little harder." Of the team's overall attitude, he said, "Everyone's a little down now, but once our first victory comes, it should help us get into the winning spirit."

The Ephs next try for their first victory, and Coach McCormick's 300th lifetime coaching win, against Trinity tonight at home at 7:00 PM.

Faculty members said that the CAP has decided not to recommend for tenure Assistant Professor of Political Science Carlos Egan, Assistant Professors of Art Christine Kondoleon and Vaughan Grylls, Assistant Professor of Chemistry Diana Sedney and Assistant Professor of Economics Padmanabhan Srinagesh.

According to Goethals, the typical tenure path that faculty members follow is that professors come to Williams with a three year appointment as assistant professors. In their third year, departments make reappointment recommendations to the CAP, and if the recommendations are positive and the CAP accepts them, the professors receive a second appointment for a four year term as assistant professor. In the fall of each professor's sixth year, he or she applies for tenure, and if it is granted, they become associate professors in their seventh year.

Goethals said there are exceptions to this path.

He said that for all appointment decisions, the CAP takes into account teaching, scholarship and contributions to the community. He said student

Record stands at even .500

Women's skaters fall to Middlebury

by Scott Freeman

On Saturday afternoon the women's ice hockey team came up on the short end of a 7-2 score against Middlebury. The game put the Ephs' record at 1-1 after an outstanding road win over RPI in the season opener.

The contest featured a very experienced and hard skating Panther squad against a developing young Eph unit. According to Coach Jim Briggs, Middlebury had been playing together for four years whereas the younger Ephs have six players just starting the game.

In spite of these shortcomings, goalie Daisie Hagey '88 kept the game at 1-1 throughout most of the first period, the only Eph goal coming unas-stisted from junior Lani Wishnie. However, the team finally relented to the powerful Panther attack and the score stood at 3-1 at the end of the first period.

After three unanswered Middlebury goals in the second period, the Ephs opened the third with fire as Kara Lynch '90 took the puck from Catherine Eaton '88 and broke around a Panther defenseman. With the defense converging, Lynch centered the puck to Kirsten Neuse '89, who beat the sprawling goaltender high, closing the gap to 6-2. Middlebury, however, proved too tough as they quickly answered this tally with one of their own to finish the game with a 7-2 victory.

Coach Briggs still felt good about the team's prospects this year, coming off the best record in the history of women's hockey here at Williams (9-6 last year). Although he thinks that the team could improve on that mark this year, he stated that the squad is "not as strong" as last year's because of the loss of leading scorer Sarah Shull '88 and injured Jenny Aulse '88, who "would have been the leading scorer this year." Both of these valuable players are expected to be back after the holidays.

Wednesday the squad will host a Skidmore team that fell to the Ephs twice last year. The team feels confident that this game could boost their record another notch en route to a winning season.

Track under new coach, look to Little Three Title

by Steve Brody

The Williams track team is entering its first season under new head coach Peter Farwell, who took over the job after a nationwide search following former coach Richard Farley's acceptance of the head football coaching position last year. Despite the loss of several top competitors to graduation, including All-Americans Andre Lopez and Brandt Johnson, the Ephs are looking once again to dominate their New England opponents, and capture another Little Three Title.

The women's team will be led by two-time All-American hurdler Dawn Macauley '89. Macauley will compete in the 55 meter hurdles as well as the 400 and 500 meter races during the season. Sophomore 800 meter runners Ann Dannhauer and Susan Gray, who both lowered the school record in the event last year, will be counted on for points in the middle distances.

Freshman Anne Platt, who captured the Little Three cross country title in October, should see a good deal of success in the 1500 meters, while distance runners Sarah Pierce '88 and Sara St. Antoine '88 (co-captains), Sarah Hams '89, and Ingrid Wiesel '90 look to lead their competition in both the 1500 and 3000 meter runs.

The men's team, which won the NESAC championship and finished fourth in New England outdoors last year, will count on a number of returning stars. Sophomore Geoff Igharo, who set a Williams record in the triple jump as a freshman, will compete in that event, the long jump and the 55 meter dash. Joining him to lead Williams in the long jumps is Ken Alleyne '88. Alleyne, who fought a hamstring injury last season, will also see action in the 400 meter race. Hurdlers Scott Purdy '88 and Ben Soriano '90 looked strong at an open meet at Dartmouth last week.

In the distance events, the Ephs are counting on the recovery of many of their injury-plagued cross-country runners. Ted Arrowsmith '88 and Gil McCabe '89 are being joined this year by sophomore transfer Nate McVey-Finney and freshman Evan Driscoll as the leaders of a large pack in the 1500 and 3000. The 800 will see Dave Nadelman '89, Dave Tewksbury '89, and Bob Kane '88 go head-to-head for the top spots, followed closely by freshmen Jon Habjan and Keko Torres. Nadelman will also race in the 500, where he has gone to the New England's last two years.

to Benson in the IM raised hopes of an Eph rally, but Amherst's dominance in the freestyle events checked Williams' charge.

Last Tuesday, the men downed the University of Connecticut 122-95, while the women lost 111-156 to the Huskies. Veteran head coach Carl Samuelson presided over ceremonies at the inaugural Chandler Athletic Center pool dual meet.

Dan Snyder '90, Michael O'Malley, Cleurzo, Benson, Davis, and diver Scott Schwager '91 all contributed double-digit scores to lead Williams past the troublesome UConn. In the nightcap, Karen Whitaker '91, Schroeder, Broudy, and Freemer scored individual wins against the overwhelming Husky women.

Each team will carry 1-1 records to winter training at Fort Lauderdale, Florida. Junior Dave Brown's return from abroad should bolster the men's promising free corps, while diving coach Mandy Glenner's host of pebes threaten to score heavily for the women.

SPORTS SHORTS

M. Squash

"The highlight of our year" is how Vassar squash coach Bill Barhlte described the Williams Invitational squash tournament. The three day tournament saw ten visiting teams descend upon Williamstown to do battle with each other and the host Ephs in Lasell Gymnasium, the site of next March's Intercollegiate Nationals.

Each squad faced eight adversaries in round robin competition for best overall record, and the Midshipmen of Navy wrapped up the first place title with an undefeated mark. Ranked sixth in the country a year ago, Navy ran into few obstacles in sailing to the championship. Their eight victories included 6-3 wins over their three closest rivals in the tournament: Trinity, Cornell, and Williams.

Of the Williams nine, only Doug Gilbert '89, Robby Hallagan, '89, and Chris Pentz '91, were able to stem the tide of a Navy team that captain Wendell Chestnut '88 described as "physically strong and well-conditioned ... in better match shape than us." In fact, Hallagan and Pentz both went 6-0 for the tournament.

Hallagan's first match, perhaps the most exciting of the weekend, was decided at 14-all in the fifth game, when the junior stunned his Midshipman opponent by electing to have a single point decide the match. In winning the crucial point, Hallagan put away the formidable Middy.

The Ephs' overall standing in the tournament was fourth place, as the squad fell to Cornell by a 6-3 score on Sunday. Finishing between the Ephs and the Midshipmen were Trinity in second and the Big Red of Cornell in third.

With their number one and five players, Senior Captain Jeanne Closspe and sophomore Sarah Fulkerson, both felled by knee injuries, the Women's squash team dropped both halves of a tri-meet last Saturday, losing to Colgate 6-3 and to host Wellesley 7-2.

With the entire lineup shifted up, the Ephs found themselves playing against stronger competition than normal and only Junior Lori Beth Schaeen could manage a victory against both squads. Schaeen shut out her Colgate opponent and trounced her Wellesley counterpart 3-1 from the number seven position. Against Colgate, third and fourth players Susie Piper '90 and Sopht Poosanahom '88 added victories, beating their opponents 3-0 and 3-1 respectively. Senior Christine Boddiker rounded out the Williams winners, easily downing her number eight Wellesley opposite 3-1.

Williams looks forward to the return of Closspe, who has been ranked one of the top twelve players in the nation since her sophomore year. Coach Lisa Melendy also eagerly awaits Fulkerson as well as Juniors Nancy Shore and Jill Applebaum both of whom will return to Williams second semester.

All four will be needed, as well as strong performances from Junior Allison Buckner, last year's number two player and Freshman Lisa Brayton, slated to play in the third spot this year. If the team is to improve on last year's 14-8 record and third place division three national ranking.

The team will enjoy a long rest before resuming play January seventh at Dartmouth.

Wrestling

Grappling with a greatly depleted lineup, the wrestling team lost all three legs of a quad-meet held at the University of Massachusetts at Boston last Saturday. The Ephs were pinned by UMass 31-16 and Plymouth State 31-15 before narrowly losing to Bridgewater State 29-26 in a match that hinged on the final bout.

Against Bridgewater, Captains John Dillon '89 and Mark Duff '89 took forfeits at 126 and 190 pounds respectively and freshman Stein Soelberg pinned his 177 pound opponent for the Ephs. Kevin Cook '90 battled his opponent to a 6-6 tie at 158 and a double forfeit at 118 set up a 26-26 tie entering the heavyweight slot where freshman Justin Powell suffered a 7-2 loss.

In the earlier matches, Dillon and Cook and Soelberg decided their Plymouth State opponents 6-3, 11-6 and 7-3 respectively, while Duff took his second forfeit of the day. Duff was the only Williams wrestler to defeat his UMass opponent, sticking him in the first period.

Dillon commented, "We're a young team with alot of potential, we should improve quickly."

Dillon's words may prove true, especially when four lettermen return to the mats in January, including All New England sophomore Steve Felix. Their presence, along with Dillon's steady leadership, Duff's awesome ability - last year he represented Williams in the Division III national tournament - and the presence of first year coach Roger Caron, should help the Ephs in their quest for their first winning season of the eighties.

Williams will break for the holidays before resuming competition with a tough January 13 home match versus New York powerhouse SUNY-Albany and perennial New England standard Western New England College.

8 records fall in Pratt Pool, Ephs split meet

by Kurt Oeler

Coach Carl Samuelson's swimming teams mustered a split decision in their battle at Amherst on Saturday. The women won 143-123, while the men lost to Amherst for the first time in twenty years, 95-119.

Record-breaking swimmers highlighted the meet. Kathia Vandevenne '91 set pool standards with wins in the one and three-meter diving, while classmate Lee Schroeder's win in the 50 meter free (25:66) earned her a spot on the record board. Schroeder also teamed with Dore Lebeau '91, Anne MacEachern '90, and Berne Broudy '90 to set a pool record in the 200 meter medley relay (1:56.27), and anchored Lebeau, MacEachern, and Michelle Freemer '90 in the record-breaking 400 meter free relay (3:47.67). Freemer lowered her own pool record in the 500 meter free, set last year, with her winning time of 5:22.51.

Rob Benson led the men in their losing cause. The exuberant sophomore stuck it to Amherst with record-breaking wins in the 200 IM (2:02.57) and 200 fly (2:01.40). Benson also teamed with Chris Cleurzo '90, Evan Davis '89, and Chris Giglio '89 to set a pool mark in the 400 medley. Giglio's strong second

Men's Hockey looking for first win, Bantams tonight

by Ted Hobart

"We knew we'd have some rough edges to work out in the beginning," said coach William McCormick, suspecting that the 1987-88 edition of the men's hockey team might have trouble adjusting to the large influx of new players into the program and to the switching of line and defensive assignments. These problems have combined with a devastating early season schedule to produce an 0-4 record for a team that has yet to realize its potential.

McCormick emphasized the youth and inexperience of the team, with 10 of 21 players being freshmen or sophomores. "There isn't going to be another team we face with three of its first four defenders being freshmen. Our freshmen defenders are learning to play varsity hockey, not that they're at fault."

Junior assistant captain Tim Frechette is the only defenseman who saw a regular shift last year, and he is joined on the first defense by freshman Mark Hall, while rookies Rick Laferriere and Tim Hale make up the second defensive unit. Tim Yarter '88 and Jim McNulty '89, both experienced players, give McCormick a solid third pair, and freshman Steve Wallace can help out.

Line Adjustments
The offense has seen similar,

if not so drastic changes in structure. The only line that played together last year is made up of junior wingers Will Putnam and Mike Swenson centered by classmate and assistant captain Chris Conway. This line is extremely hardworking and talented, and has been the team's highest scoring line the past two seasons.

However, so far this year the juniors have been unable to find the chemistry which has worked so well before, and they too are likely to be split up for the Trinity game tonight in the wake of illness among the team. Clearly, though, if and when they get it together, a line like their's is a powerful weapon in the Eph arsenal.

Last year's leading scorer, Ron Van Belle '90 centers another line, with wingers Chris Donato '89 and Dave Bakken '90, who was moved up from defense last year. These hustling wingers work hard in the corners, both forechecking and backchecking, and complement the scoring touch of the talented center very well. This line has done well so far, displaying a crisp, sustained passing attack which keeps opponents on their heels.

Senior Chris Pachus and captain Dave Caswell '88 join center Bob Santry '90 on the line which traditionally starts the game for the Ephs. This line has

by Mike Harrington

Overcoming sickness and two weak opponents, the men's basketball team captured the first annual Williams Invitational on Saturday and Sunday to up its record to an impressive 4-0.

The Ephmen moved to the four win mark by manhandling Salve Regina 77-54 on Sunday to capture the championship trophy. Garcia Major '90 led the attack with 21 points. Mike Masters '89 was named Most Valuable Player of the tournament, and he was joined by Major and teammate Rich Williams '90 on the all-tournament team.

The team overcame a lackluster first half Saturday night to defeat Haverford College 79-57 in the first men's game in the new John W. Chandler Gymnasium. Earlier in the day, Salve Regina had downed winless Bridgewater St. to set up the final showdown.

Against Haverford, the Williams five started sluggishly, falling behind 11-6 after seven minutes of play. Both sides exhibited extremely sloppy play in the half, but Williams managed to pull ahead 31-20 at the intermission, despite shooting 13 for 30 and committing nine turnovers against the Fords 2-3 zone defense.

Defense keys spurt

After Haverford closed the deficit to five, 40-35, with thirteen minutes left, the Ephs picked up their defensive intensity and ran off ten unanswered points, including four apiece by Williams, and Than Healy '91. Then sophomore sensation Major helped put the game on ice with an assist, a driving hoop and another assist, this one on a Mike Butler '90 three pointer, that extended the lead to 57-36. The Fords never came closer than 15 points after that, and the Ephs coasted the rest of the way.

Major led all scorers with 17, while Williams and fellow sophomore Dave Morrison each tallied 13. Masters continued his fine all-around play, scoring 11 points, while playing three different positions.

Williams opened its season last week with two impressive road victories. Butler scored 17 points in his first varsity game as Williams routed Skidmore 76-58. Morrison added 15 and Masters 13. At Norwich last Wednesday, the Ephs beat the second ranked team in New England Division III 81-76, behind Healy's 21 points and nine boards and Morrison's 15 points and eight boards. Coach Sheehy said the "great win" was largely due to the team's execution and ball control.

Outlook

This year's squad will prove to be markedly different from last season's ECAC championship team. Gone are big men Brandt Johnson '86 and Greg Lang '86, and off-guard Henry Jones, along with their combined 45 points a game. Sheehy will rely on the experience of Masters, Major and Bill Melchionni '89 to lead the young team (five sophomores and three freshman).

Despite the loss of the two big men, Williams will have even more size this year. Returning center Morrison (6'5") will be joined by newcomers Healy (6'8") and Jeff Miller (6'6").

This formidable trio was instrumental in the Norwich game, totalling 33 points and 24 rebounds.

The backcourt will again be anchored by Major, Melchionni and Masters, all of whom are excellent shooters. Sophomores Williams and Butler will figure prominently at the shooting guard position while Josh Lipske '90 and Dave Clawson '89 (coming off a leg injury) will spell the backcourt.

Sheehy plans to utilize his team's depth by employing a man-to-man and various pressure defenses in his game plan. He hopes to use nine to ten men a game, requiring harder work during shorter playing stints while always keeping fresh players in the game.

Despite their inexperience and a tough winter schedule, the Ephs should have a successful year. Their last game before the holidays is at North Adams state tomorrow.

Garcia Major slices through the air en route to two. His 17 points paced the Ephs to an easy win over Haverford. (Rifkin)

Women's hoops undefeated, smashes Middlebury, 70-50

by Jim McDermott

The women's basketball team used an unrelenting defense and a well-honed fast break in thrashing the Middlebury Panthers 70-50 on Saturday. Team Captain Nancy Hedeman '89 dominated the boards and guard Christine Cadigan '91 controlled the perimeter in leading the Ephs to a 3-0 record.

The Ephwomen grabbed the lead after breaking a 9-9 tie early in the game, and spent the rest of the contest adding to their margin. Coach Nancy Roberts employed a man-to-man full court press in the first half that kept Middlebury off balance and exploited the Panthers' sloppy ballhandling. The Ephs converted several turnovers into fast break baskets, which offset the team's relatively cold shooting in the early going.

Hedeman grabbed some of her game high seven rebounds and controlled the inside as the Ephs soon regained their touch and went on a 23-13 spurt. Forcing Middlebury to take long jumpers by staying back in a 2-1-2 zone, the squad took a 40-29 lead into intermission.

Fast break rolls

The Panthers came out more inspired at the beginning of the second stanza, but again the Eph fast break warmed up to take control of the game. With Kim Hatch '88 filling the middle and feeding Cadigan, Missy Crouchley '89, and Hedeman, the Ephs stretched the lead to 61-44. Most of Cadigan's game high 17 points came in the

Vandals plague campus over break

by James Lee

A record number of break-ins and vandalism incidents occurred during winter break while Williams students were absent from the campus for vacations.

Three students have reported to campus security that items of their stereo equipment were missing. No arrests have yet been made, although police are investigating the incidents.

"We never have had this many incidents occurring during a break. I have no idea why the number of crimes suddenly increased during this past break," Director of Security Ransom Jenks said. The incidents of vandalism took place at a time when the campus was especially vulnerable because security officers usually take vacations when students do. Security shifts were reduced to one officer on duty as opposed to the usual two.

"Because our duty is to protect students as well as college property, we can afford to allow our officers to take their vacations only when students take their vacations," Jenks said. "But, I don't think we necessarily could have prevented these crimes even with two officers on duty."

The Williamstown police received at least eight reports of vandalism and break-ins from campus security between December 25 to December 28, Police Chief Joseph Zotto Jr. said. Some of the incidents reported to police were:

— At 10:35 p.m. on December 25, security officers reported to police that vandals had broken five globe-lamp lights, two near Bronfman Science Center and three outside Fitch and Prospect houses.

— At 9:50 a.m. the next morning, security reported that someone had pried open a door of Lasell Gymnasium, leaving blood on the doors beneath the clock tower. Fayerweather Hall had also been broken into the previous evening. Security officers said that someone had entered Fayerweather by breaking in through a basement window.

— At 4:57 a.m. that Sunday, Police received a report of a break-in at Lehman Hall. Security said that ground level windows had been smashed in and perpetrators had entered the

Gov. to file special bill for MassMoCA funds

by Scott J. O'Callaghan

Governor Michael Dukakis said last Wednesday that he will file a special bill to fund the proposed Massachusetts Museum of Contemporary Art (MassMoCA). The bill would provide $35 million in state funding that organizers have said is necessary to get the project off the ground.

Before the governor's announcement last week, prospects for MassMoCA seemed bleak. At midnight last Tuesday time ran out on the 1987 legislative session and the Convention Centers Bill, which supporters hoped would have provided funding for MassMoCA and other projects across the state.

When the bill died, Sprague Technologies Inc.'s agreement with Williams to donate its 28-building mill complex effectively ended. But a Sprague official said later in the week that the company would take no action that would preclude the project.

After Dukakis' announcement, College President Francis Oakley said, "I am delighted about the governor's initiative. If it succeeds in breaking up the legislative logjam quickly, then we will indeed have made a most encouraging beginning."

Uncompromising positions

Legislators from the House and Senate were unable to reach a compromise Tuesday night on a section of the Convention Centers Bill that would have set aside 20 percent of the state hotel-motel tax to subsidize the Hynes Convention Center in Boston. The Hynes measure is strongly supported by Senate President William Bulger but is opposed in the House.

Representative Daniel Bosley (D-North Adams) said that Speaker of the House George Keverian met with Bulger Tuesday night to try to reach a compromise on the Convention Centers Bill and other bills, but they could not reach an agreement.

Before Dukakis announced at a press conference Wednesday that he would issue a special message for funding MassMoCA, statements from college

College will repair or replace room locks

by Todd Owens

The college has decided to abandon a proposal to install Identical locking devices on dormitory buildings, according to a letter sent to the college community last month by Dean of the College Stephen Fix.

Fix said in the letter that the college will instead move to establish a systematic program to strengthen and improve the locks on individual student rooms.

"The extensive public debate of the past month has produced a decisive consensus against the proposal," Fix said in the letter, citing votes taken by the College Council, the Committee on Undergraduate Life and students who attended an open meeting. He said an equally clear consensus emerged on the need to improve door locks.

According to Director of Housing Robert Fowler, the plan to repair or replace the locks on individual student rooms could take as long as five years. He said that it will depend on the priority the college gives to the project.

The cost of the program is likely to be very high, Fowler said, although he said that estimating the total cost right now would be nearly impossible. Fix said that it could cost more than just installing the Identical system of locks on external doors. The estimated cost of

by Stephanie Jones

After December's faculty meeting at which Professor of Religion Mark Taylor expressed his frustration with the Williams Bookstore, last week several professors and students voiced similar complaints when questioned by the Record.

At least one professor said he thought that the efforts of the student faculty committee formed a few years ago to address problems with the bookstore have been insufficient.

Taylor said that the committee failed to address the biggest issue, the range of books available at the store.

Taylor raised the issue at last December's faculty meeting. Dean of the College Stephen Fix and College Treasurer William Reed said they are looking into the complaints. Fix declined further comment.

Taylor said last week that a college bookstore should render efficient and economical service to faculty and students and provide a range of books important to a college town. According to Taylor, this is especially important in an isolated community like Williamstown. He said he is forced to go to an Amherst bookstore to find interesting new books in his field, and he said other professors feel the same way.

"Bookstore is critical!" "I think that the bookstore is critical to the educational mission of the college," Taylor said. According to him, the Williams Bookstore should be improved, even if the college must spend the money. He pointed out the

Michael C. Knight, 32

Michael C. Knight, assistant professor of theatre, died of a brain tumor on Sunday, Dec. 27, at his home in New York City. He had been on medical leave from the college since Sept. 1.

Knight taught acting and directing at Williams since 1984. He directed a number of Williamstheatre student productions, including "The Bacchae," by Euripides; "Heartbreak House" by Shaw; "The Critic" by Sheridan; "A Lesson From Aloes" by Fugard; and Joyce's "Exiles". In 1986, Knight directed "The Blacks" by Jean Genet, the first Williamstheatre production with an all-Black cast.

At Williams, he developed a new course in Black Theatre, and worked closely with Cap & Bells, a student theatre group, and with the Black Student Union (BSU). He directed a BSU production of a play, "Spell #7," and developed an ongoing theatre workshop with that group.

Williams President Francis Oakley said, "First as a student, and then as a member of the faculty, Michael Knight enriched the theatrical life of Williams College. He was a person of great accomplishment and even greater promise. All of us at the college are grieved by his untimely death."

Dedication, energy, commitment

A theatre department staffing memorandum of fall 1985 makes note of Knight's dedication, energy, commitment, and "his own special brand of innovation". The memorandum cited Knight's "commitment to political and social change as a product of the theatre experience" as one of his greatest strengths.

Knight was particularly admired by his colleagues and students for his evocative and patient coaching of actors in production. Professor of Theater Jean-Bernard Bucky called him a "supportive, imaginative and engaged colleague."

Chairperson and Associate Professor of Theatre Arden Fingerhut noted that Knight worked especially well with students. "He never allowed them to be dishonest in what they were doing, because he was such an incredibly honest, very straightforward person," she said.

Erik Tripiett '88, who did technical work for "The

Michael Knight

Blacks," said Knight had a unique way of working with students, in "getting them motivated in their craft and in activating the whole thinking process." Tripiett said Knight was very energetic and could come across as intimidating, but he used these traits to help each student reach his or her potential.

Todd Bunch '88 said Knight was particularly concerned with the welfare of black students at Williams and was always available to advise them.

Knight was born on February 24, 1955 and he attended Cardinal Spellman High School in the Bronx before coming to Williams. As an undergraduate he directed "Raisin in the Sun" and "The Boys in the Band" and performed in the musical "Guys and Dolls". He graduated in 1977 with a double major in history and English with an additional concentration in Afro-American studies. In 1974, 1975, and 1976, he won the Elizur Smith Speaking Prize, and also won the Van Vechten Prize for impromptu speaking. He was awarded a Thomas J. Watson Traveling Fellowship, and after graduation undertook a year-long study of theatre and oral tradition in Nigeria and Ghana.

Upon return to the United States he enrolled in the graduate program at the Yale School of Drama, earning an M.F.A. degree in directing in 1982. Before coming to Williams he was a lecturer in theatre at the University of Bridgeport, a lecturer in Black and Hispanic studies and theatre at SUNY, Oneonta, and an instructor in voice at the Afro-American Studio for Speech and Acting in New York City, including the Negro Ensemble Company, the Black Spectrum Theatre Company, the Ensemble Studio Theatre and the Nat Horne Theater.

He is survived by his mother Lillian Knight of New York City, and his sister Leslie Knight.

A funeral service was held on Saturday, January 2 at St. Augustine's Church in the Bronx. A memorial service for Knight at the college will be announced in the near future.

A Lot of Trouble

Students received a memo before winter break advising them to leave their cars in the Mission Park lot if they planned to leave their cars on campus. Although this letter did not guarantee security for cars left in the Mission Park lot, it implied that cars would be safer there than in other campus lots. On December 27, however, vandals damaged four cars in the lot. This vandalism accompanied a high number of thefts of property from student residences.

Director of Security Ransom Jenks' statement that increasing the number of security officers patrolling the campus would probably not prevent a recurrence of this type of crime makes sense. Effective patrol of the campus demands security devices, rather than people, that can prevent crimes when crimes are attempted.

Dean of the College Stephen Fix said in a letter to the Williams community in December that the college plans to equip all student rooms with strong locks. If students use them, better locks could decrease the number of thefts on campus, but they will not deter vandals from damaging cars.

Although the college suggests that it will protect to some extent the cars left over breaks in the Mission Park lots, that protection consists of security patrols and a locked fence resembling those often found surrounding school playgrounds. A parking lot full of cars in an isolated part of an isolated campus surrounded by an easily-surmountable fence serves more as an invitation to vandals than as a deterrent.

Additions such as a higher fence, an alarm system, or camera recorders that would make illegal entries into the Mission Park lot more difficult deserve the college's examination.

Establishing secure parking lots will become more important when the parking committee presents its report this month. The report is expected to contain recommendations for three parking lots to be located on the periphery of campus. These lots would store cars of students who only plan to drive during vacations. Such storage lots would require the degree of protection now lacking in the Mission Park lot.

If the college pledges to offer security for cars left on campus during breaks, it should actually provide security.

Beware of ice on Park St. at night

To the Editor:
The roadkill has been limited to squirrels. However, on dark nights, when students walk in the road on both sides, that may change. Add ice to the road, and odds are pretty good that people will be hurt. I for one do not want that memory.

School doesn't make it easy for students from west

by Sara Hansen

Williams recently has actively recruited students from around the country and indeed the world in order to develop a more national student body. Even if it were not desirable to increase diversity this way, the college would have little choice as the population of 18 year olds in New York and Massachusetts has fallen by 40 percent since end of the baby boom. The college has been very successful in this endeavor; California has become the third most popular origin for Williams students. Yet many of the administrative decisions of the school continue to be made as if the average student needs no more than to pack up his station wagon and drive a few hours to arrive at school or go back home.

Most recently, the institution of the new fall schedule has shown that the administration does not consider the student from far away to be a significant factor in scheduling plans. For many students the expense of flying home for a nine day vacation so close to Christmas is too much, and many choose not to spend two days of a medium length vacation travelling.

If such a student makes the decision not to travel, he is left with two unattractive options.

First, he can impose upon the hospitality of a friend. Nine days is a long time to stay with a roommate or a friend, especially freshman year when the friendship has not been longstanding.

Second, the student can stay at a deserted campus with facilities either completely closed or with drastically reduced hours.

Clearly, under the old schedule, a student who chose to stay on campus did not have such a long haul. Such a student could more easily visit with friends who live near school. When combined with a longer Christmas vacation as we have had in years past, the old schedule worked much better.

Even under the old calendar certain scheduling decisions considerably inconvenienced distant students. It all starts with Freshmen Days. While it is very nice to have all of the freshmen arrive at the same time, it is virtually impossible to arrive in Williamstown between 9am and 5pm from the west coast due to the time difference and travel time.

In order to arrive at Williams during the required hours, the new freshman has two choices. He can fly in the day before he is supposed to arrive and spend the night at a hotel or he can fly a red-eye. Neither way is a very good way to start college.

I have found out since being at Williams that it is possible to call up the administration and make a special arrangement. Neither I nor any of the other people I knew who were starting Williams ever thought to question a decision of the administration before we had even started our college careers.

The college should simply send a letter to freshmen letting them know that arrangements can be made for them to stay on campus the night before Freshmen Days start if they cannot arrive during the proper times.

On the positive side, arriving on campus at the beginning of the year as an upperclassman is easy. First, the dorms are open for a week before classes start, allowing the student to make his own schedule. Second, security will open a student's door for him at any time of the day or night. I can personally attest to this, having arrived at school at all times, including once at 4:30 in the morning.

Moving on to my next complaint, the registrar should publish the exam schedule much earlier. This has even gotten worse while I have been at Williams. In the fall, it used to come out on the Friday before the Reading Period in October. The schedule has been issued progressively later and was not published until November this year.

Every fall, in anticipation of the Christmas travelling season, plane fares go up. The same happens in the spring in anticipation of the summer season. Furthermore, many airlines have short-term, limited number of seat deals of which students, who know approximately when they are flying months in advance, could take advantage. Many students want to make plane reservations long before the exam schedule is published.

I realize that developing the schedule earlier would present some difficulties to the registrar's office, but the approximate size of most classes must be known before the semester begins. Many colleges print an exam schedule before the semester even starts.

One way of making the scheduling of exams easier would be to have more self-scheduled exams. A policy of self-scheduled exams whenever possible is in keeping with the honor code and has many advantages of which I will not expound upon here.

Lastly, the college makes it very difficult on students who have exams on the last scheduled day. Expecting students to be completely cleared out of their rooms and perhaps all the way to an airport within five hours of their last exam is unreasonable.

Someone suggested to me that instead of fining students who need to stay that extra day, but who leave their rooms clean, the school should fine anyone who leaves their room in a horrible mess.

Under this plan, the school would not have to spend as much time cleaning rooms and students who need to could stay longer in order to move out.

All in all if Williams would change a few administrative details to make life easier for students from far away, it would live up to the image it tries to project of being a college of national scope.

Early admits

The Admissions Office mailed acceptance letters to 147 early decision applicants for the Class of 1992 on December 12. According to Director of Admissions Phillip Smith, this year's early decision applicant pool had higher SAT scores, class ranks, and achievement test scores than any previous applicant pool.

Other features distinguishing this group of early decision applicants are a 50 percent increase in the number of minority applicants and a decrease in the number of students applying for financial aid.

Although the Admissions Office accepted two more minority students early this year than last, the percentage of minority students accepted actually fell due to the large increase in minority applications.

Assistant Director of Admissions Cornelius Ralford attributed the increase to the Admissions Office's aggressive minority recruitment activities. Ralford said that Williams is encouraging alumni to contact high schools with large minority populations and that he and Smith are contacting minority leaders to tell them about Williams.

Seven Asian-American students, five black students and two Hispanic-American students were accepted early decision for the class of 1992.

A decrease in the number of financial aid students applying early decision also characterized this group. Last year, according to Smith, 29 percent of those students admitted early were scheduled to receive financial aid. This year, that number dropped to 20 percent. Ralford said the drop was caused by differences in individual applications rather than a policy change to limit the number of financial aid students. He also noted that the drop does not necessarily indicate a decrease in the amount of money awarded.

Regular admissions decisions will be sent out sometime in early April.

Sports jobs discussed

Williams coaches and graduates stressed the necessity of making job-opening contacts at a panel discussion on opportunities for jobs in sports management and coaching. About fifty students attended the program, entitled "Career Perspectives in Athletics," which featured brief talks by each panel member and then a question-and-answer session.

The panel, sponsored by the Office of Career Counseling, was moderated by Robert Peck, chairman of the department of physical education at Williams. Among the participants were a sports manager, a high school coach, college coach, sports lawyer, and sports physician.

A former player and manager of several sports while at Williams, Mary Kathryn Shea '81 was later hired as an operations assistant by the National Basketball Association. She learned about the job opening through a contact she had made when she worked for the Williams College Sports Information Office.

On finding the right job, Sean Sloan said, "It's not your resume—it's the people you meet, your contacts." Sloan, who has served as men's tennis and squash coach at Williams, will be leaving soon to work for the United States Tennis Association.

David Coughlin '61, a founder and captain of the Williams Rugby Club, now teaches math and coaches varsity swimming and soccer at the Hotchkiss School. One of his main roles as a coach is to be an educator. Using the soccer field and the swimming pool as his classrooms, he said he tries to "shape values and participate actively in the development of [his students] as people."

After unsuccessful tryouts with the Washington Redskins and the New England Patriots, Gregory McAleenan '79 decided to give up a career in football and go to law school. Keeping alive his desire to stay involved in sports, he became active in sports law and began to represent professional athletes. He said that despite the frustration of seeing illegal practices in his profession, he sees positive results coming from his work, mostly in the form of charitable contribution agreements with his clients and their teams.

As the team physician of the Boston Bruins hockey team for 16 years, Dr. E. Wayne Wilkins Jr. '41 has seen lots of cases outside of his specialty, thoracic surgery. Wilkins stayed in the field of sports medicine for 32 years, many of them as the Harvard team physician. Although now retired, he said that the field is wide open because "almost all contact sports require a physician in attendance, and an enormous number of teams need doctors." He advised those interested in sports medicine to specialize in orthopedic surgery and he too stressed the importance of making contact.

Pine Cobble lots to be ready in 18 months

A 212-acre plot of college owned land on Pine Cobble should be ready for development for faculty housing in 18 months, according to College Treasurer William Reed.

"The issue right now has to do with conservation, whether or not any part of the land is considered a wetland," College Treasurer Reed said. Under the Wetlands Protection Act, the college must file a notice of intent with the Conservation Commission if wetland is present. "Our landscape architect doesn't believe any of the land there is wetland. Several members of the conservation committee think it is. It's a question of fact, and we're trying to resolve that issue."

The area in question, according to Conservation Commission Chairperson Harvey Goodell, is at the intersection of Locke Avenue and North Hoosac Road. After a tour of the area and a December 16 hearing, the commission determined that the wetland is almost completely off the college land, but that the college must still file a notice of intent because the wetland will be the major drainage area for the college land.

When a notice of intent is filed, the commission will look at the plans and issue an order of conditions regarding how close fill may be put to the wetland.

These negotiations will lead up to the college's submission of a definitive subdivision plan and an environmental impact statement in February or March, according to Bruce Grinnell, an attorney for the college. Scape Unlimited of Springfield, Massachusetts is preparing the plan. Before the final approval by the planning board, other permits or waivers may need to be obtained.

Calendar opposition

A survey distributed after Thanksgiving break showed that the student body was opposed by at least 2-1 to the present calendar, according to professor Donald Beaver, chairperson of the Calendar and Scheduling Committee.

The situation cannot be improved easily, Beaver said, because of difficulties in planning the calendar. Under the present system, the faculty approves a specific calendar and the college abides by it for two years. The present calendar was ratified in spring of 1986.

But Beaver said if the faculty is as dissatisfied with the calendar as the students are, they could vote this spring to change next year's calendar. The Calendar and Scheduling Committee is going to poll the faculty about the calendar to find out how they feel about it, he said.

Beaver said that the first time the present calendar can be adjusted, without disrupting the current two-year plan, is in May of this year. A calendar planned at that time would go into effect in the fall of 1990. Beaver said he believes that dissatisfaction voiced by both the students and faculty will be addressed and adequately considered in the planning of 1990's schedule.

Beaver acknowledged a desire on the part of students to adjust the calendar prematurely (that is, change next year's calendar this spring) but said that there may be some difficulties because of sports, music and food service schedules that have already been set. "It would be extraordinary, but by no means unprecedented, to change calendars in midstream," Beaver said, explaining that, in the past, the calendar was scheduled and voted on just one year in advance. That process has been replaced by the two-year scheme which allows for long-range planning of college activities, he said.

Beaver and the scheduling committee are going to act on the results of the student-opinion poll immediately, however. According to Beaver, the faculty is going to be informally polled to see if there is "enough dissatisfaction to go through the hassle of changing the calendar." If the faculty is as dismayed with the plan as the students are, Beaver said, the faculty can vote this spring to change next year's calendar. The faculty would choose between keeping the present calendar or instituting one much like last year's calendar. He said the form of the calendar would not be open for debate.

If the faculty is not enthusiastic about changing next year's calendar, they will vote in the spring on the calendar for the fall of 1990.

Smith Fellows

The Faculty Committee on Graduate Fellowships has announced the award of Herchel Smith Fellowships for two years of graduate study in England to five Williams seniors. The fellowships, established in 1979 by Dr. Herchel Smith, a retired organic chemist, are to Emmanuel College in Cambridge where Smith received his doctoral degree.

The five students, Mary Caverden, William Connick, Francine Davis, Michael Dawson, and Anne Mallory will receive living, educational and travel expenses for their two years at Cambridge.

They were missing from his room. Tewksbury told security that he had locked his door before he left campus for vacation. Jenks said that security could find no evidence of forced entry into his room.

Sarah Pierce '88, who lives at 81 Hoxsey St., reported stolen two stereo speakers worth $129. She also said that she had locked the room before leaving for vacation, but security found no sign of forced entry, Jenks said.

John Hall '89 told security that a Technics stereo receiver worth $200 had been stolen from the office of the campus radio station's music director.

Zolto said that there is always a possibility that many of the crimes were committed by the same group of people. "We feel we have some good leads, and through developing these leads, we have some good suspects," he said.

building and sprayed a room with fire extinguisher chemicals.

— The same day at 12:16 p.m., police received a report of break-ins into four student cars parked in the Mission Park parking lot.

According to Jenks, nothing has been reported stolen from the buildings where break-ins occurred over the four day period. But three students reported items of stereo equipment missing when they returned from vacation, Jenks said.

David Tewksbury '88, a resident of Sewall House, told security that a turntable, a graphic equalizer, a compact disc player, about 30 compact discs and other stereo equipment

Wesleyan

Williams is not the only school concerned about building security. At Wesleyan University, the office of public safety has announced new measures which come as a response to several break-ins last fall. Alarms in the exits of all buildings, wired to go off if a door is kept ajar, have now been programmed to work all year, whereas formerly they were only employed during breaks. In addition, many doors have been reinforced. While students are apparently pleased with the new measures, some have discussed additional steps, including hiring a professional security agency to patrol dorm lobbies late at night and installing a public phone outside the dorms so students can identify visitors.

Middlebury

At Middlebury College, there is one commodity so precious that students often must hoard it in their rooms: Coca-Cola. Campus vending machines and even the school snack bar only serve Pepsi, much to the chagrin of many students, who fill their refrigerators with Coke and Diet Coke. According to the school's Director of Operations George Whitney, the college has had a long-standing relationship with Pepsi, primarily because the company offers lower vending fees and provides better repair service than its big competitor. Coke has attempted in the past to break Pepsi's Middlebury monopoly, but without success. Whitney has not yet received any complaints from students, but he said, "I'm not sure they would come to me. I'm sure there are some students who think we should be vending Burt's & Jaymes."

North Adams State College

As the crackdown on underage drinking continues across Massachusetts, both students and administrators of North Adams State College have been trying to change the school's reputation as a drinking school. In the past, NASC has been said to stand for "Not A Serious College" and "Non-Alcoholics Shouldn't Come." Lately, however, parties have become noticeably smaller and quieter, replacing the wild beer bash as the staple of the NASC social scene. According to the Vice-President of Student Affairs Robert Maust, there have been less arrests and complaints than in previous years, as more students accept the 21-year old drinking age. Also, he added, NASC students in the past few years have shown more concern for academics. "There has been a major change in the observable behavior of the students," Maust said.

Bryn Mawr—Haverford

Williams' recent number one ranking in the U.S. News and World Report survey of liberal arts colleges has drawn a lot of fire from college administrators nationwide, even those from schools which were ranked highly in the survey. Although Bryn Mawr and Haverford were placed among the top liberal arts colleges in the country, both college presidents blasted the survey. Bryn Mawr was ranked as a liberal arts school this year, although classified as a university in 1985, much to the dismay of President Mary Patterson MacPherson. Although she participated in the survey of college administrators, she said she would have joined an Amherst-led boycott of the survey had she been aware of it beforehand. Haverford Acting President Hank Payne also participated in the survey, but he complained that "it's one of the media's ways of tallying higher education... Many of us find it a little tacky."

Assefa discusses her role as Bolin Fellow

by Alex Oh

Many people think of the Caribbean as a place for rest and relaxation. Shanti Assefa thinks of it as a place for revolutions. Assefa, who grew up in Jamaica during the Jamaican Independence Movement, now studies the Haitian influence on the French Revolution.

One of the two current Bolin fellows now in residence at Williams, Assefa graduated from Swarthmore College and is now working on her Ph.D. in History at Princeton University.

The Bolin Fellowship is a grant offered by Williams College to minority graduate students from all over the country who are at work on Ph.D. programs.

Williams requires her to teach a one semester course which will be History 307, "The Old Regime and the French Revolution," in the spring. During the fall semester, she concentrated mainly on finishing her dissertation, entitled "Maupeou Revolution: Public Opinion and Popular Protest in Paris, 1770-1774."

Assefa described her research as "a study of popular history." In her investigation of pre-revolutionary opposition to the French monarchy, tyranny and despotism, Assefa used a cross-cultural approach to history, considering many different aspects of an event in history, rather than simply concentrating on one particular aspect. In other words, according to Assefa, there is more than a mere political history to the events leading up to the French Revolution; cultural and socio-economic reasons should be considered.

Assefa said she researches many different types of sources, such as illegal pamphlets, police documents, libel songs and personal journals to gather her information. This type of research allows her to see the Maupeou Revolution as a crisis that served as a precedent for the French Revolution.

From Ann Arbor to Jamaica Assefa's interest in history and political events corresponds to her upbringing. Born in Ann Arbor, Michigan, and raised in Jamaica, she sees herself as racially Sri Lankan, culturally Jamaican, and nationally American. Her stay in

Dog days haunt campus all year long

by Rob Weisberg

You don't know who they are. You don't know where they come from. They roam the campus, sometimes alone, sometimes in pairs, roving the lawns, sitting in on team practices, going to parties. While the Williams mascot is the purple cow, this campus' grounds belong to... the dogs.

Although the school can hardly be described as suffering from a plague of canines, few students cannot recall having seen one of the several dogs that are often found on campus, usually without an owner. Some dogs seem like permanent residents; others appear once in a long while and stay around for a few fleeting minutes, only to disappear as quickly as they came.

Dogs of intellectual pursuit attend classes; Ellen Hightstone '91 reported a geology class with two visiting dogs; "There was a dogfight right at my feet." Classes are not the only place that the dogs make appearances. While leading a tour, Jeff Eteward '89 saw eight different dogs, in locations ranging from the rear of Baxter Hall to the science quad. A shaggy black dog followed a student home late one night, lagging behind and then reappearing, almost supernaturally, in front of her. His ability, along with his aura of malevolence, caused her to nickname the dog "Satan."

"A people dog"

One sophomore said that a

Hispanic students view Williams through Vista

by Ann Mantil

"Vista" is a Spanish word meaning "sight" or "vision." It is also the name of the Hispanic student organization at Williams. "It seemed to fit," said Rebecca Salazar '89, one of Vista's founders. "One of our goals is being kind of a window through which the community views Hispanics."

Vista was formed last year. Twelve people attended the first meeting. "We were very small, but very dedicated," Salazar said. "I don't think size is what matters—it's the amount of dedication of the group as a whole."

One of Vista's projects involves increasing the number of incoming Hispanic freshmen. Last year members worked in the Admissions Office to recruit Hispanic students from different areas of the country. The class of 1991 includes 22 Hispanic students.

"We're from very diverse backgrounds. Some of us can integrate easily into the community, while others don't feel comfortable right away," said Salazar.

called it 'Cujo.'" Students have seen this canine from one end of the campus to the other, grabbing frisbees, running with joggers, and just lounging.

This well traveled animal does in fact have a permanent home. It belongs to a local resident, who asked to remain anonymous. "I'm not happy when he wanders around," she said, noting the local leash law, "but he'll be at home and he'll decide it's time to go out and he'll be gone—zoom! He's a people dog; he wants to be where the action is."

Cujo is not the only famous dog on campus. Kevin Ellingwood '89 often keeps his dog Gretzky with him in his suite in Mission Park. This arrangement is convenient because Ellingwood's home is just off campus, behind Dodd House. "Gretzky hasn't been that prominent until this year; he just followed me... He made the decision to stay at Mission instead of at home," he said.

purchasing and installing that system was between $300,000-$450,000.

Complicated program

Fowler and Fix said that the program is a complicated one. Each dormitory has to be assessed individually because each one has different problems, according to Assistant Supervisor of Buildings and Trades Bruce Decoteau.

This summer, work will begin on Mission Park and Lehman Hall. Denner, Mills and Lehman halls are likely to be closed all summer. In Mission Park, the college will also be recarpeting and painting.

Mission Park and Lehman

Hall have particularly weak locks, according to Decoteau. In many cases, not only the locks but also the frame and doors will have to be replaced, he said. The locks will be replaced with a deadbolt system. The repairs could cost the college $1,000 per door, Fowler said.

It could be several years before Mission Park is completed, according to Fix, though Lehman should be finished this summer. Plans for other dorms have yet to be completed. Some, such as Tyler and Greylock, will probably not need a lot of work, Fowler said.

Whether these changes will actually improve security seems uncertain. "I think it will improve marginally," said Assistant Dean William Wagner. "I say marginally because some people just will not lock their door. My sense is that that's a sizable percentage of the population."

Director of Security Ransom Jenks said "There's some question in my mind whether we can convince students to lock doors."

The Committee on Undergraduate Life (CUL) plans to launch a program to educate the Williams community about locking their doors. Olga Beaver, chairperson of the CUL, said they are looking at how other institutions are dealing with similar problems. According to Beaver, education efforts could include distributing brochures during Freshman orientation, though the committee has yet to make any specific proposals.

Sweet Honey has plenty of spice

by Eric Hanson

The expression of pain, indignation, and pride in black American music has a beauty and richness that is at once comforting and unsettling. This dual nature is rarely as effectively and powerfully expressed as it was by Sweet Honey in the Rock in its sold-out performance Saturday night in Chaplin Hall. The Washington, D.C.-based female vocal quintet presented over two hours of emotional music, singing songs whose politically and socially charged themes ranged from national liberation struggles to AIDS victims to lesbianism.

Bernice Johnson Reagon, the group's spokesperson and a founding member of the 14-year old group, maintained a warm but firm relationship with the audience throughout the performance, this duality playing an essential role in Sweet Honey's artistic philosophy and perhaps explaining their growing appeal to racially-mixed audiences. The group invites the audience into their communal spirit, but with the strict and inescapable requirement of intense self-examination.

"As an artist," Reagon explained in an interview prior to the concert, "I have learned to not expect anything from a performance and to be prepared to be taught by what that experience has to teach me. If you're not closed about whom you're speaking to," she continued, "then you find out who you're speaking to."

There was plenty such "speaking" accomplished in Saturday's performance, which was attended by a predominantly white and receptive audience. The group opened with a Reagon arrangement of the biblical Beatitudes that featured the lead vocals of 13-year veteran Evelyn Harris, a second soprano/first alto singer with a smooth, rich voice that can also blt. Harris was equally impressive in her chilling performance of "State of Emergency," an original composition which featured piercing walls simulating sirens of alarm.

Such onomatopoeia constantly enhances Sweet Honey's music. During the concert, one almost forgot that it was an a capella performance—the amazing versatility, in terms of both range and timbre, of the women's voices coupled with the relentless rhythmic pulse of their singing, which was frequently accompanied by foot-stomping, hand-clapping, and the playing of the shekere, a traditional African percussion instrument, all combined to produce a very full and intense musical effect. The a capella setting, therefore, becomes not a limitation but rather a liberating force, allowing the group to supplement their singing in exciting and original ways.

The quintet's music is at once both a celebration and a lament of the black experience in America that incorporates many different aspects of their musical tradition. The blues, work songs, spirituals, and gospel music are the foundation of Sweet Honey's repertoire. They sing all these styles with a vibrancy that establishes one constant thread running through this incredibly varied repertoire, which ranges from their soothing communion spiritual, to the rousing and insistent "Feel Something Drawing Me On," featuring Aisha Kahlil's lead vocals. Kahlil, who joined the group in 1981, also stunned the audience with her performance in Georgia White's "Your Worries Ain't Like Mine," a personal blues, in which the growling, sassy

ARTS IN VIEW

On Friday, January 15, The Williams College Museum of Art will hold a preview reception for the exhibition A.K. McCallum and F. Andrus Burr: Architectural Projects 1985-87 from 4:30-6 PM. Work in progress: the public may witness the completion process of William Ramage's contribution to the WALLWORKS series at WCMA, which will be finished on January 22. As part of a series commemorating the life of Martin Luther King Jr., an interfaith celebration of King's life and work will take place in Thompson Memorial Chapel on Sunday at 4:00 PM, and will feature speakers, music performed by the Williams Gospel Choir and members of the Jazz Ensemble, as well as readings from King's letters, essays, and sermons. Also on Sunday at 8:00 PM, in Brooks-Rogers Recital Hall, Otha Day, lecturer in music at Williams, will speak on classical music by black composers. On Tuesday, January 19, the Gospel Choir of the Second Congregational Church in Pittsfield, and the nationally-acclaimed folk singer, David Grover, will present a concert in tribute to Dr. King in Brooks-Rogers. Salazar said she is optimistic about the organization's future. "It's a slow, steady process of development. The co-founders are hoping that it will take a permanent shape and last beyond when we graduate. We want members to be both independent—not dependent on the founders—and interdependent on each other. I can definitely see that kind of cohesiveness happening."

officials seemed to indicate that the college was not prepared to wait for funding for MassMoCA in the next legislative session.

Oakley said in a prepared statement. "Clearly we are very disappointed with the failure of the legislature to pass the Convention Center Bill. Certainly, here at the college, where the whole project has absorbed an enormous amount of time and energy, we must now turn our attention to the other pressing challenges confronting us as an educational institution."

Turn around

But things seemed to turn around Wednesday when Dukakis said that he would issue a special message to grant funds to MassMoCA. In this way, the bill would be filed directly in the House.

"The North Adams bill is a very special case where I hope we can move quickly," the governor said. "We have a terrific opportunity out there in North Adams to take the old Sprague mills and transform them into what may well be the finest contemporary art museum in the world."

Susan Kaplan, a representative from the Governor's Press Office, said that it was likely that the bill would be filed in the House today. She said that the governor had met with the Senate President and with the Speaker of the House to be sure of their support for the measure.

Representative Sherwood Guernsey (D-Williamstown) said "I was absolutely elated [about the special message] because the fear was not that the museum funding wouldn't pass, but that with this project we couldn't wait..."

Tradition

When asked how he thinks other legislators will react to the special message, Guernsey said "There is a tradition in the Legislature to support projects in other legislators' districts."

Legislators from across the state were expecting funding for projects in their districts from the Convention Centers Bill. The special message would only provide funding for MassMoCA, and, according to Guernsey, legislators will not be able to amend it to include funding for other projects. Guernsey said he will assure these legislators that he will support the new Convention Centers Bill when it is submitted in the 1988 legislative session.

Fred Windover, Deputy General Counsel of Sprague Technologies Inc., said that his company has no immediate plans for the buildings the museum would occupy. Windover said, "We wouldn't take any hasty action in the short term that would preclude the project." Although he acknowledged the fact that other companies have expressed an interest in the buildings, he said that Sprague will wait "a reasonable amount of time" before acting.

College Treasurer William Reed said that Sprague will probably be willing to wait 30 days for funding for the project. He said that if state funding is granted, a five person board will be created that will own the buildings and the land and administer the finances of the museum. Reed added that the board could contract Williams College to oversee management and other functions.

soprano challenged the audience to "match" the depth of her troubles. Finally, Kahlil shined in the multi-layered "Dream Song."

The group's musical scope, however, is by no means limited to American sources, incorporating elements of the traditions of the wider black community such as black Africans and the people of the "Island" nations such as Jamaica. The heritage of the former was paid tribute to by the West African call-and-response song Danko, which featured the talents of the group's newest member, soprano Nitanju Bolad, whose cutting voice became seductively sweet and lilting in the group's "Lament" and even assumed the role of a vocal conga drum in the AIDS song. This type of versatility is shared by contralto/bass vocalist

Ysaye Maria Barnwell, whose powerful lead vocals on "O Lord Hold My Hand" and "Now That the Buffalo's Gone" were complemented by her steady bass lines that anchor the group's harmonies.

But Sweet Honey is much more than a vocal ensemble, and Saturday's performance was not "merely" musical. The quintet preached to the audience, arguing the cause of the oppressed and misunderstood, and squarely confronting the injustices that perpetuate such political and social conditions. "There are a lot of things in this world that need changing," Reagon told the audience. The current American involvement in the Nicaraguan war is one of these "things" and is just one aspect of the international responsibility that, Reagon argues, belongs to all citizens, an attitude expressed in the group's "Ode to the International Debt."

Sweet Honey aims to open not only ears with their music, but eyes as well, with the aid of seven year group veteran Shirley Childress Johnson, whose graceful sign language interpretation was as pleasing to the eye as it was considerate to the deaf members of the group's following.

From the reassurance of songs such as "Midnight Special," to the harsh and provocative criticisms of both blacks and whites in the almost overwhelming "Letter to Martin," the quintet alternately (and frequently simultaneously) soothes and confronts the listener, creating a feeling of increased awareness through intense self-examination. And with the unique combination of the quality of a top-notch vocal ensemble with the intimacy of a church service that the group's performance reflected, Sweet Honey is bound to have continued success.

This is, however, a violation of the college's pet policy, which is "no pets." Ellingwood said, "The head of housing and security has been trying to get him out through a dog catcher. The janitors don't know him. He barks at anybody he doesn't know." This situation is not a problem with students, he added. "Everyone at Mission knows him. No one that I've heard of wants him out. He never goes into the dining hall; he just sits at the top of the stairs."

Ellingwood said that Gretzky's only problems have come with other dogs, "but overall he's a really mellow dog. Even at loud parties he always wags his tail and even drinks a little beer out of cups. Once I put a tie on him, and he went to some semi-formals."

Pets on campus staying in dormitories is no laughing matter for the college. The present pet policy went into effect back in 1981-82, according to Dean of the pets as well as the students, he said. "The animals may be left over vacations in locked rooms, some people may have allergies to the pet or just may not like to have animals in the dorm. There are also public standards that the dormitories have to conform to," he said.

As far as actual cases of pets being removed from dorms, Flx said that a few pets have been caught over the last couple of years, but that none of these were dogs. "We've removed cats, gerbils, and small animals like that. The policy is well understood. . . . We are not aware of dogs causing any particular problem on campus. If there's just a report of a dog down on the soccer field, one doesn't get all hot and bothered about these things," he said.

Most students who commented on the dogs' presence did not have a problem with the canines. According to Wilson Clements '91, who had a dog come into his suite's common room and play with a tennis ball, "We had a great time; it played with all of us. I love dogs. I don't know anyone who doesn't."

Professor of Religion Mark Taylor said he thinks the Williams Bookstore should be improved. He said he has to go to Amherst to find interesting new books in his field.

incongruity of having a multimillion dollar athletic complex next to an insufficient bookstore. "If we are supposed to be the top liberal arts college in the country, not having an adequate bookstore is a disgrace."

"I repeatedly hear of problems with the bookstore from my students," Taylor added. One professor, who asked not to be identified, said he would not have survived as a student if he had had to use the Williams Bookstore. This professor said the bookstore under-orders books, sends back extra books too soon, and has a limited stock.

The store is allowed to mark book prices up a certain amount because of an eight year-old agreement with the college. Dewey said the markup was necessary for him to stay in business. He said students who believe they were overcharged on a book can look at his invoice.

According to Dewey, he has received no complaints about lateness or book shortages. He said that he has not had complaints about the stock, but in fact he has had compliments from visitors.

Other students and professors questioned said they have experienced no problems and some professors said the committee formed a few years ago to address the problems has been effective.

Taylor said, "My sense of the matter is that the steps that were taken were basically a band-aid solution." Taylor said that he believes much of the problem is town-gown relations: Williams does not want to upset the local merchants. Reed said that he did not know if a better bookstore was possible unless Williams subsidized it. He expressed doubts about the college's ability to run a bookstore and said he thought it would be expensive. According to Reed, Williamstown is too small and isolated to support a bookstore with a larger stock.

Women's Track sweeps tri-meet

All-American track star Dawn MacAuley '89 clears the fence on her way to a hurdles victory.

by Mariam Naficy

Displaying depth and endurance, the women's winter track team ran to a resounding victory over Union and Hamilton at the first official meet of the season, held Saturday at Towne Field House. Williams finished with a score of 86, leaving Union and Hamilton far behind with scores of 43 and 27, respectively.

Runners who took first place in their individual events were: Co-Captain Sarah Pierce '88, 3000m; Dawn MacAuley '88, hurdles and 500m; Anne Platt

Outlook

To those who have followed the team's progress and carry-over from the strong cross-country season, Saturday's win came as no surprise. Coach Pete Farwell commented, "We have a very strong team, so I was pretty confident we would win." Farwell pointed to the team's depth, noting that 21 different people scored points toward the Eph victory. The Ephwomen will not compete again until the January 23 Tufts invitational.

Male harriers caught in first meet at home

by Carey Simon

The men's track team placed third in a tri-meet Saturday against Hamilton and Union at Towne Field House. In the fiercely contested meet, the injury-depleted Williams men finally bowed to the first-place Continentals and runner-up Dutchmen. The final standings, Hamilton 64, Union 58, and Williams 50 were in doubt until the last relays.

Despite the loss there were several high caliber individual performances. Kenneth Alleyne '88 placed first in the long jump and second in the triple jump. Freshman Steve Moran took second in both the pole vault and the long jump, with classmate Jason Zimba taking third in the long jump. Zimba was also active in a fine Eph showing in the 55 meter hurdles, as he took a close second behind senior captain Scott Purdy in a Williams 1-2 sweep.

Another freshman, Sal Vasi, showed some mental tenacity and excellent potential in a third place finish in the 500 meter dash. Senior Ted Arrowsmith ran two fantastic races against superb competition in the 1500 and 1000 meters and was barely nipped in both to finish in second place. Sophomores Carey Simon and Mike Simpson also performed well. Simon won the 400 meter dash and ran a strong leg in the subsequent relay, and Simpson took second in the 35 pound hammerthrow and fourth in the shotput.

The Williams men have the nucleus of what could be a very good team as newcomers develop and veterans return. The next meet is scheduled for Saturday at home against Albany St. at 1:00 p.m.

Ephs probably should have beaten. "We didn't play hard," the coach said. "I thought we played poorly." Most distressing for the team was its poor execution and shot selection.

Sheehy was quite encouraged by the continuing good play of freshman Healy, who led the Ephs with 17 points. "He equalled their big guy, Sylvia, who we were worried about. We came away even at center tonight," Sheehy said. "The difference was that we couldn't match the quickness of the two guards, particularly Amalbert, who handled every kind of press we threw at him." Melchionni added 16 points and Major 15 points for Williams, while Kelly paced the Chiefs with 23.

On Thursday, the Ephs accomplished something that no Williams team had for 12 years: They beat Hamilton. The Ephmen displayed a gutsy performance and good execution to

We here at the Record, and particularly in the Sports section, have to try hard to avoid letting our status as students affect our reporting of the goings-on about campus. However, that should not and will not stop me from giving much deserved credit to the organizers of Intramural athletics at Williams, both students and staff.

Many schools have intramural athletics in which students participate on the basis of dormitory or fraternity and sorority houses. Despite its small size, Williams outdoes almost everyone in its intramural offerings, and this is particularly evident during this time of Winter Study. Granted, Winter Study is the perfect time for IM sports, but that does not diminish the superb efforts of the athletic department in this area.

Students can participate in basketball and hockey in either house leagues or Sunday night leagues, and broomball has a house league and a Winter Carnival tournament. These are all held in addition to the varied offering in Physical Education classes. While students organize and run many of the activities of these leagues, they still represent an added drain on the school and staff resources.

These leagues provide the perfect opportunity for the ex-athlete or non-athlete to experience the thrill of competition on several different skill levels, as well as to allow interaction of the various houses on campus. Not everyone can play varsity basketball or hockey, and the varied leagues allow both former varsity players and those who have never touched a ball or laced up skates before to play against competition on their own level.

I do not mean to imply that scheduling difficulties and similar problems do not still exist, or that it is possible to please everyone, but the athletic staff does go out of its way to allow everyone to be able to compete. Often the staff at the hockey rink stay until late at night, after putting in long days, sometimes just so a group of people can finish a pickup game.

Dave Clawson '89, who with Jim Duquette '88 manages the Sunday Night Basketball League, commented, "Jim and I take a lot of pride in the fact that this is really a good league, (with many) excellent players and good competition." The league's increased applicant pool and its size increases since its inception speak for its popularity and high level of play. Although the Budweiser Athlete of the Week will probably never be selected from the IM ranks, IMs do make Winter Study much more fun.

pull away from the Continentals in the second half. Behind 53-49 with 9:00 left in the game, Williams went on a strong 10-2 run, highlighted by Sophomore Mike Butler's 6 points, that gave them a 59-55 lead which they never relinquished.

Big Dave Morrison '90 scored three consecutive baskets for the Ephs that gave them a comfortable 67-58 lead with 5:31 left in the game. Good defense by Williams in the closing minutes limited Hamilton to long bombs which infrequently connected. Bill Melchionni controlled the boards down the stretch as he tallied 10 for the game. Major continued to lead Williams, scoring 25 points. Melchionni chipped in 16 points and 8 assists, falling just short of a triple-double.

In action before Christmas break, the Ephs dropped a tough one to a good North Adams team, 104-99 in 2 OTs. Major turned in an outstanding performance in a losing effort, scoring 49 points for Williams.

The team plays home against RPI on Tuesday at 4:30 and hosts archival Amherst on Saturday at 8:00.

Undefeated women's hoops edge Panthers

The women's basketball team extended its season-long winning streak to six games by wearing down a physical Middlebury squad, 63-61, despite the absence of injured captain Nancy Hedeman '89. Hedeman, the team's leading rebounder and a consistent scorer, injured her ankle in practice on Friday and was unable to play in the Middlebury game. This left the Ephs weaker under the boards and with only one day to prepare without their captain.

Coach Nancy Roberts employed a quicker lineup for much of the game, counting on the Ephs' productive fast break to neutralize Middlebury's inside advantage. This strategy paid off in the second half when the Ephs came back from a seven point deficit to go ahead with under ten minutes remaining. Roberts switched from a man-to-man to a 1-3-1 half court zone.

The new defense forced several turnovers and allowed Joyce Rogers '88 and Megan King '91 to feed Christine Cadigan '91 downcourt for several quick fast break baskets.

Coaching strategy

Roberts said, "We were being beaten out on the offensive boards so we switched to the zone from the man-to-man and played really tough defense. We won the game on sheer determination in that stretch."

Roberts utilized her team's depth and many players had solid games. Rebecca Borden and Meg Brown each grabbed eight rebounds though both were plagued by foul trouble. Cadigan scored 21 points and dished out four assists. Missy Crouchley '89 made two clutch free throws on a one-and-one with only a minute remaining to give the Ephs a four point lead and seal the win.

The team is now a relatively unexpected 6-0, and Coach Roberts is pleased with her team's performance thus far this season.

"I'm really excited about being 6-0. Yesterday (Saturday) was a good win because Nancy was hurt and I thought we would be cobwebbish after the break. We only had 24 hours to get psychologically ready to play without Nancy and I was proud of the way we worked through it," said Roberts.

The team hosts Hamilton Wednesday and Amherst on Saturday, probably with Hedeman back in the line-up.

by Michael P. O'Malley

Fresh from the sand and sun of their Florida training trip, the Williams men's and women's swimming teams beat the squads from Hamilton College on Saturday in Williams-town. The men won 183-45, while the women took the day 144-122.

Chris Cleurzo '90, Evan Davis '89, and Dan Snyder '90 started the men's campaign with wins in the 100 backstroke, breaststroke, and butterfly races respectively. Rob Benson '90 won the 1000 freestyle, which was followed by Michael O'Malley's '89 win in the 200 freestyle.

After a semester in Sweden and only five days' practice, sprint ace David Brown '89 won both the 50 and 100 freestyle races. Senior Mark Canuel scored an impressive win in the 200 IM, displaying some "outside smoke" in lane seven. Doug Northrop '89 won the 200 fly, Cleurzo won the 200 back, and Snyder returned to win the 500 freestyle, followed closely by O'Malley and Dave Cantor '89, who thus completed the awe-inspiring "Iron Cross"—the 1000 free, the 200 fly, and the 500 free.

Davis won the 200 breaststroke, while divers Bryan Cameron '89 and Scott Schwager '91 split the uncontested diving events — Cameron won the 1 meter, Schwager took the 3 meter. Saturday's slaughter brings the Ephmen's record to 3-1. Next Saturday they will challenge the Minutemen of UMASS in Amherst.

The women's meet began with a Williams win in the 200 medley relay, followed by freshman Allison Furniss's second place in the 1000 freestyle. Freshmen Dori LeBeau and Caron Whitaker outswam their Hamilton rivals in the 100 back and 200 fly respectively, and Lee Schroeder '91 continued her winning ways, sprinting to first in both the 50 and 100 freestyle races.

Divers Kathia Vanderveene '91, Janet Wiener '89, and Ashley Clarey '91 finished 1-2-3 in both diving events, leaving 500 freestyler Michelle Freemer '90 and the 400 freestyle relay team of Freemer, Schroeder, Lebeau, and Anne MacEachern '90 to lock up the meet with big wins in their races. The women's record now stands at 3-1, and they will also meet UMASS next weekend.

During the exam period, both teams beat the Cardinals of Wesleyan with victories of more than fifty points. Strong showings in the distance freestyle races were instrumental at that meet, with good swims by Benson, Michael Lane '90, Freemer, and Snyder.

While in Florida, Eph swimmers swam against more than 600 swimmers from around the US in the annual ocean mile swim, placing among the top swimmers in the collegiate category.

5-2 men's b-ball readies for Jeffs

by Mike Harrington

The men's basketball team put in a lackluster performance on Saturday night and lost to Springfield 87-74 at the John Chandler Gymnasium. The loss leaves the Ephs with a 5-2 record, as they beat Hamilton 83-77 Thursday and lost a double OT heartbreaker to North Adams State before Christmas, 104-99.

The contest with the Chiefs was a seesaw battle in the first half, with Springfield, behind the scoring of Ramses Kelly, twice pulling away to a comfortable lead only to see Williams fight back. Down 29-22, the Ephmen rallied behind two Bill Melchionni '89 hoops to even the score at 29 apiece. In response, Springfield rolled off three unanswered baskets, and at halftime led 41-35.

Williams came out pressuring the Chiefs in the second half, but Springfield's leading scorer, 6'8" John Sylvia, came to life on the defensive end, blocking eight shots for the night. Kelly and Eph guard Garcia Major '90 traded hoops before the Chiefs went on a 5-0 spurt that gave them a 64-54 lead with 10 minutes to play.

The Eph defense then picked up its intensity, creating two turnovers, and Melchionni followed a driving basket by Major with a three-pointer to cut the lead to 64-61.

After a Springfield timeout, Than Healy '91 scored down low to cut the lead to one, but Sylvia responded with a slam dunk. Junior Mike Masters converted a beautiful steal into a layup that again made the margin one, but Williams never got closer.

Springfield pulls away

Springfield's point guard Derek Amaibert controlled the ballgame after that, scoring two baskets in a row and eluding the Eph's full court pressure for the remaining three minutes. A close game then became a blow-out, as Williams consistently missed three-point attempts and the Chiefs made their foul shots.

Coach Harry Sheehy was visibly upset at the squad's performance against a team the Men's Hockey felled; hosts Midd tonight

by Ted Hobart

The men's hockey team paid the price for not playing a full sixty minutes of hockey on Saturday night at Holy Cross, as a five minute lapse early in the second period cost the Ephs the game and dropped their overall record to a disappointing 2-7.

Freshman Sean Seguin's goal early in the second period, on a beautiful feed by Ron Van Belle '90, tied the game at 1-1 after Holy Cross had scored the only goal in the evenly played first period. "After we tied it up, everybody let down," commented senior captain Dave Caswell. "They picked it up when we let down."

Holy Cross increased the intensity of their attack following that tying goal, and had the Ephs back on their heels. From the 4:07 mark until 9:35 of the second period, the Crusaders found the Eph nets four times, including two goals from their scoring leader Mike Germain '88. The confused Ephs were unable to backcheck or clear the zone effectively against the hard-charging Crusaders, who spent almost all of that spurt in the Williams defensive zone.

Revival

Trailing 5-1, the Eph squad came to life in the last phase of the second period, as Van Belle fed Will Putnam '89 on a two-on-two rush up ice, and Putnam beat the Holy Cross netminder high to cut the deficit to three goals. For Van Belle, who led the team in points last year, it was his second assist of the night and fifth in two games, increasing his team leading total to eight goals and ten assists.

At the beginning of the third period, the Crusaders again came out strong, and only several outstanding saves by goaltender Matt Zolin '91 kept the Ephs' hopes alive. The third period was by far the most action-packed, as the teams exchanged end-to-end rushes and hard hitting. At 10:44 of the final period, Mike Swenson '89 broke his personal scoring drought as he one-timed a pass from Rob Abel '91 and beat the goalie on the far post from a sharp angle.

Too little, too late

Swenson's goal cut the Holy Cross lead to 5-3 and brightened the prospects of the team, but it was to be the only goal of the period as Holy Cross' suddenly conservative game plan and the officials' inconsistency dashed the Ephs' chances. Holy Cross played strong defense in center ice and rarely ventured far into the offensive zone in the game's final stages.

The loss drops the team to 1-6 in the ECAC East Conference and 2-7 overall. Last Thursday night, the squad scored an impressive conference win over Westfield State, as seven different players netted goals for the Ephs. Captain Caswell had two goals, Putnam a goal and two assists, and Van Belle added three assists in the winning effort.

With that win the team bounced back from back to back conference losses on Sunday and Monday nights. On Sunday night, the squad lost to Salem State 4-2, an empty-net goal at the end of the game finally clinching the victory in the tightly contested battle. Against St. Anselm's the next night, the squad put out a poor effort in the 5-2 loss.

Tonight the squad faces traditional rival Middlebury in their first home action in 1988.

Council will monitor how groups spend $

by Bill Savadove

The College Council unanimously passed a proposal calling for a standing rule to monitor the use of council budget allocations at its meeting last week.

The council also discussed the use of Sawyer Library for self-scheduled examinations and heard an update on athletics issues.

Under the new standing rule, all members of the College Council finance committee (fincom) will be assigned to monitor the ways in which organizations that receive funds from the council spend their allocated money.

The rule for budget allocations stipulates that fincom monitors will prepare a report detailing the amount of money allocated to each organization, how much of the money was spent over the course of a year and how successfully each organization spends its money in order to fulfill its role on campus as stated in its budget request.

For publications, the monitors will report whether or not the publication produced its proposed number of issues, whether or not the publication solicited submissions from an appropriate portion of the campus community and whether or not the publication relied on large illustrations or graphic techniques to replace a lack of substantive written work.

The reports will be used in determining the council's budget allocation for each organization. The council usually allocates the Student Activities Tax to campus organizations in October.

An explanatory sheet attached to the proposal for the standing rule cited a lack of year-to-year communication between council treasurers and fincom members about the spending patterns of individual organizations as a reason the rule is needed.

"Such an evaluation creates an efficient expenditure record for use in the preparation of council budgets and provides a continuum in the finance committee's oversight of the purposefulness in each organization's spending habits," the sheet said.

Publications

The sheet singles out campus publications as an area where greater fincom oversight could help in funding decisions.

"Publications, in particular, seemed to have an almost indiscriminate access to the council's money which could be had, in the opinion of some, just for the asking."

Council secretary Trace Blankenship '89 said at the meeting, "The (fincom) monitor can encourage the organization to strengthen its objectives."

Council president Carter Zinn '88 reported to the council on athletics issues. He said that Robert Peck, the chairperson of the physical education department, has issued a new policy concerning rotation of playing field use by women's and men's sports teams. According to Zinn, women's and men's teams will alternate with each other between morning and afternoon use of fields.

Athletics

Zinn also said that a member of the athletic department will be establishing a rotation schedule for the purchase of new uniforms. The council is also seeking to establish a group to handle athletic issues, Zinn said.

The council discussed the use of Sawyer Library for self-scheduled examinations. Members said the library is too crowded, too noisy and too distracting. David Mochel '88 said, "You spend about 15 minutes trying to find a spot." Bronfman Science Center has been mentioned by the Dean's office as an alternative location for the exams, according to Zinn.

Honor and Discipline Committee chairperson Blair Newton '89 said, "All of the professors need to be more explicit on how the honor code applies to self-scheduled exams."

Krens will leave WCMA to direct Guggenheim

by Scott J. O'Callaghan

Thomas Krens, director of the Williams College Museum of Art (WCMA), announced his appointment as director of the Solomon R. Guggenheim Foundation last Tuesday. He will leave his current position as college museum director on June 30, 1988 and will assume his new position July 1, 1988.

W. Rod Faulds, who is currently the museum's assistant director, will become the museum's acting director for one year, effective July 1. A search committee will be formed to find a permanent director, according to a college press release.

As director of the Guggenheim Foundation, Krens will direct museums in New York and Venice.

Krens will retain the position of adjunct professor of art at Williams and continue to teach a course in contemporary and 20th century art. He has been a lecturer in art in the Art department and in the Graduate Program in the History of Art since 1980.

In a press conference last Tuesday night, Krens said he will remain closely affiliated with work on the proposed Massachusetts Museum of Contemporary Art (MassMoCA), a plan

Art professors are torn over museum changes

by Peter Balaban

Members of the art department and museum staff last week had mixed reactions when asked about changes that have occurred at the Williams College Museum of Art (WCMA) since Thomas Krens became director in 1980. Krens' appointment as chair of the Solomon R. Guggenheim Foundation was announced last week.

"It [the Guggenheim position] is a great job for him," Visiting Professor of Art Whitney Stoddard said, "he's done a great job making the college museum nationally and internationally known, but there is a problem. It's a college museum and should serve the college."

Stoddard said some of the shows at the museum do just that, but that not enough emphasis is placed on the museum's permanent collection.

"There ought to be a balance between fabricated scholarly shows that go to Frankfurt and Taiwan and cause a sensation and the permanent collection as

Lasell renovations a necessary evil

by Michael Reisman

Renovations currently underway in Lasell Gymnasium are scheduled to be completed by August 1, 1988, according to Robert Peck, chairperson of the physical education department.

Peck said the project will probably cost the college $1.5 million. Portions of the men's locker room have been closed off, causing some disruption, but the construction will provide better locker rooms for women students and the faculty, according to Peck.

Peck said that creating better locker rooms for women students is the most pressing need the renovations are addressing.

Construction of rowing tanks for the men's and women's crew teams and the installation of a new floor for a weight room will occur at the current site of the Muir pool.

The remodeling has caused some inconvenience to those who use the Lasell locker rooms but this is unavoidable, Peck said. "There's no way that this kind of remodeling can be done during the summer." He added that the improvements have been in the planning stages for some time.

Room will be gutted

The current men's locker room will be gutted out and divided in half to form women's and men's locker rooms, Peck said. New showers and toilets will be installed in the middle of the locker room. The total space for the men's part of the locker room will decrease, but will be used more efficiently, Peck said. The current women's locker room will be divided into faculty men's and women's locker rooms.

No new locker rooms for visiting teams will be built, according to Director of the Physical Plant Winthrop Wassenar. Construction for the project is currently in the demolition stages, he said.

Wassenar said that the old pool will be floored over at the level of the men's locker room to create space for a new weight room. The bottom of the pool will be replaced by rowing tanks for the crew team. Peck said some new weight training equipment that has been purchased and some other equipment that has been in storage will be added to equipment currently in use and placed on the new floor over the pool.

Crew team coach Matthew Hettie said he is excited about the new rowing tanks, which he said will help the crew team become more competitive with

The Williams Record

An independent newspaper, published by students of Williams College

Don't tread on us!

The College Council unanimously passed a proposal to institute a standing rule to monitor the use of council budget appropriations for all student run, campus organizations in its meeting last Thursday.

The proposal called for individual members of the council's Finance Committee to be assigned to monitor the spending of individual student organizations. Under the proposal, these appointed monitors would determine how much an organization had been allocated, how much it spent, and how successful it was at achieving its stated goals as put forth in its budget request.

The Record applauds these initiatives. Many organizations on campus misuse and abuse the money given to them by the College Council and our elected governing body has the right to see that such practices cease.

Another section of the standing rule devotes itself entirely to campus publications. Although the council has the right to examine those groups it funds, the provisions in the passed proposal which affect all campus publications could provide an open door to future censorship.

One provision orders the monitor to determine whether or not a publication produced the correct number of issues for which it was budgeted. Another asks the overseer to decide if the publication fairly and effectively solicited contributions from all areas of campus. And the third asks the monitor to ascertain if the publication substituted illustrations and graphics for substantive literature.

Clearly some publications do not adhere to their budget as granted to them by the council. And unfortunately, some do not fairly solicit contributions from all sections of the Williams community. Although such facts should concern the council, they do not merit its usurping a publication's editorial power. The provision which calls for a decision to be made regarding a publication's use of space in terms of articles and graphics infringes upon that publication's right to make its own editorial decisions.

The council has a responsibility to provide funds to all campus publications that request them. Such an obligation however, does not give it the right to take part in any way in the editorial judgement of those organizations.

While we do not see in the council's standing rule an immediate intent to censor, the possibility lies lurking within. Furthermore, it is easy to envision a publication whose content displeases council members finding itself subject to unreasonable editorial restrictions.

Additionally, originators of new publications cannot be expected to estimate accurately the length of the publication and the diversity of their contributors. Stringent applications of these standing rules could therefore effectively squelch new as well as smaller publications.

The idea of monitoring organizations which are funded by the College Council is a good one. Council members, however, must guard against taking the new standing rule as an invitation to censor campus publications.

Alums louder than students

It has been more than a year since the crosses erected on Baxter lawn by student protesters challenged us to think about the issue of divestment at Williams College.

The college's current policy regarding its investments in companies with South African operations, a year-old stance entitled "disinvestment advocacy", is aimed at persuading these companies to withdraw economically from the nation. This policy evidently does not satisfy the recently established "Alumni for Divestment" group. Members have stated their opinion that disinvestment advocacy, based on moral grounds, is ineffective, as it fails to effect companies on the economic level where decisions are really made.

In its letter this fall, the newly formed group said of the college's position that it "fails to seek new and more persuasive channels of influence as would complete divestment." Furthermore, it put forth its "sincere hope that Williams will adopt a clear and forceful stance in the global effort to end apartheid in South Africa."

As for the rest of the college, divestment appears to have become a non-issue. Not only have there been no more shanties and no more crosses, but discussion also appears to have disappeared about this formerly controversial topic of debate. Do those students who share the same stance as this newly formed alumni group wish to speak up in favor of divestment? Is Williams College's role in perpetuating apartheid in South Africa really no longer of concern on campus these days?

The protest last spring, despite the immediate attention that it focused upon divestment, failed to provide a continuing feeling of dissent. The impetus of the protesters' efforts seems to have fizzled out just as the nationwide clamor which raged for almost a full year appears to have died down.

But just as the cruelties of apartheid are not a fad, protests against institutional support of apartheid should not be treated as a fad. If Williams alumni are willing to involve themselves and to put pressure on the administration, Williams students who support divestment and who have the advantage of living in close proximity to the administration should not stop acting when their seniors graduate. The initiative taken by Alumni for Divestment merits a response by the Williams community, especially the student body. A reinvigorated debate on the issues the group raises can only help the college as it continually redefines its goals.

Letters

Made bitter by Sweet Honey

To the Editor:

There is something so powerful about a live, musical performance that cannot be reproduced in a studio. Without the energy of an audience, the intensity of the music is lost and the visual image dissolved. Sound recorded music is devoid of heartbeat.

Perhaps you've found your breath taken from you by living, breathing music. Perhaps you've walked out of an auditorium wondering if you will ever again feel energy so consuming. And thus known that if you could put what you heard on tape, you might, you just might, be able to recapture a fraction of the intensity? Then, suddenly, you are face to face with the law, guilty of considering the considering the crime of wanting to save something on tape that made you smile.

Sweet Honey in the Rock made me smile. Their music, with its overt messages of peace, freedom and harmony brought a few unexpected tears to my eyes. The energy in Chapin that night was vivid. But in the lobby, they sold tapes of another time, another place and another energy that I could not feel. At my feet during the show was a cassette recorder that promised to capture the essence of the moment. However, it was confiscated: the tape destroyed. With it went any hope I might have had of recapturing the emotions Sweet Honey evoked. The intensity of the music was lost and the visual image dissolved.

The band had asked that the tape be destroyed. Why? It might be sold for profit, and they might lose a buck. Somehow, their lyrics that spoke out against capitalism, oppression and materialism lost their fire at that moment. They were unconcerned with pleas that the crime was only one of preservation and not lack of consideration. Why should music so moving have to disappear?

Eric Hanson gave an accurate report of the concert in the Record last Tuesday. "The quintet preached to the audience, arguing the cause of the oppressed and misunderstood and squarely confronting the injustices that perpetuate such ... conditions." I only wish I could believe they meant every word.

Where o' where is the '87 Gul?

To the Editor:

I am writing out of concern over the fate of the 1987 Gul. Has it been published; and if so, when will it be made available to the hundreds of people who are expecting a copy of it?

I have tried to determine the answers to these questions by writing the 1987 Editor and Chief, Jocelyn Shadforth, from whom, I have received no response. I find my "empty mailbox" disturbing, considering my extensive work on staff. I have since discovered from other sources that as of the end of last semester, substantial portions of the book still had not been completed. This task should have been finished soon after graduation in 1987 according to the contract with the publishers. The Editor and Chief of the 1987 Gul owes the class of 1987, as well as the entire Williams community, an explanation of why the 1987 yearbook has not been completed.

I would like to end by saying that I believe in the yearbook, both as a concept and as an organization. I sincerely hope that the problems with the 1987 Gul do not injure the viability of the yearbook in the future.

Racial consciousness: an interview with Preston Washington

Part one of two

In 1969, Preston Robert Washington '70 led the Hopkins Occupation as President of the Williams Afro-American Society (now the Black Student Union) in which black students took over Hopkins Hall in an effort to raise consciousness on campus. Reverend Washington is currently pastor of Memorial Baptist Church in Harlem, New York; Professor of Religious Education, Ministry and Mission at the New York Theological Seminary; and is also convener for the Harlem Churches for Community Improvement. He has returned to Williams to teach a Winter Study course entitled "The Black Church and Black Politics."

Q: Looking back on the Hopkins Occupation now after 19 years, how do you view what happened? Did you then or do you now consider it a success?

A: ... Of all the incidents in Williams' history, it seems as if the Hopkins Hall "incident," which it has been euphemistically called, has really become a symbol of an educational challenge as well as a symbol of who is involved in the decision-making processes — academically [and] financially — on the college campus.

Q: What was most frustrating about the experience? What was your biggest barrier?

A: I think it was a barrier of miscommunication.... We were Williams men, and we just happened to be black as well, and we had this courteous rapprochement with the president and with the provost and with the faculty and with the other students. But it seemed as if we were not communicating clearly with each other. I think we were clear. I think we were very clear, because we spent an awful lot of time repeating what we had demanded, stating as clearly as we could that the issue was more than just the approval of 15 demands. The issue was one of attitude toward accepting blacks on this campus as co-equals. An alumnus said to Chuck Collins, who was then president of Gargoyles [Society], black and a member of the Afro-American Society, he said, "Why are you people always making demands at our school?" Well, that's what the issue was: Williams was, and is now, viewed as a school owned and operated by white people, and blacks are here through the munificence of white liberal care and concern....

Q: Do you think that the recent establishment of Martin Luther King Jr.'s birthday as a national holiday is a significant victory or a relatively unimportant gesture on behalf of the country and its government?

A: I think we ought to celebrate every inch-like gain we can get. In the America of the now, the fact that a civilian, black Baptist preacher of Southern heritage would have a holiday named in his honor is a tribute to the American democratic ideal. And the fact that Ronald Reagan enacted it into law is another part of the American paradox. But more significant is the fact that there are still states that have not yet adopted Martin Luther King's birthday as a national holiday. And the racism that exists in the state of Arizona, for example, with that governor [Evan Meacham] whom I view as a racist as George Wallace and Lester Maddox and others were during the '60s, is indicative of the fact that we have a long way to go, and we will always be in struggle in America so long as we allow this kind of political leader to be rewarded for producing dissent and animosity in this nation. Martin Luther King is a symbol for all of America, and I would not want to detract from the holiday by way of saying, "Well, it's easy to make a holiday after the man is now dead, and we can, of course, celebrate his name because we don't have to deal with his presence as a prophetic voice." But, we have to claim as many victories as we can.

Eric Hanson, who conducted this interview, is the former Arts Editor of the Record.

Martin Luther King's legacy offers mankind great promise

by Muhammad Kenyatta '66

This year, 1988, will mark the twentieth anniversary of the assassination of Martin Luther King Jr. On April 4, 1968, King was slammed to death by the bullet of a lynxman's rifle, in Memphis, Tennessee, at a crucial moment when the civil rights movement was fiercely debating the value of the new rhetoric of Black Power and the efficacy of the strategy of nonviolent protest with which King was so inextricably identified.

King had revealed himself more and more to be a moral leader of universal stature and uncompromising integrity. His championing of the Memphis garbage collectors' strike for livable wages and dignity coincided with his extension of the civil rights movement into segregated cities and suburbs of the smug "North"; i.e. the great expanse of this country outside of the old Confederacy.

King had also emerged as a leading opponent of America's war against Vietnam. His April 4, 1967 Riverside Church (New York) speech "Beyond Vietnam" still stands as the peace movement's most cogent statement of those patriotic, pacifist and internationalist impulses which animated it and resonated with the spirits of scores of millions of Americans, contributing mightily to America's eventual abandonment of its heinous Vietnam venture.

In his frequent and consistent calling of attention to the barbarity of southern African colonialism and apartheid, King anticipated the worldwide anti-apartheid movement which emerged a decade later. But, by staking a moral and political claim to his right and responsibility to help shape foreign policy as well as domestic policy, King provoked the ire of even the strongly pro-civil rights, anti-poverty President Lyndon Baines Johnson.

Each of these philosophic, political and strategic debates had taken their toll on King's energies and had challenged his leadership. The Black Power militants seemed ready to dismiss King as an "Uncle Tom," a proposition that is, retrospectively, transparently ridiculous.

The White Northern public that had sympathized with King and the suffering victims of Southern racist terror turned against King upon discovering that his nonviolent militancy was as adamantly opposed to bigotry above the Mason-Dixon line as below it. The moderate Negro civil rights and political leadership, having marred its political fortunes to the Lyndon Johnson administration, wanted no parts of King's antiwar commitments and much of that leadership condemned King's decision to extend his call for nonviolence to include White militarists as well as ghetto rioters.

And White liberals like those here at our own Williams College that feted King when he spoke here at Thompson Chapel in the early sixties showed no great inclination to move beyond the token integration that characterizes most liberal institutions to this very day. Tokenism, the incremental inclusion of disproportionately small numbers of black Americans in de facto white institutions as a middle ground between total exclusion and genuine integration, was a prime target of King's criticism and a source of deep disappointment for him.

Thus, when we remember Martin Luther King in earnest and in the actual historical context of his times, we may be struck not so much by the acclaim awarded him as by the anger and criticism he seemed bound to provoke, even among those who pay him such lavish posthumous honor. Like the Athenian philosopher Socrates and the itinerant Jewish teacher from Nazareth, now remembered as Jesus, Martin King was always both inextricably engaged in his times and inevitably at odds with his times.

What engaged King with the passions and great pursuits of his days was his honest love for those with whom he shared his life: his family, his community of Faith, his Afro-American people, his beloved Southland, his American nation in its patchwork quilt-pattern of racial and cultural diversity and his own kind — all humankind — with whom he shared, as do we all, a literally common ancestry, a common planet and a common destiny.

And what kept King gloriously at odds with his times were two characteristic qualities of his mind and spirit. One was his rigorous appreciation of the human past, especially of those most ennobling ideas which constitute the saving remnants in the rather mixed bag of the ethical legacy of Western history. The other was King's insistent aspiration toward a new global future founded upon and vitalized by human love.

So, if we are to pay Martin King that greatest of homages, imitation, we ought not expect accolades nor immediate rewards. Nor should we expect any nation or race, not even his own country nor his own beloved Black people, to have a monopoly on those principles for which he was slain. And surely we ought not delude ourselves to believe that the glorified past will shield us from the gritty, mundane controversies of today.

Yet we may, like Martin, be sustained and made happy by the recognition that the promised land lies yet ahead, that joy comes in the morning whether or not our own eyes greet the sun. We may, with our martyred Moses thank God that in the brokenness of what we are now, the spirit's vision can discern the wholeness of what we can become.

Williams student body was active in the early civil rights movement

by Morris B. Kaplan '63

In May, 1963, Martin Luther King marched with thousands of blacks in Birmingham, Alabama to protest segregation; and Williams was there. Not literally, of course. But in a very real sense, the attention of the entire community was focused on the struggle for justice in the streets of Birmingham.

The Southern Christian Leadership Conference, under Dr. King, together with other black community organizations, had mounted an unrelenting struggle to eliminate segregation in a city which contemporaries compared with Johannesburg. Businesses, hotels, restaurants, bathrooms and water fountains were all divided into "white" and "colored" facilities.

In April, blacks took to the streets and organized a boycott against local merchants. The forces of "law and order" struck back with arrests, threats and actual violence. Dr. King was jailed along with other leaders. One result was the "letter from a Birmingham Jail" which defended the aims and objectives of the black movement and inspired a generation of Americans of all creeds and colors.

In May, King was out of jail and back in the streets. Thousands of black men, women and children were arrested. The police attacked peaceful crowds with fire hoses and police dogs. Terrorists bombed the homes of black leaders, including Dr. King's brother's. Wanting to guarantee the continuing attention of white America, Dr. King reached out to loyal friends for support.

One call came late one night to John D. Eusden, then Chaplain at Williams. He was soon on a plane to Birmingham together with J.H.K. Davis '65, co-chair of the Williams Civil Rights Committee and Reverend and Mrs. William Sloane Coffin of Yale. They did not go alone. Alerted to the possibility that Dr. King would call for a massive influx of supporters, the Williams community organized for that eventuality. Baxter Hall became a command post, with a wire service teletype keeping everyone up to the minute. Car pools were organized. Over 70 Williams students stood ready to answer the call. One group, impatient with delay, went on ahead. Among them was John Kifer '63, now reporting on the demonstrations in Israel for the New York Times.

The call did not come. Negotiations began in Birmingham which led to a resolution of the immediate crisis and agreement as to some steps toward desegregation. However, the readiness of the Williams community to share in fighting injustice was not a momentary phenomenon. When John Eusden, Jay Davis and the others returned, they met with groups all over campus to share their experience. The Williams Civil Rights Committee went on to raise more money to support civil rights organizations, both North and South, than any other college in the country. Williams students joined with others in the ghettos of Harlem and Philadelphia during the summer of 1963 to tutor young blacks and support civil rights actions. Concerned not to overlook our local community, students arranged a program to provide tutoring for needy students in North Adams.

The events of May 1963 crystallized a pivotal moment in the moral education of my generation. We experienced ourselves as a community moved by the realities of injustice to interrupt our comfortable routine and to stand ready to put ourselves on the line in response to a call from Birmingham. At that moment, Martin Luther King, Jr., together with the suffering and beloved community of blacks for which he spoke, became our teacher. They taught that who we are depends on what we care about. If we care, we must be ready to act.

Board to con town by-laws

The Williamstown Board of Selectmen unanimously passed a motion at its January 11 meeting which asks the Williamstown Planning Board to look into changing town by-laws with respect to students who live off-campus.

The new motion asks the Planning Board to "investigate possible by-law changes to improve the relations between the neighborhoods and off-campus students." The board will do this at its February 9 meeting, according to Town Planner Barbara Bashevkin.

The selectmen's motion came in response to a request from the Town-Gown committee that the selectmen consider limiting the availability off-campus housing for Williams students.

According to selectman J. O'Brien Locke, chairman of the Town-Gown committee, Williamstown Building Inspector Richard Milanesi found that renting to students does not violate any town by-laws, so that if changes are to be made, the by-laws must first be altered.

However, any recommendations by the Planning Board for the change of town by-laws must be brought to a full town vote, according to selectmen Alan George.

Planning Board Chairman Charles Schlesinger said "I don't know how much latitude we have in changing by-laws." Schlesinger said the board will either change the town by-laws or reach a compromise with the college. He also said the board will look at what action other college towns have taken with regard to off-campus housing problems.

At selectmen's meeting, Dagmar Bubriski, a member of the Town-Gown committee, said Williams students "have very different lifestyles [from town residents] and it is not the type of lifestyle that works out in a neighborhood situation."

"It is better all around if students are provided residences on the campus," she said.

George Milne, also a member of the Town-Gown committee, expressed concern that students are being overcharged for off-campus rentals. "We should put a rental cap on the housing. That will stop people from gouging the students, also our townspeople will have decent rentals if the students decide to leave," Milne said.

Milne, along with others, expressed concern over the lack of student input in the various town committees whose decisions have a direct effect upon students.

Dukakis files MoCA bill

Governor Michael Dukakis issued a special message last Tuesday to provide $35 million in funding for the proposed Massachusetts Museum of Contemporary Art (MassMoCA).

According to Thomas Krens, Director of the Williams College Museum of Art (WCMA) and chief planner of MassMoCA, passage of the bill would allow planners of the project to submit a formal proposition to the state Office of Administration and Finance. A newly-created municipal planning board could then receive and disburse the funds for use on the project pending the decision from Administration and Finance.

Representative Daniel Bosley (D-North Adams) said that he and other Berkshire legislators attempted to admit the bill into the House last Thursday, but Republicans in the House prevented this, saying that a bill could not be admitted in an informal session. Bosley says that he hopes to execute the bill, calling for an executive session to bring the bill past any committees and directly to the House floor.

The money for the bill would come from revenue from the sale of state bonds, Bosley said.

College Treasurer William Reed, North Adams Mayor John Barrett III and representatives from Sprague Technologies Inc. testified at an informal House committee hearing on the bill last Thursday. Sprague Technologies Inc. had agreed to donate its 28-building mill complex in North Adams to Williams for the proposed museum, but the agreement effectively ended when the Convention Center bill that would have provided funding for the project died in the legislature on January 5. Sprague officials have said that they will wait a "reasonable amount of time" before taking any action that would preclude the project.

The governor also filed two other related bills last Tuesday. One would provide $130 million in funding for convention centers around the state. The other would help fund operating deficits for the Hynes Convention Center in Boston.

Funding for projects covered by the three bills the governor filed last week was originally expected from the Convention Center Bill that died in the legislature on Jan. 5. Bosley said, "The governor is trying to satisfy everyone's needs."

College holds King events

A number of events to commemorate the life of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. have been scheduled during the month of January at the college.

Tonight at 7:30, the Gospel Choir of the Second Congregational Church in Pittsfield and David Grover, a nationally-acclaimed folk singer, are scheduled to present a concert in tribute to Dr. King in Brooks Rogers.

The Reverend C.T. Vivian, director of the Center for Democratic Renewal in Atlanta, will deliver a lecture entitled "Martin Luther King: 21st-century Man on Wednesday, Jan. 20, at 8:00 P.M. in Room 3 of Griffin Hall. Rev.

Vivian was the former Affiliates Director of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC) and key organizer of the Voting Rights Campaign in Selma.

Last night, Juan Williams, political reporter for the Washington Post and author of the highly acclaimed documentary of the civil rights movement, "Eyes on the Prize," presented an illustrated lecture, "Civil Rights in America." His presentation traced the major events in the history of the civil rights movement and examined current issues affecting minority concerns.

An interfaith celebration of King's life and work was held last Sunday in the Thompson Memorial Chapel. The celebration featured speakers, music, and readings from King's letters, essays and sermons. The speakers were Morris Kaplan, a 1963 Williams graduate and public defender for the Legal Aid Society of New York, and the Reverend Muhammad Kenyatta, an attorney and member of the class of 1966. Rev. Kenyatta is currently teaching a winter study course at Williams on the moral philosophy of Martin Luther King. The Williams Gospel Choir and members of the Jazz Ensemble performed at the celebration, with soloists Tracey Blankenship, piano, and Michael Coyne, saxophone.

Also on Sunday, Otha Day, lecturer in music at Williams, gave a lecture on classical music by black composers.

A concert by Sweet Honey in the Rock, a popular quintet of black female vocalists whose songs address a wide range of social issues opened the schedule of events on Saturday, Jan. 9, in Chapel Hall.

appointment, I take pleasure also in the prospect of his continued membership on the Williams faculty and in continuing involvement in the MassMoCA project, which owes so much to his vision, initiative and drive."

Krens said at the press conference that he had accepted the Guggenheim's offer late in 1987. "If I was offered the directorship of the Metropolitan [Museum of Art], but they didn't offer continuing with MassMoCA, I wouldn't take it," he said.

"International" Commenting on Krens' qualifications, Peter Lawson-Johnston, President of the Guggenheim Foundation, said in a written statement, "His energy, intelligence and international outlook are qualities which make him eminently suited to the formidable tasks ahead. His achievements over the past seven years at Williams convince us that he will lead the Guggenheim with distinction." An article in last Wednesday's New York Times said Krens is best known "for his transformation of the museum (WCMA) from a modest institution to one of the country's leading college art museums, with a top curatorial staff and a strong program of exhibitions."

Krens received a B.A. from Williams in 1969 with honors in political economy. He holds a master's degree in art from the State University of New York at Albany and a master's degree in public and private management from the School of Management at Yale University.

Zafar examines the shades of literature

by Alex Oh

Who would have guessed that Dr. Zafar, a well-known mad computer scientist of a comic strip, is residing here amidst us in the Berkshires?

"Yes, I am Dr. Zafar of the 'Psi Force,'" Rafia Zafar said, pointing to a comic strip of the famous Marvel Comics No. 14 on her office door. What is the explanation for this phenomenon? Rafia Zafar, on whom the character of Dr. Zafar is loosely based, went to school with the author of the comic strip, Danny Fingerth. Rafia Zafar is also one of the two Bolin Fellows appointed this year.

"We were supposed to be nerds," said Zafar, as she reflected upon her days at the Bronx High School of Science with Fingerth. Born an raised in Brooklyn, New York, by a black father and a Jewish mother, Zafar was faced with the avant-garde liberalism of inner-city life from early on.

"My parents believed that New York's acceptance of divergence was the best surroundings for children to grow up in," said Zafar. Although she said she now considers New York too "yupppified" for her taste, she still considers the city, and her parents, to have been the inspiration behind her present liberal attitude.

Zafar is now in her third year at Harvard, working on her dissertation, "Black and White and Read All Over."

"Separate but equal" literature The dissertation, according to Zafar, deals with her interest in the way Black American writers adopted and subverted "white" literature during the 18th and 19th centuries.

Bolin Fellow Rafia Zafar's alter ego is comic character mad Dr. Zafar. (Steinman)

Explaining how Afro-American literature and American literature are separate and distinct entities in the twentieth century, Zafar said that she wanted to study how and when this "separate but equal" doctrine took shape in American literature.

Zafar will include works of early black writers such as Britton Hammon, who authored captivity narratives. Zafar's main interest in studying men like Hammon is to understand how and why there is no sense of color in his writing, as compared to writers of the twentieth century, authors like Richard Wright and James Baldwin.

"In the eighteenth century, Black Americans were looking to further their condition through sympathy," said Zafar. "They were trying to identify themselves with the whites, saying 'look, we're the same.' In the nineteenth century, the black writers begin to differ-tiate their style from white literature. In the 1930's, the black writers don't feel the need for sympathy and 'crocodile tears' at all, and people like Wright tried to dissociate themselves from the whites altogether."

A future of teaching Zafar said she has decided not to apply for a job here at Williams, her first priority being to go back to Harvard to finish her dissertation. After that, she doesn't know what will happen. Zafar said she definitely wants to teach: "I love teaching; I feel that a teacher can do something to change people's mindsets about other people."

Although Zafar said she misses her support system at Cambridge, she is thoroughly enjoying and taking advantage of the generous fellowship offered by Williams College. The Bolin Fellowship is an opportunity for Zafar, and other minority students, to not only extend personal education and career goals, but also to encourage and influence students with similar dreams.

it can be used for [art] classes," he said.

Associate Professor of Art Carol Ockman said that before Krens became director of the museum he had been one of the prime movers in the plan to expand and renovate the museum.

During his seven years as WCMA director, Krens oversaw a two-phase expansion and renovation of the museum building that doubled its exhibition space.

Primary responsibility Former WCMA director and art professor emeritus Lane Faison said Krens is primarily responsible for design and accomplishment of the art museum building in its current form. "For that we will always be grateful to him," he said.

"Since he became director ... Krens and the museum staff have organized a number of major exhibitions which would 'We now have an enormous space for hanging art compared to what we had before,'" Ockman said, "and whether or not you like Charles Moore's [the architect who designed the expansion and renovation plan] work or not it has given us a building by one of the biggest names in post-modern architecture."

New alumni group withholds money until college divests

by Marilyn Germano

Alumni for Divestment, Inc., an organization of Williams College alumni, has come together in an attempt to move the college toward a stronger moral position on the issue of apartheid in South Africa. The formal organization has only existed since 1987.

Ennis Walton '86, one of the founders of the group, explained the basic idea behind Alumni for Divestment: "As alumni, we believe it is important for the college to maintain a strong moral stance on issues. The college can maintain a moral stance without compromising financial needs."

The college's present position is disinvestment advocacy, through which the college is trying to persuade major companies to leave South Africa in order to demonstrate opposition to apartheid.

According to Walton, the call for such an alumni group began a few years ago. The Class of 1983 was the first class to actually begin accepting donations from its members. Nobody seemed to have the time or the energy to devote to the creation of an organization to which alumni could formally donate until William McClements '85, the first person to present the formal idea for Alumni for Divestment, decided to share the responsibility with Walton.

Waiting for the IRS Any donations to the group, explained Walton, will be held in escrow until the college divests. Alumni for Divestment has been talking with the IRS since last year about its establishment as a tax-exempt organization and is presently waiting for IRS approval. Because the group has not yet obtained tax-exempt status, said Walton, never had been possible in the earlier space, so the museum has a much greater visibility than before.

"Now most of the people who used to come to town just to see the Clark [Art Institute] also come to see the college museum. These are all wonderful things."

But Ockman said that before the addition was made to the museum, it was primarily a teaching museum.

"Now things are more separate," she said, "it's less purely an art department or a college phenomenon and more a showcase for the public."

Ambition Faison pointed to the expansion of the museum's full-time staff from two to 20 during Krens' tenure as director as indicative of Krens' ambitious approach to museum management.

He said that the degree the art museum's shows can be correlated with art course content depends on how far in advance shows are planned.

"You can have quite ambitious shows that must be planned long ahead, [but then] it's almost impossible to gear the shows to what might be going on in the curriculum of the art department."

Krens' main contribution to the museum, Faison said, is the international recognition the museum has achieved based upon exhibition programs of contemporary art and architec-some decisions have still not been made: for example, whether the money the organization receives will be kept in a separate fund indefinitely or whether the group will set a deadline for the college by which it must divest.

Reverend Muhammad Kenyatta '66, a member of the group, said he believes that a group such as Alumni for Divestment responds to an idea growing on many college campuses.

"There is a desire on the part of alumni to simultaneously support their institution and to express their feeling that the institution is off-base about divestment," Kenyatta said.

"It is hard to overestimate the sentiment among a large number of students and alumni, especially, but not exclusively, blacks," he said. Kenyatta praised the work of group co-founders Walton and McClements, saying, "Much credit is due to them for leading us beyond nebulous conversation."

Sympathy for revolutions James MacGregor Burns '39, who has made himself available as a resource for the group to discuss overall strategy and approach, said he supports Alumni for Divestment's position.

"I've studied fairly systematically over the years the rise of revolutionary and militant groups in various countries and our relationships to those groups," he said. "In general, American policy has lagged behind the momentum of these groups. We have rarely kept on top of situations intellectually in our foreign policy."

Burns said he thinks it is up to institutions like the college to take a moral stand and oppose apartheid. "We have to keep on

Hamilton

They may not have Chief Zoltz peering over their shoulders, but a panel at Hamilton College is taking a new look at the college's position on alcohol, citing the unwillingness of many students to take responsibility for their personal actions. Campus security guards complained about the difficulty of enforcing drinking regulations at crowded parties where many students are underage. The Dean of Students said that Hamilton's goal is to provide its students with four years of quality education rather than four years of great party life. Some measures proposed by the panel include mandatory alcohol awareness education during freshman orientation, the banning of first semester freshmen from fraternity parties and a "social" honor code in which students would promise to take responsibility for their own actions as well as those of their peers. Student reactions to the panel's suggestions are thus far unenthusiastic.

Bryn Mawr

Next time you curse bent thumb tacks and fallen posters, count your blessings. Bryn Mawr College's policy allows only bulletin boards as wall decorations, and there now are whispers of unrest from students taking issue with that rule. Eighty-three percent of those responding to a recent Residence Council survey felt they should be able to decorate their rooms as they wished. In response, the head of the Residence Council reminded students that the college must answer to insurance representatives who have complained of finding newspaper and other flammable materials on the walls during their monthly inspections. No decision is reported likely for some time.

Wheaton

"There's a fungus among us!" cried Wheaton College students when mold was discovered spreading through many of the school's library books. Underground shelving, defective climate control and an excessively humid summer are thought to be responsible. A consulting team from MIT has been called to assess the situation, and college librarians feel certain the growth will be stunted before it mushrooms into something more serious.

An exhibition of recent works by the Williamstown architects and Williams College professors A.K. McCallum and F. Andrus Burr is currently on view in the Rose Gallery at the Williams College Museum of Art. The exhibition includes photographs of completed buildings, prototypes of light fixtures and stairs, and drawings and models of projects under construction including the axonometric drawing of the Fitchburg Art Museum pictured above. The exhibition will be on view through February 28, 1988.

top intellectually with some sympathetic understanding of revolutions like the one in South Africa that have as much legitimacy as ours [the American Revolution] did years ago," he said.

Alumni for Divestment is still in its early, organizational stages. A small mailing to alumni supporters has begun, but little else can be done until the final confirmation comes from the IRS.

"Once the IRS approves us," said Walton, "we will then mail information to alumni, all 17,000 of them."

Early music ensemble offers aural variety

by Ellen Weld

Thursday night offered the Williams community the opportunity to step back in time—into the 15th century with New York's Ensemble for Early Music. Founded in 1974 by its director Frederick Renz, a noted harpsichordist and former member of the renowned New York Pro Musica Antiqua, the group also includes Peter Becker, counter-tenor/baritone; Mark Bleeke, tenor; Kurt-Owen Richards, bass; and Grant Herreid and

Thomas Zajac playing a variety of authentic instruments such as lute and recorder. In a concert entitled "Illuminating Manuscripts of the 15th Century," the ensemble presented secular music of the Medieval and Renaissance periods, drawing from manuscripts that included Burgundian court songs, Florentine carnival songs, songs of woe from the British Isles, German peasant songs, and soldiers' drinking songs.

The concert began with a group of chansons, short polyphonic songs of mainly French origin which were grouped as Burgundian Court Songs. Flowing from one piece to the next without pauses, the musicians executed each song with an impeccability that sounded effortless, and with great sensitivity to each other's parts. The result was one of well-balanced polyphony, in which voices were delicately layered upon each

Student billboard decries conformity

by Travis Plerson

On the way to North Adams from Williamstown, there stands a wordless billboard featuring a series of grey paper doll-like figures in front of a white background patterned with diagonal grey lines. The third figure from the right in this line is not like the others, however; instead, the bright red, curvilinear form has disrupted the formerly straight lines behind it, and is jumping away from the other figures. This panel of cryptic images on the side of Route 2 is not a radical advertisement campaign for a new perfume or clothing line, but is instead the work of Williams juniors in last semester's Studio Art major seminar.

The project began when seminar leader Peggy Diggs, lecturer in the Department of Art, gave her students the assignment of designing a billboard. From the various proposals submitted, the ideas were focused into the theme of breaking away from conformity. With this topic in mind, the students produced new designs, and from these, the class selected Jed Scala's prototype as the final composition. After some adaptation of his proposal, and with the aid of a discounted rate for a month's rental of the billboard, the final image was put up early this year.

other to achieve a very moving and graceful forcefulness.

Aural Variety

While the chansons dealt with such themes as the painfulness of love, other pieces satirized gluttony, marital infidelity, and sexual desire. Members of the group read the texts aloud with great drama and wit, illuminating the risqué double meanings of the words. And when singing the texts, the vocalists cleverly painted the words so that the very sounds conveyed the meanings, as in "Cucu, cucu," in which a man is warned "never to be cuckolded" (since "even the nicest woman always has the itch to do it"), the vocalists playfully imitated the bird's call.

One of the most compelling and tightly integrated sets was the group of Songs of Woe from the British Isles that began the program's second half. In such pieces as "Deemed wrongfully" and "My woeful heart," the vocalists sang about the anguish of loneliness and unrequited love. Although the first piece of the set featured only one vocalist, Becker, the last piece included all three; the strengthening of forces seemed to reflect the rising level of despair communicated through the texts. The lyrical vocal lines, the long, sighing melismas, and the continuous underlying hum of the organistrum, played by Renz, all worked together to create a controlled but heart-wrenching intensity of sound.

For its encore, the ensemble gave a boisterous rendition of "Eat, Drink, and Be Merry," which featured the blowing of water-filled bottles. As in all of their pieces, the musicians demonstrated community with themselves, their listeners, and the people of the 15th century.

Two local youths nabbed for thefts

by Peter Balaban

Williamstown Police will take out complaints on several counts, including larceny, against two Williamstown youths who apparently took a day off from school on Monday, Jan. 11 to enter unlocked student rooms in several college dormitories and go on a stealing spree.

Police caught the boys, ages 13 and 14, in a parked car in the Adams Memorial Theater (AMT) parking lot, after receiving a description of the car they were driving.

Williamstown Police Chief Joseph Zolito said stolen material recovered from the car included credit cards, wallets, money, a watch and some jewelry. Zolito said late last week that police were still hoping that the owners of a watch and a change purse that had been recovered would come forward to claim them.

According to Director of Security Ransom Jenks, a student came into his office a little after 9 a.m. on Monday morning and reported seeing a couple of suspicious looking teenagers around Mission Park.

Jenks said the student had followed the teenagers out of the building and taken down the license plate number of the car they were driving. Jenks said he called the police, who spotted the car in the AMT lot and apprehended the suspects as they came out of the building.

Jenks said police were able to obtain a confession from at least one of the youths. Police will charge them in relation to the following five larcenies:

At 10:51 a.m. Monday, William Lin '89 reported to police that his wallet had been taken from his room in Dodd House. The wallet contained a passport and his green papers but no cash. At 12:56 p.m. Monday, Gregg Kelley '88 reported that a gold quartz watch, worth $70, had been taken from his room in Hopkins House. At 2 p.m., William Morris '89 reported that $180 had been taken from the pocket of a coat that was left in his suite in Carter House. At 12:07 p.m. Tuesday, Mark Reid

'89 reported that his wallet had been taken from his pants left in his suite in Gladden House. The wallet contained $15.

Police said that the two juveniles also allegedly stole a Sony Walkman stereo of undetermined value from a student.

Jenks said the apprehension of the juveniles was brought about by a joint effort of cooperation between Williamstown police and campus security and was aided immensely by students.

"I think our students generally should be more suspicious of strangers in their midst and report them to us [security]. We will find out if they are legitimate," Jenks said.

Students reported six other larcenies to police Sunday through Wednesday of last week. Zolito said police were not sure if the incidents were related, and that they had other suspects that they were investigating.

Zolito said the youths would be arraigned in juvenile session of Northern Berkshire District Court.

test out of reach. Mike Swenson '89 opened the barrage. His was followed by two goals apiece by Caswell and Will Putnam '89, and a single score by freshman Tim Hale, and the Ephs led 10-2.

Freshman Ian Smith notched his first goal of the year at the 14:51 mark of the third. A meaningless NEC score made the final 11-5.

One week ago, the squad routed old rival Middlebury 6-1.

Putnam opened the scoring with an assist from Frechette, followed by a beautiful goal by Van Belle, who tipped the puck past the goalie while failing to the ice. Rob Abel '91 tallied the third Eph goal when he beat the Panther netminder high off the crossbar from the faceoff circle.

Two power play goals widened the margin to 5-0, as Van Belle and defenseman Chris Donato '89 both made fine individual plays on the man advantage, bringing the crowd to its feet. The squad has dominated on the power play all year long, scoring on over 30 percent of its chances.

Middlebury could not even get on the board until twelve minutes into the third period, but it was too late to turn the tide of the game. Abel picked up his second tally of the night on a short-handed effort with just 2:27 left in the contest.

This weekend the squad faces the unenviable task of traveling to Maine to face Bowdoin on Friday night and Colby on Saturday afternoon.

Women skaters slashed by Hamilton-Colgate tonight

by Scott Freeman

The women's ice hockey team saw its season record slip to 2-3 at the hands of Williams' old rival Hamilton. The final score was 3-1 in a game between two equally talented squads. This was the second consecutive loss for the Ephs, the previous defeat coming at Middlebury the Saturday before, against the same tough Panther squad that was responsible for Williams' first loss.

Against Hamilton, the Ephs came out of the locker room uninspired as the Continentals mounted a 3-0 lead during the first period. The period was characterized by Eph skaters lethargically wandering around the ice uninvolved in the game. According to coach Briggs, "We were standing around watching the action throughout the whole period."

After their inauspicious start, however, the pucksters came out in the second period on fire, testing the Continental goalie time and time again only to be denied the red light. The shot totals in the second were comparable, except the Eph shots were predominately quality attempts in comparison to the feeble Hamilton shots. Coach Briggs explained, "All their shots were from outside near the blue line while ours were pretty close calls."

The Eph barrage continued into the third period in a very close game in spite of the misleading 3-0 score. Both goaltenders played superbly, turning back bids by their respective opponents. Coach Briggs called the play of Eph goalie Daisy Hagey '88 "excellent, as always." Hagey rejected 22 Continental tries after the three quick goals in the first period.

Neuse finds net

The frustration ended, however, when Kirsten Neuse '89 beat the Hamilton goalie to put the Ephs on the board for the first time in two games. In spite of inspired defensive play by steady defensemen Kristen Moomaw '90 and Kara Lynch '90, the Ephs could not cut the gap any further as the game ended with the final score 3-1 in favor of the Continentals.

On Sunday, the squad faced RPI, a team the Ephs have already beaten once this year, by a score of 8-3, in their rink. Today, the Ephs will test the Red Ralders of Colgate at Lansing Chapman at 7:30 before heading to Boston to face MIT on Saturday.

Junior winger Mike Swenson carries the puck down the ice during the team's 11-5 drubbing of New England College on Saturday.

Men's hockey glides to easy victories

by Ted Hobart

"We've really turned our season around," asserted senior captain Dave Caswell after Saturday's 11-5 drubbing of New England College. "It's a new attitude. We're really grinding it out—one shift, one period at a time."

The victory completed the second half of a fine week for the Ephs, who last Tuesday soundly beat Middlebury 6-1. The two conference wins raised their overall record to 4-7 and 3-6 in the conference.

Saturday's game featured an NEC squad with quick, high scoring forwards but poor defensive skills. Just 2:47 into the game, assistant captain Chris Conway '89 beat the NEC netminder for the first of many Eph tallies. Only 27 seconds later, strong forechecking by Caswell forced a weak clearing attempt which center Bob Santry '90 intercepted and passed to Chris Pachus '88 for the score and a 2-0 lead.

New England did manage two goals in the opening stanza, but assistant captain Tim Frechette '89 and Ron Van Belle '90 both notched scores to send the Ephs into the first intermission leading 4-2.

The beginning of the second period marked the end of the competitive part of the game, as the Ephs scored six times in thirteen minutes to put the con-

The men's basketball team lost its most important game to date on Saturday night, falling to nationally ranked arch-rival Amherst 91-85. The loss left the Ephs with a 5-4 record and a three game losing streak.

The standing room only crowd of 2000 saw Williams jump to an 8-5 lead before Amherst went on a crucial 18-6 run spirited by junior Yram Groff's nine points that gave the Defectors a commanding 23-14 lead. Good defense by the Ephs created two turnovers, which they converted into a Rich Williams '90 layup and a Mike Butler '90 three-pointer, cutting the lead to 27-22.

Scott Saft then took over the ball game. Beginning with a trey of his own, the 6'7" junior scored thirteen straight points, extending Amherst's lead to fifteen points before another Butler trey and a Garcia Major '90 hoop at the buzzer left the score at 42-32 at intermission.

A crucial junction of the game was reached only a minute into the second half, as Eph center Dave Morrison '90 was called for a technical foul for hanging on the rim during a failed dunk attempt. This questionable call resulted in a six point swing, as Saft hit the free throw and teammate Jeff Schnack followed with a long jumper making it 48-34.

After loitering ten points back for a long stretch, Morrison and Melchionni led a 6-0 spurt that closed the gap to 81-77 with 2:51 left. Morrison then fouled out, but Major kept the deficit at four with a 19'6" deuce before another questionable call was made. A scramble for a loose ball, with several players hitting the hardcourt, led to an arbitrary foul call on Melchionni. Amherst made the two free throws, extending their lead to six with :57 seconds left, and Williams could not catch up.

Sheehy put things in perspective by saying that his team "is just too inexperienced. We're young, and have to overcome that." The coach also blamed countless missed opportunities inside the paint for the first half deficit.

Tuesday's game was highlighted by a tremendous second half performance by the duo of Major and Melchionni. Williams was down by only five at the half, but the Engineers fired out of the locker room to pad their margin to eleven. The offensive then began, as the two Eph guards would tally 36 of the next 45 Eph points.

A Melchionni hoop and a Major trey was followed by twelve consecutive Melchionni points, as the junior guard was on fire, and the RPI lead was cut to one at 63-62. Not to be outdone, Major then rolled off a series of driving baskets and area code jumpers, scoring 14 of Williams next 18 points, giving the Ephs a 82-81 lead.

Despite holding a seemingly insurmountable five point lead with :14 seconds left, the Ephs couldn't seal the win when lightning struck as Walsh hit a buzzer-beating half court shot to send the game into OT.

After coming from behind to tie in the first OT, Williams shot to an early lead on a three point play by Healy, but RPI came back from a five point deficit late in the period, converting a steal in the closing seconds to win the game 107-105.

Williams hits the road this week as it plays at Middlebury tonight and travels to Maine this weekend to play Bates and Bowdoin.

Sophomore center Dave Morrison drew a controversial technical foul on this attempted dunk early in the second half against Amherst.

Russo coach of the year

Williams head soccer coach Mike Russo was named the Division III Soccer Coach of the Year by the National Soccer Coaches Association of America on Friday night in Washington, D.C. Russo was also selected the associations New England Coach of the Year, marking the second time he has received that distinction, the first being in 1984.

This year Russo's team compiled an impressive 17-1 record, shattering the old school record for victories, 11 (set by Russo's 1984 squad and tied by his 1985 team), and goals (48), while giving up only eight goals against and posting twelve shutouts. The Ephs also won the East Coast Athletic Conference New England Championship and the ECAC Regional Championship, as well as their third straight Little Three Title.

Outstanding record

In his nine seasons as Williams head soccer coach, Russo has compiled an outstanding 75-42-13 record. Teams over the last six seasons have been particularly strong, posting a 67-19-8 mark. The recent strength of the team is also borne out by the fact that each of the last six seasons has seen at least one Div. III All-American on the Williams squad. This year's group was especially honored to have three All-Americans chosen from its ranks, captain and midfielder Nicolai Nachamkin '88, sweeper Dan Calichman '90, and forward Mike Masters '89, who was selected for the second year in a row.

Wrestlers matted as Duff grapples to 7-0

by Scott Mozarsky

The wrestling team continued its seven-match losing streak as it lost to Norwich 40-16 and to MIT 31-11. Each match showed the promise of the team but also showed that it has a long way to go before becoming a winner. In the Norwich match, Williams led 10-0 on victories by 126 pound co-captain John Dillon '89, who got a forfeit, and by Steve Felix '90, who easily won an 11-3 victory in the 134 pound weight class. Norwich, however, came back and took a 34-10 lead.

In the 190 pound weight class, co-captain Mark Duff '89 pushed his record to 6-0 by pinning his opponent at 2:44 of the first period. The victory was an example of the steady performance that Duff has provided throughout the season. The final match against Norwich was filled with excitement as freshman heavyweight Justin Powell wrestled a gritty match before being pinned by his more experienced opponent.

According to sophomore stand-out Kevin "Tex" Cook, "We are a tough team and we're in great shape but we still have to work on the fundamentals in order to become a winner." Against MIT Cook and Dillon both wrestled tough matches but were unable to post victories. Dillon lost a tough decision after taking a 2-1 lead and Cook got pinned after staying even early on. Williams gained victories from Felix, who continued to impress with a 8-1 decision and Duff who pushed his record to 7-0 with a 10-2 decision.

The highlight of the match was an 11-1 win by freshman 167

College snags 4th art collection for MoCA

by Scott J. O'Callaghan

Two developments last week in the ongoing saga of the proposed Massachusetts Museum of Contemporary Art (MassMoCA) seemed to bode well for the project.

Williams announced last Friday that it had reached a preliminary agreement with Ileana and Michael Sonnabend, owners of the Sonnabend Gallery in New York City and Paris, for a long-term loan of 70 works from their collection for the museum.

On the legislative front, the Massachusetts House Ways and Means Committee recommended for passage a bill that would provide funding for the project. Representative Daniel Bosley (D-North Adams) said that the bill was expected to come before the full House yesterday. The bill was filed earlier this month by Governor Michael Dukakis after other legislation that would have funded the project died.

According to Zelda Stern, public relations director of the Williams College Museum of Art (WCMA), the Sonnabends have agreed to loan approximately 70 works from their collection for a six-year period. Stern said the agreement is contingent on passage of funding for the museum by the state legislature.

Three types of art

The portion of the collection that would be loaned to MassMoCA consists of works from three areas of contemporary art, according to Stern: American artists of the 1950s and early 1960s like Jim Dine, Andy Warhol, James Rosenquist, Robert Rauschenberg and Jasper Johns; a strong representation of Arte Povera (poor art), an Italian minimalist style which derives its name from the relatively low-cost materials used by the artists; and works by artists who have achieved prominence in the 1980s, including Ashley Bickerton, Annette Lemieux, Meyer Valsman, Terry Winters, Carroll Dunham and Jeff Koons.

Commenting on how the collection would fit in with other collections promised to MassMoCA, Ileana Sonnabend said in a written statement, "The [Sonnabend] gallery has also been committed to creating a context for European and American work to be seen together. MassMoCA could provide the context, for the first time, for that to happen regularly, and on a significant scale."

Italian art collector Count Giuseppe Panza of Milan and collector Charles Saatchi of London have promised to loan portions of their contemporary

Tuition will probably rise again next year by 7%

by Craig Gangi

Provost of the College Neil Grabols estimated that the college will raise tuition approximately seven percent for next year, although he said it is too early to be certain.

The Provost dismissed the idea that Williams has taken on, as he put it, a "Chivas Regal approach to education."

"We are not setting our fees so as to have them higher so that we will seem to be a better place," Grabols said.

Grabols said a number of factors cause tuition at Williams and other colleges to traditionally increase at a rate three to four percent higher than the rate of inflation. He cited the cost of purchasing items like computers and science equipment, whose prices increase faster than the rate of inflation.

"If certain things that you buy expand [in price] at rates faster than the Consumer Price Index, it is almost a certainty that your fees are going to have to go up faster also," Grabols said.

Grabols also said that over the years, wages and salaries of college employees have increased approximately two percent more than inflation, because of increased productivity over the entire economy.

"We, however, do not increase our productivity very significantly, but we do improve the product," he said.

Another reason for the tuition increases recently is the slower than inflationary increases in the tuition during the mid and late 1970s, Grabols said.

$53 million budget

In this year's $53 million budget, $43 million went toward educational expenses, of which 40 percent was absorbed by the salaries and fringe benefits of the 850 College employees.

During the time between 1967 and 1987, the purchasing power of faculty salaries decreased approximately 20 percent. Grabols said that only this year did the college succeed in raising faculty salaries to the buying power of 1967 dollars.

For this school year, Grabols said that the salary is $28,000 for a Ph.D.'s first year at Williams. For the 1986 school year, the average salary for an assistant professor at Williams was $29,300.

In future years, there are likely to be more pressures to increase faculty salaries, Grabols said, as the number of 18-year-olds increases, current professors begin to retire and the number of U.S. citizens getting Ph.D. degrees decreases.

Each year, Grabols explained, approximately 55 percent of the revenues to meet expenses comes from tuition; 24 percent from the endowment (estimated at $250 million); 16 per-

Food Service can't get enough student workers

by Todd Owens

According to Director of Financial Aid Philip Wick, several college departments which hire student employees are having trouble finding students to fill job openings.

Wick chairs the newly formed Student Employment Review Committee, which is looking into possible solutions to the problem.

Wick said that a primary focus of the committee's activities will be to look into difficulties Food Service is having recruiting employees. He noted that Security and Sawyer Library are also having difficulty hiring enough students, although not as much as Food Service.

Food Service's student managers cited several possible reasons for the growing number of unfilled positions in Food Service in a proposal they submitted last May calling for the formation of the committee. The reasons included the lack of incentives to return to or

Trustees talk athletics, money, changes

by Jim McDermott

While on campus last weekend, the Board of Trustees of the College approved plans for renovations in Mission Park and set aside funds for campus lighting improvements. They also discussed the college's current operating costs and income and other financial issues, such as alumni contributions and tuition. Before they had left, the trustees had met with the coordinators of the BSU and a group of student athletes, had approved tenure decisions and had discussed the Massachusetts Museum of Contemporary Art and the Mystic Seaport program.

The trustee Committee on Campus Life first met with student athletes to discuss athletics at Williams, according to College Vice President and trustee secretary William Reed.

"Now that we have the facilities, we want to see how the programs themselves are doing," Reed said. The committee discussed the isolation of some athletes from other portions of the student body, as well as the level of equity of the college's treatment of men's and women's sports. Reed said it was a very healthy discussion.

The Budget and Financial Planning Committee reviewed the college's operating costs and weighed these against income figures in preparation for April's trustee meetings, when the trustees will set tuition rates for next year. The trustees are especially concerned with the position of Williams tuition in relation to other schools, Reed said.

The Buildings and Grounds Committee approved a $1.5 million dollar campus lighting improvement plan and set aside $2.8 million dollars for renovations in Mission Park. The renovations will include the purchase of new carpeting, the repair of doors and windows, the painting of rooms and other repair work. Two houses in Mission Park will be worked on per year, Reed said.

The Committee also approved the purchase of a new boiler, planned renovations for the biology and geology labs, and discussed the possibility of building faculty townhouses.

BSU met trustees

Coordinators of the Black Student Union (BSU) met with trustees at a luncheon on Friday. The role of junior advisors in helping freshmen become more sensitive to minority issues was a major topic of discussion, Reed said. The BSU also urged the trustees to hire more black professors and to bring greater diversity to the faculty.

The trustees received an update on the alumni fund campaign and talked about preparations for a capital campaign to be held in conjunction with the college's bicentennial in 1993. The campaign consists of a 21 city trip by President Oakley in which he will meet with alumni leaders to discuss Williams' present financial and academic situation.

The trustees also discussed the current status of the proposed Massachusetts Museum of Contemporary Art and decided that if a bill currently before the state legislature that would fund the project does not pass soon, the trustees cannot continue to devote attention to the project.

The Executive Committee also noted the progress of renovations of the Williams Club in New York and announced a new agreement with the Mystic Seaport program that makes the director of the program a member of the Williams faculty.

The Instruction Committee formally approved the tenure recommendations of the Committee on Appointments and Promotions (CAP), Reed said. The CAP had recommended the following five assistant professors for tenure: Emily Apter, Romance languages; David Dethler, Geology; Gail Hershalter, History; Williams Lenhart, Computer Science; and Williams Wooters, Physics.

Cold taps and hot tempers

As it concludes its evaluation of the functioning of the party policy, the Committee on Undergraduate Life (CUL) appears concerned about the behavior of people waiting in line for beer.

The CUL had considered contacting team captains as a way of alleviating the problem. However, a majority of College Council members disapproved of that method. We disapprove as well. The real problem lies not in the people around the keg but in the organization of the parties themselves.

People in line for beer at parties become impatient and rude when they have to wait a long time. If the sources of beer at a party were increased, either by using cold taps or by tapping more than one keg at once, the lines would decrease noticeably.

Cold taps would speed up the flow of beer and shorten the wait. At more than three hundred dollars for a deposit, these taps threaten house budgets, because they can be broken easily. One solution to this potential cost would be for all house presidents to agree to provide a collective insurance policy on all cold taps. If any house had one damaged, all would contribute to its repair or replacement.

Another solution to the "keg etiquette" problem would be to tap more than one keg at a time. Although this might not be worth it at a two-keg party, such a move at a party with several kegs would reduce crowds around the keg.

Another change being considered by the CUL would serve to prolong parties where two kegs had been tapped at once. This change, which would permit neighboring houses to file party plans for the same night with a cumulative total of more than eight kegs, would allow for larger parties, but over a greater area.

The added space at contiguous parties would enable a large number of people to attend without creating the crowding typical of large house parties.

The problems being examined by the CUL result from a high concentration of people, either around a keg or at a party. Increases in the number of taps and the amount of space will permit big parties without big problems.

Fans should see team in big game

To the Editor:

The Williams-Amherst rivalry is as intense in competitive spirit as anything I have ever seen. The sporting events as well as educational challenges are integral parts of this rivalry. Therefore, I write to question the athletic department and its director for scheduling the Williams-Amherst hockey game for mid-winter break, a time when many students are off campus and would not be able to attend the game.

I have heard that the game is scheduled at this time in order to stop fan violence. If this is true, the college chose the harshest solution to such a problem. If there were fights in previous crowds, it would take a simple increase in security to stop this violence.

If this is not true, the athletic department is denying the student body the opportunity to participate in the rivalry and is preventing the hockey team from receiving the support it deserves. The scheduling of the game over break is an insult to the hockey team and the Williams-Amherst rivalry itself.

WASP mentality disturbs alumnus

To the Editor:

[Editor's note: The following is a copy of a letter written to the President of the College Francis Oakley.]

I recently received a notice of the Britain by Sea itinerary for Williams alumni; I enclose a copy.

Please note the opening sentence: "You are invited to explore the beauty and ancestral roots of our heritage in Britain, appropriately by sea in a characteristically intimate Williams manner."

More anglophilic than any Briton of my acquaintance, I would be the first to argue the British cultural heritage of the United States. However, my "ancestral roots" lie elsewhere, on the Continent; and those of other Williams alumni lie on other continents altogether.

From the perspective provided by your own birth, I hope that you will appreciate my reaction to the implication that Williams alumni are or ought to be WASP's. To be sure, my quarrel is not with the literal meaning of the sentence, but with what it implies; I doubt that a Yugoslavia by Sea itinerary would have inspired similar ancestral rhetoric.

As for the characteristically intimate Williams manner, I decline comment. I am withholding any further contributions to the alumni fund pending resolution of these concerns.

Red Cross wants you to give blood

To the Editor:

In February 1984, Williams' participation in the Red Cross blood drive, held quarterly at the First Congregational Church, reached a high of 361 students. In October 1987, student participation was down 53% to a 1980's low of 168 students. This represents a discouragingly low 8% of the student population. On February 8 and 9, the American Red Cross Blood Services-Northeast Region returns to Williamstown. I strongly urge all of you to take some time out of your day to support their effort by giving blood.

Blood Services Northeast Region supplies more than 90% of the blood in Massachusetts and Maine, distributing multiple blood components and derivatives to over 150 hospitals. The Northeast Region receives no direct financial support from the United Way or from government agencies, relying instead upon the generous assistance of volunteers. School and college blood drives supply the Red Cross with 24% of its blood collection. Do not allow yourself to believe, even for a moment, that your lack of participation is without repercussion.

There is no controversy surrounding this issue. It takes some time to go through the process and it may hurt a bit when the sterile, non-reusable needle is used to draw your blood, but that's as negative as it gets. Your body replaces the lost fluid volume within 24 hours, the health history form is confidential, and it is not possible to contract the AIDS virus by donating blood.

It is not my purpose to understand why Williams' student participation in 1987 was only 63% of its 1984 level. I don't care why Williams students are not contributing to the Red Cross' efforts. Blood must be available 24 hours daily, 365 days annually, in every community. Every 50 seconds in the Northeast Region, a Red Cross blood component is transfused. My purpose is to make you aware of the continuous need for blood and the significance of your contribution. Please help meet this need by participating in the Winter Blood Drive on February 8 and 9 at the First Congregational Church directly across from Baxter Hall.

Tardiness of '87 Gul is explained

To the Editor:

Publication and distribution of the 1987 Guillemensian has been unavoidably delayed due to the loss of approximately one-third of the book, 90 pages, in the mail. This loss required the reprint of many photographs and the completion of new layouts and copy. All possible measures have been taken to expedite the yearbook's publication and delivery is tentatively scheduled for mid-March or early April.

Mr. Root's letter last week was regrettable in that, as a former staff member, he chose not to speak directly to me, but to the editor of the 1988 Gul. While there was a brief delay in the completion of the last third of the book, this fact did not cause the extreme delay in delivery, which is solely and directly attributable to the loss of the pages. Indeed, as of September 15th, the book's delivery was on schedule. The first 166 pages of the yearbook were completed and shipped approximately on schedule, despite staff and photography difficulties last year. What Mr. Root is entirely correct in stating is his belief that the Gul remains a viable and healthy Williams Institution. Thanks to the diligent work of Blair Newton, Marissa Reddy and Orion Howard, the 1988 Gul is well under way.

I am very sorry about the delay in the 1987 Gul. At the same time, however, I am very excited over its imminent publication. Having laid out a majority of the book (including certain sections twice) I can confidently say that the 1987 Gul, while remaining faithful to certain yearbook traditions, promises some innovative changes.

Please direct any inquiries about the 1987 Gul to me. Thank you for your continued support.

Modern students need Latin American studies

by Jocelyn Shadforth

In President Oakley's opening remarks to the Committee on Educational Policy in September, he charged the Committee with examining and evaluating the curriculum for its relevance to minority students and its success in exposing liberal arts students to cultural traditions beyond the United States and Europe. In order to complete this task, the CEP has circulated a questionnaire to department and program chairs asking them to enumerate course offerings that are primarily or partially devoted to minority concerns and to enclose syllabi whenever possible.

In addition to this questionnaire, the CEP has met with the Campus Commission on Race Relations to discuss the curriculum evaluation and the CRR's meetings with the leaders of minority student organizations. At this meeting, CRR chair Timothy Cook said that a significant concern of members of VISTA, the Hispanic student organization, was the lack of a Latin American Area Studies program as a formal part of the curriculum. Cook noted that when the Area Studies programs were first instituted, the omission of Latin American Studies was necessary due to staffing difficulties.

Five years later, however, this troublesome gap still exists. Without a cohesive program of Latin American Studies, the college's commitment to minority curricular concerns must be called into question. Latin American Studies is a necessary part of any liberal arts curriculum that purports to be preparing students for dealing with the complexities of an increasingly interdependent world.

The need for a program in this area becomes apparent simply after watching the evening news. American political and economic concerns in the region, which have led to direct involvement in local insurgencies and unrest, obligate Williams students to become more informed as to the cultural and historical traditions of the region. It is primarily through education that we will be able to formulate and sustain opinions and, perhaps, courses of individual action directed at the ongoing conflict in Latin America.

Furthermore, as our hemisphere's neighbor, Latin America's future is increasingly intertwined with that of the United States. To understand the language, culture and politics of the region is to further understand ourselves.

There are other, less self-interested, reasons which necessitate a Latin American Area Studies program. It certainly sends a mixed message to prospective Williams students that the preeminent liberal arts college in the nation is unable to field a program of concentration in a field that appears central to the Area Studies concept. Indeed, the lack of a Latin American Studies concentration conflicts with the stated goals of increased minority recruitment, particularly in the case of Hispanic students. At the Race Relations panel held first semester, Hispanic students were referred to as the "invisible minority." Although efforts are being made to recruit more Hispanic students from inner-city schools and homes where English is a second language, the lack of a program concerned with Hispanic culture perpetuates the role of Hispanics as an invisible and ignored minority.

With the expansion of Area Studies and program concentrations to include regions and concerns all over the globe, the "ghettoization" of courses relevant to minorities becomes a legitimate worry. Exposure to non-US, non-European traditions should be integrated into a liberal arts curriculum, not just shunted into a "special interests" slot. The proliferation of increasingly narrow Area Studies programs should be avoided, in order to foster such integration. The development and maintenance of a program in Latin American Studies, however, is a fundamental component of any Area Studies program. As such, a Latin American Studies program can only strengthen and vitalize this college's commitment to excellence and to all of its students.

Jocelyn Shadforth, a member of the CEP, is a former Assistant News Editor of the Record.

Preston Washington '70 speaks on role of students and other issues

Part two

Q: At a recent forum on campus race relations, students were asked whether or not they thought there was a racial "problem" at Williams. Most responded "yes," but a significant number said "no." How would you explain this, and is this phenomenon central to the challenges that both black and white students face today?

A: Well when we say racial "issue," that's where the fuzziness comes in. Or racial "problem." Very often, that's the way things are phrased, which suggests, just psychologically speaking, that black people represent a problem — they pose a threat, a problem. I like to look at it another way: is the black presence at Williams taken seriously, is there a black presence? Is there a serious black presence? What resources exist throughout the academic community to affirm the black reality, without having to have separate, special days all the time?... I throw the ball back at Williams and ask, "Is there a serious reckoning with black life and black reality?" And I think that's an issue that America's going to have to face because Williams produces the intelligentsia of America, and that intelligentsia will go out into the real world, and not be prepared to deal with the real world....

Q: Is it the responsibility of the college administration or the students to instigate and implement radical changes on campus? In other words, who should lead in making such changes?

A: Well, it obviously is a question of insight. That is, if an administration sees, and senses, that it's time for change, it ought to do so. And Williams has a habit, I think this is correct, as many schools do, of following what other schools tend to do. I mean, there seems to be a kind of inter-fraternal mechanism that denies, in many instances, the possibility for creative expression and for newness....

Q: Do you think that the risk that you took needs to or should be taken by black students today?

A: I think that all students ought to have their own independent spirit.... Students are students, and they ought to be able to integrate, in their intellectual formation, an independent judgement about issues that affect their lives — the issue of apartheid in South Africa, for example. I mean, I don't want the administration to determine for me where and when or if I should have a demonstration in protest against apartheid. That ought to be the option that students arrive at based upon their passion for justice.... You know, you can't always expect the University to be on the right side, or on the side of humanity, very often. Because they have buildings to build, classes to hold, and a school to run, but that may not necessarily always be a good thing. And because of the independence of the students and their passion and concern about the very things that they're supposed to be studying, they ought to be able to find how to put that in operation....

can satisfy the specific needs of black students?

A: I think that it has to be worked on continuously, but I do. All black people are not the same. Some blacks can go to a Howard University and feel quite comfortable — my best friend was an electrical engineering student at Howard. He felt very comfortable being in the big city and being at a big university. I enjoyed being at a small college where I could sit down and speak with my faculty members over coffee in Baxter Hall, to go to the refectory and just hang out. And, inevitably, I'd run into somebody there who would take an interest in me.... And as I look at the black student presence on campus, black students here thrive. They get involved in any variety of things. I mean, black students on the lacrosse team, you know, on the canoeing team, going skiing, what have you. The school is that kind of a supportive community. And I am not an enemy of Williams by any stretch of the imagination; I'm glad to be back. This school has been very helpful in my own intellectual and emotional development as a person. And I would have probably died a serious spiritual and intellectual death at a large school....

Q: Do you have any closing remarks or statements?

A: Yes.... I know Williams is interested in bringing more faculty here; there's always this need for qualified [black faculty]. It might be necessary for Williams to develop a cadre of young intellectuals who don't have the PhD, but to prepare them and to nurture them and to undergird their work, and give them a handsome salary so that they could come here. Because it's going to be hard attracting people from the inner city or from black communities to this place, because it's just not along the beaten path. You know, it's a beautiful place, but it's just not along the beaten path. So the incentives have got to be made. I'd be interested to know if Williams would be interested in developing a portfolio that would connect with some of the black institutions and would maybe create a fraternal relationship with some of the more advanced black colleges.... And maybe have faculty exchanges. Maybe to do some collaborative work in relation to developing literary journals. To think of the black community in partnership rather than as a recipient of white liberal benevolence?

Rev., prof. claim assault

A Williams professor and a visiting alumnus have made application for complaints of assault and battery against one another in Northern Berkshire District Court.

Police advised Visiting Professor of English Robert Christman to make application for a complaint against the Reverend Muhammad Kenyatta '66 on Monday, January 18, after Christman alleged to police that Kenyatta had caused a small cut on his lip and knocked his glasses to the ground, breaking them, in an incident earlier that evening.

But last Wednesday, Kenyatta alleged to police that Christman had grabbed him by the coat, wrist and hands and held him briefly in the same incident on Monday night.

Police advised Kenyatta to make application for complaint against Christman in district court.

A show cause hearing, at which a clerk magistrate hears the facts of a case and determines whether they warrant the issuance of a complaint, is scheduled for February 2. If a complaint is issued, a judge will hear the case.

Christman and Kenyatta both declined comment when questioned about the incident.

Christman, a visiting professor for second semester, is teaching a freshman seminar on the Harlem Renaissance. Kenyatta is teaching a winter study course on the moral philosophy of Martin Luther King, Jr.

The alleged incident occurred around 8:00 p.m. on Martin Luther King Jr. day, a national holiday, near Brooks-Rogers recital hall, police said.

Acting Dean of the Faculty George Goethals said that neither Christman nor Kenyatta had contacted the college about the incident, and that the college has no plans to take any action on it.

Police said they have investigated the incident.

Smith berates the media

Increased power of the media has changed the kind of candidates who are elected to office in the United States, with negative implications for the legislative process, according to Hedrick Smith '55.

Smith delivered his message to a packed audience at Brooks-Rogers Recital Hall last week in a lecture entitled "The Washington Power Game."

A Pulitzer Prize-winning Washington correspondent for the The New York Times Magazine and former correspondent in Moscow, Cairo and Saigon, Smith is the author of the best-selling book The Russians and a trustee of the college.

"The ways you get power in Washington have changed," he said, noting that the increased power of the media has created what he termed "outside politicians," who are more adept at getting personal influence and recognition through appearing on television than at getting legislation passed through Congress.

"We have campaigns that reward skills that are not the real skills needed once the candidates are in office ... Elements of theatre, drama are not what is really needed to get bills passed."

Smith also said that the President's role in Washington's power-sharing has been overplayed by the media.

"The media gives a lopsided picture of how government works ... It pictures the president as sort of a John Wayne figure."

Smith compared President Reagan with a British monarch, calling him a symbolic figurehead, and said that those who have been driving key policies since 1982 have been people other than the president, who function as prime ministers for the government. Leaders who have effectively been prime ministers at different times during the Reagan administration, according to Smith, include former Federal Reserve chairperson Paul Volker, Senate minority leader Robert Dole and former speaker of the House Thomas (Tip) O'Neill.

Smith said that the increased power of Congress since the early-middle 1970s has made the Congressional coalition and consensus making process much more important. But, because of the decline of political parties, he said legislators are not able to effectively work within that process.

"We have a new breed of politicians who have very little sense of loyalty to their parties ... They go their independent ways ... It has become hard to reach agreements on legislation," he said.

Smith also expressed concern over recent voting trends in elections.

"We have now 20 percent of swing-voters in the middle who vote the paralysis ticket," he said. "You are putting into power forces that are opposed to each other."

Because people do not always vote for politicians of the same party, he said, the decline of political parties is in some ways inevitable. Smith also said people sometimes tend to vote on the basis of personalities of the individual candidates rather than on their party affiliations.

"Stop thinking that if we pick the right president, everything will be well worked out," he said. "The president makes only a marginal difference ... Next time you vote, please vote for senators and congressmen of the same party as the president."

Faculty-staff briefs

Robert Fowler has resigned as Director of Housing effective January 31. Winthrop Wassenar, director of the physical plant, said the college will begin advertising nationally and locally for a replacement for a July 1 starting date. According to Wassenar, Secretary of Housing Linda Brown will take up some of the slack until then, as will the Deans office and physical plant personnel.

Associate professors Iona Bel (English) and Michael Brown (Anthropology) have each been awarded $27,500 fellowships from the National Endowment for the Humanities. Bell's fellowship will enable her to complete a book on "Renaissance Love Poets and Renaissance Ladies." Brown's project, entitled "Myth and Politics in a Peruvian Guerilla Conflict: Satipo 1965," will analyze a rural guerilla conflict that convulsed Peru's central Amazonian region in 1965.

The Dickens Society has awarded Assistant Professor of English Suzanne Graver the Robert B. Partlow Jr. Prize for her essay "Writing in a 'Womanly' Way and the Double Vision of Bleak House."

Security Supervisor Jean Thorndike has been appointed Assistant Director of Security. She will retain many of her current responsibilities and will also administer the student monitor program and explore new ways to educate the college community about security issues.

The college has recently published "From Dante to Garcia Marquez: Studies in Romance Literatures and Linguistics," a book of essays to honor Anson Conant Piper, William Dwight Whitney Professor of Romance Languages Emeritus at the college. The book contains 32 essays by Piper's colleagues, friends and former students. Piper taught at Williams for 37 years and retired in June 1986.

Assistant Professor of Biology Michael Lynes, who is currently on leave, has been awarded a three-year, $217,750 grant from the National Science Foundation for research on "Immunological Analysis of Plant Membrane Differentiation." He will use the grant to study the composition, structure and contributions to cellular activity of the outer membrane of the plant cell, the plasma membrane.

Jim Shepard lives the novel life

by Ann Mantil

"Jim Shepard, who has been much praised for his first novel, Flights, confirms here that he is a superb literary technician," read the New York Times Book Review of November 9, 1986, lauding Shepard's second and latest published novel, Paper Doll. Shepard, an assistant professor of English at Williams since 1983, has never had any kind of war experience. He said he spent three years researching this book about the crew members of a B-17 aircraft during World War II.

"The novel probably began with talks with my father, who was a dorsal turret gunner in a B-25," he said. "It was peculiar to me why those particular stories stayed with me so much."

Despite these memories as an impetus, Shepard resisted writing the book for a year: "Part of it was that I was absolutely daunted by me writing a war novel."

He said that he eventually rejected the idea of writing about only what he's experienced.

"How can I write about a woman? Or a Republican? ... It's unlikely that Herman Melville was ever obsessed by a great white whale."

Shepard said he felt that fiction was a good medium for war literature.

"Fiction presents to us the thing, in order to convey the feeling," he said. "It doesn't show us what to think, but what thinking is ... We're told in all sorts of ways that our lives are unimportant. This sort of writing shows us that they are."

histories. He said that he found all sorts of misconceptions about war during the course of his research.

"One of the most persistent ways that the public misunderstands war is the sense that the war was fought by thirty-five-year-olds, a pack of Clark Gables." The average age of the men fighting the battle depicted in Shepard's novel was nineteen.

Paper Doll is Shepard's second novel. His first, Flights, was the story of a Catholic boy growing up in Connecticut, obsessed with flying. Shepard said that he modeled the main character after himself.

"There's a part of me in all my characters. I'd worry if there was a character with absolutely nothing of me in it."

New support groups offer understanding to students

by Rob Welsberg

While students this Winter Study have been gathering for purposes as disparate as celebrating Woody Allen's neurotic nature and recreating the glorious 70s, some have come together with a more serious purpose, as members of newly formed support groups.

Two new groups, one for people coping with grief and one for children of alcoholics, aim to help their members deal with their problems as they support each other.

One of the programs is the Grief and Loss support group, begun this fall and sponsored by the Chaplain's Office. Chaplain to the College Carol Pepper started the group in September to give students who are experiencing grief a chance to find comfort with others in similar situations. Acting Associate Chaplain Kathy McNeely said, "McNeely became the sponsor later."

"I'm there to help people sort through things ... to supply a bit of direction for the group," McNeely said.

The group meets once a week, with four or five students present on average. The discussion does not follow any specific schedule. Instead, McNeely said, "Like any support group, the meeting is not dominated by any agenda. People just share their feelings, what they're going through."

As far as the success of the group, McNeely said that the program is meeting its goal of helping students deal with grief, though there were problems at the start in getting students to feel comfortable with each other.

"Initially, the problem with most support groups is trust. It took a while for people to warm up to each other. It's hard to share something extremely painful. But the students saw they were not alone," she said.

Good grief

Along the lines of the Grief and Loss group, McNeely sponsored a Free University course called "Good Grief." The course, she said, incorporated screenings of the video series entitled "On Death and Dying," created by psychologist Elizabeth Kubler Ross.

"It consists of interviews by Ross, talking with people experiencing different stages of grief over a dying loved one. It's aimed at those close to the dying," she said. "The idea seemed timely in the wake of Charlie Huford's '89 death, especially with the support group already in place."

Another support group created recently to help students deal with difficult situations is the Children of Adult Alcoholics program. According to one student (who asked not to be identified), this group was student-initiated in the fall to help students deal with the particular problem of having alcoholic parents.

"Several students felt there was a need of a group of this kind. We went to the infirmary and asked for funding, and they agreed to help us," she said.

Traditional Zing way of life continues in Dodd barroom

by Daniel Drezner

In the beginning, there are seven. Then play starts. Veteran players run where they expect the ball to land for their turn. Beginners stare blankly, praying that they will be able to hit the ball back on the table. Around and around the ball travels, sometimes taking strange bounces because of the juilo (spin) it sustains. The players flail at the small ball, until someone misses and receives a dreaded point.

The game in question, Zing, a Dodd tradition, warrants an explanation for the uninitiated. Zing is a variation on ping pong, played without the net, which was ruined three years ago. Dodd residents say the game helps unite them.

"Dodd people do two things together-eat and play zing," Dodd member Mike Dorsal '90 said.

After the serve, the player must wait for the ball to roll off the table and bounce on the floor once. He then must hit the ball back on to the table, where the next player waits for the same thing to happen. Hitting out of turn, or any other infraction of the rules, gives the player a point. After seven points, the player is out.

Play continues. The serve is simple; it is like ping pong, but the ball must hit the table three times before hitting the ground. The ball shoots across the table repeatedly. The rally seems endless until someone is "extinguished" and gains a point.

The game is played in the Dodd bar room. At one end of the court, a fire extinguisher box protrudes from the wall. The ball bounces off the table, hits the floor, hits the extinguisher and leaps away from the player who is supposed to hit it. He is extinguished, gaining another point.

Points are accumulated rapidly by the beginners, until one is knocked out. The person who hit to him gladly takes the ball again and serves it. Knocking someone out means that a point is deducted from her score. Six players are left standing. Play continues.

A Zing historian sits by and watches the game, explaining its origins. When the ping pong net was ruined three years ago, there was a delay in getting a new net, so an anonymous Doddite invented the game. A Zing cult following has evolved at Dodd house.

"Ping pong is a game, football is a sport, and Zing is a way of life," said William April '89, a Zing veteran.

A Zing player in action, fighting to avoid points that will "extinguish" him.

(Rifkin)

The game stops as another person misses the table completely and is knocked out. Five players remain.

The fewer the players, the faster the game. The game is also faster when there are an odd number of players. Although the ball can bounce off anywhere on the table, it generally rolls off the two short sides. An odd number of people means that the player usually has to run to the other side in order to hit his next shot.

Another player is eliminated after hitting a "brick," a ball that bounces off the table and hits a wall before touching the floor. The contest is down to four warriors.

According to most Zing players, the game could not be played anywhere else on the planet. "If Zing was played somewhere else, this room would have to be recreated for it," said John Berger '89. The bar room has many quirks besides the extinguisher, including a Coke machine, a fireplace mantle, and a couch, all of which play a role in the game.

Soon there are only two people left in the game. They hit the ball across the table as if in a tennis rally, until someone loses the point, which gives him six. Six points sends the player "knocking on death's door" in Zingese. On the next rally, he is exterminated. The whole game has taken about ten minutes.

The winner holds up his paddle and asks, "Anyone for another game?" Most people, addicts to the Zing "way of life," play again.

CC discusses keg etiquette

"We agreed the party policy is workable the way it is," Virginia Demaree '88, College Council liaison to the Committee on Undergraduate Life (CUL), told the council at its meeting last Thursday. Demaree was reporting to the council on the CUL's investigation of the college's revised party policy, which went into effect in April of last year. Besides party policy, topics discussed at last Thursday's College Council meeting included the calendar, changes in the athletics department, proposed math department curriculum changes and a Division III course survey.

Demaree said the CUL is concerned with the pushing and shoving that accompanies long lines at kegs of beer at parties. She said some CUL members suggested that discussion with sports team captains may be a step that could be taken to help alleviate the problem.

"We need someone to be figureheads for a movement," Demaree said. She said the CUL wanted the College Council to deal with this aspect of the party policy.

Council president Carter Zinn '88 said, "What it comes down to is keg etiquette." Council members raised objections to the idea of meeting with team captains.

"I think it really should be focused more on campus-wide keg etiquette," said Amy Scott '90. By an informal show of hands, a majority of the Council rejected the idea of meeting with captains.

Zinn announced two developments in the area of athletics. He said that Robert Peck, chairperson of the physical education department, supports the formation of an independent student committee on athletics to be established this spring. Zinn also announced that Assistant Professor of Physical Education Christine Mason has been named to a new part-time administrative position in the Athletic Department. She will act as a liaison between athletic teams and the department and absorb some of the workload overflow from the department.

Council Vice President Nicole Melcher '88 reported to the council on the Calendar and Scheduling Committee. A survey conducted by the committee showed that students oppose the new calendar by a ratio of three to one. Melcher, with council support, plans to tell the faculty that the council advocates a change in the calendar as soon as possible. Melcher said, however, that a change will probably not occur until 1989-90. Professor Donald Beaver, who chairs the committee, has said that the faculty could vote to change next year's calendar this spring if it is as opposed to the present calendar as students are.

Professor of Mathematics Frank Morgan, who was present at the meeting, informed the Council about proposed changes in the math curriculum, answered questions and took suggestions from the council. The changes include expanding calculus to three one semester long courses, offering a new course for non-majors entitled "The Math of Finance" and offering an alternative for math majors who want to take fewer courses in the mathematical field.

"I think the moves are a positive effort on their part to make their department more attractive."

A survey on Division III courses, to be completed by houses at snacks, was passed out to all house representatives. According to council secretary Trace Blankenship '89, the data from the survey will be used if the Council asks for changes in Division III courses. Mitch Wong '89, one of the designers of the survey, said overall the survey asks students about the educational value of Division III courses and if they think certain Division III courses are too easy.

The Cap & Bells production of David Mamet's Glengarry Glen Ross will be performed on Monday, January 25 through Wednesday, January 27 at Downstage, Adams Memorial Theatre. Tickets are $1 and are available one hour before the show or at the door.... On Tuesday, January 26, students in Stephen Walt's Winter Study Program will give a Chamber Music recital at 8 PM in Brooks-Rogers Recital Hall. Admission is free.... At 4:30 on Wednesday, January 27, also in Brooks-Rogers, students from Jennifer Bloxam's Winter Study will give their program of Early Music performances. Admission is, again, free.... That evening, WALLWORKS artist, William Ramage, will give a lecture on his work. A reception in Museum Atrium will follow.... Pulitzer Prize-winning dramatist Arthur Miller, New York Times Journalist Herbert Mitgang, and Professor of Theatre at Williams David Eppel will participate in a three-day symposium on "The Struggle for Artistic Freedom", beginning on Friday, February 5 at 8:00 PM in the Adams Memorial Theatre. The panel is free and open to the public.

She said that the funding was to cover the costs of books, films or other educational materials that could be useful at the meetings. Many of these, she said, are suggested by psychological counselors at Williams. The role of the psychological staff does not extend much beyond that, she said.

"They don't come unless we ask, if we feel we need them. Generally, it's not necessary."

Like the Grief and Loss group, the Adult Children of Alcoholics group aims, as the student said, "to let people know there are others out there who share the experience. People need courage to come." She added that the group meets every Tuesday at 7 p.m. in the O'Connell room of Thompson Memorial Chapel.

Musician fulfills promise of belly laughs

by Sean Timmons
Gordon Meyers, baritone, gave a concert of humorous music entitled "The Art of Belly Canto" last Wednesday night. Edwin Lawrence, piano, and Douglas Moore, cello, assisted Meyers in this season's eighth Thompson concert.

The evening featured the comic genius of many composers, foremost among them Meyers himself. After opening with "Wretched Tattle: How Peacefully You Sit There," from "The Belly Cantata", Meyers informed his audience that if they did not enjoy the evening's performance they might all "go to Hell", from which point things only got sillier.

The highlight of the evening was Heily-Hutchinson's version of "Old Mother Hubbard" (1929). While the song itself was nothing more than a nursery rhyme set to music, Meyers made his performance hilarious by singing it as Luciano Pavarotti might, complete with melodrama, and a final bow with a large handkerchief. Indeed, the baritone's ridiculous smile was very much like the one which often appears on the Italian tenor's face.

Other notable moments included Meyers' performance of "We Have the Best Noses", an early eighteenth century song celebrating the proboscis, and "The Little Worm", by Henry E. Sachs, in which one end of a worm makes a pass at the other end.

Meyers own pieces included news fillers set to music, in which the audience learned that, "Crows eat the eggs and young of other birds", and, "Deer, moose, and elk have no gall bladders." Another suite was aphorisms of Poor Richard, including, "If your head is Wax, don't go out in the sun", and, "He that lieth down with dogs, waketh up with fleas." These pieces did not display any great musical artistry, but Meyers' realizations of these somewhat ludicrous texts were imaginative and witty.

The only disappointing element of the concert was that Meyers' selections became predictable towards the end, where they had been hilarious at the beginning.

There was, however, one piece, "Il Bove" (The Cow) by Villa-Lobos, that did not seem funny at all, perhaps because its musical content was so overwhelming that it distracted from the humorous aspects of the text; in this piece, the composer set to music a love poem from a cow to a bull in a neighboring field. While the text was somewhat funny, the passionate intensity of the music made a funny little song into a moving musical experience.

As an encore, Meyers presented renditions of the fragments of songs that are often printed on the backs of sheet music. While the songs themselves were not particularly funny (schlocky, perhaps, but not purposely humorous), the spectacle of a musician stopping in the middle of a bar for want of music was hilarious, as was most of the evening's performance.

played a great game. He was the difference." Freshman Than Healy added 14 points and 12 boards for the Ephs.

"It was an excellent win for us," Sheehy said. "We overcame a festive and involved crowd, executed our gameplan well, and finally came up with some big baskets when we needed them."

Bash Bowdoin

The following day, Williams surged to a 35-34 halftime lead against the Bowdoin Bears despite poor shot selection and sloppy play. The Ephs answered their second half wake-up call, improving their offensive execution while limiting Bowdoin's Big Joe Williams to zero points for the half. Major again paced the Ephs, this time tallying a game high 19 points. Melchionni continued his fine play with 15 points, and Freshman Jeff Miller responded to the pressure of his second start with 10 points and 9 boards.

Sheehy said he was pleased with the team's weekend performance, quipping that "this is probably the first time since the 1950's or 60's that a Williams team has taken two games up in Maine. We needed two wins to save our season."

On Tuesday, Williams tried to cool the red-hot Middlebury Panthers. Than Healy started the game off with a thunderous dunk, igniting the Ephs to a 17-5 lead. Behind the hot shooting of Garcia Major, the Ephs extended their lead to ten, 65-55, with nine minutes left.

Battling back, the Panthers took their first lead of the game with 2:06 remaining, 75-74. A Bill Melchionni follow-up hoop evened the score at 77, but lighting struck Williams for the third time this year. With only two seconds to go, Pat Torpey nailed a top of the key three pointer to win the game.

Major turned in an outstanding performance in defeat, scoring 28 points while hauling down 7 rebounds. Additionally, Major stifled Panther ace John Humphrey into shooting a dismal 7 for 33 from the floor. The key statistic of the game, however, was offensive rebounding: Williams yielded 25 offensive boards to Middlebury.

The Ephs return to Chandler Gymnasium on Tuesday against Brandeis before traveling to Union on Thursday. Next Saturday, the Ephs complete round one of the Little Three at Wesleyan.

Employment

remain in Food Service, non-competitive wages and the lack of rewards or recognition for superior service.

In addition to Wick, seven other staff members serve on the Student Employment Review Committee: Student employment coordinator DeLorles Garnish, Circulation and Stock Supervisor Jo-Ann Trace (Library), Driscoll Hall Manager Rob Parkinson-Shutt, Security Officer Dave Murphy, Associate Dean Mary Kenyatta, Director of Personnel Rick Bullett and Assistant Provost Morton Schapiro. Four students serve on the committee: Wendell Chestnut '88, James Guerette '89, Felipe Milian '89, and Lorri Williams '88.

Decrease in hours

Part of the problem facing Food Service, Garnish said, is a decrease in the amount of hours put in by financial aid students. Financial aid students should be able to fill all the positions in Food Service, added Garnish.

"It seems clear that Williams College financial aid students work fewer hours than students at comparable colleges," Wick said.

According to Garnish, the college employed 1217 students during the 1986-7 school year. Slightly less than half of these, 600, were on financial aid.

All financial aid students have campus employment built into their aid package, Garnish said. Students can determine where they wish to work and how many hours they want to put in. Financial aid students are not required to work, though the vast majority do, she added. Garnish said she believes that many financial aid students are being drawn away from Food Service by the increasing number of other job opportunities on campus.

Workers want value

Many students who would otherwise work in Food Service are being drawn into jobs of a more academic nature, Wick said.

"Williams, unlike many sister institutions, has many research assistant and T.A. positions available. In a way it really draws from the work pool. Obviously students would like to do something with educational value."

The current lack of students to fill job openings in Food Service is a fairly new problem, according to Director of Food Services Jim Hodgkins. "Over the last 4 or 5 years the problem has become critical," Hodgkins said.

Hodgkins said he believes that students perceive a lack of respect for food service workers.

Parkinson-Shutt said that in the past 7 years, the number of students employed in Food Service has decreased from 590 to 437, a 26 percent drop. Without student employees, Food Service would not be able to operate, Garnish said.

ate, Garnish said.

Food Service student employees work an average of 2.6 hours per week, much less than student employees in other departments, Hodgkins said. Student employees average six hours per week in Security, six in Chemistry and nearly nine in the computer center, he said.

Retention problem

Parkinson-Shutt said he has found that the biggest problem in Food Service is retaining student employees. Many students, he said, stay with Food Service for a semester or less and then quit, creating training difficulties.

The problem is not confined to Williams, but is rather a national one, Parkinson-Shutt said. Wick said that most other colleges similar to Williams are also experiencing difficulties.

Because of the lack of students willing to work, Food Service has been forced to hire non-students, Parkinson-Shutt said.

Two other major student employers, the Library and Security, are having similar problems, Wick said. Officer Jean Thorndike said that Security was having trouble filling all their shifts, especially those on Friday and Saturday nights.

Trace said that although the Library has been able to fill all openings, it has been more difficult each semester. She anticipates some unfilled positions by second semester.

The committee will publish its findings in early March, Wick said, and changes will go into effect in the fall of 1988.

MoCA

art collections to the proposed museum.

It can only help

Bosley said that the Sonnabend announcement can only help MassMoCA's chances of receiving state support. "I think that having had the Panza collection, the Saatchi collection, the Sonnabend collection and others just reiterates the point that this will be a very successful museum."

He said that the House Ways and Means Committee took a voice vote on the bill last week, in which two legislators reserved the right to vote. Otherwise, the bill received strong support.

Bosley said that arguments in the House Ways and Means Committee against the bill came from two sources: legislators with other projects that need funding and those against the principle of the bill.

If the House passes the bill, it would require a recommendation from the Senate Ways and Means Committee and passage by the full Senate. The bill would then return to the House for confirmation.

Passage of the bill would allow MassMoCA planners to begin actual work on the museum.

Tuition

cent from gifts and grants; and four percent from other sources, including income from the rental of commercial properties on Spring Street.

Free school

In the past, Grabois said, endowment paid for a larger proportion of expenses. He attributed this change to the decrease in the endowment per student after 1967. He said this in turn was caused by the expansion of the student population with the admission of women to Williams.

"Williams was founded as a free school and my own preference is that it should become a free school again," Grabois said, referring to his desire for the revenue trend to be reversed so that the endowment provides more of a year's revenue.

"That would take about a billion dollars of endowment," Grabois said. "I would like tuition to be the smallest percentage it can be."

Grabois said that some people do not even apply to Williams because the tuition is so high, even though Williams has a need-blind admissions policy and promises to meet all demonstrated need through financial aid. He said that people are less likely to apply when they are unable to pay for the tuition independently.

Financial aid costs currently represent 12 percent of the educational expenditures, or around $4.5 million, Grabois said.

Season-maker stolen from men's hockey

by Ted Hobart

When sophomore Dave Bakken scored at 9:12 of the second period to give the Ephs a 3-0 lead against national powerhouse Bowdoin in Maine on Friday night, cries of "fee fie fo fum" might have been heard echoing from the corners of the arena as the sleeping giant that is Bowdoin hockey was roused.

The Polar Bears went on to score the next four goals, including the heart-breaking game-winning just over two minutes left in the contest. The Eph's record now stands at 4-9.

Will Putnam '89 opened the scoring, notching the only goal of the first period at the 13:16 mark, assisted by Bakken and Ron Van Belle. Putnam returned the favor early in the second stanza, as he and Sean Seguin '91 assisted on Van Belle's twelfth goal of the season.

Rob Abel '91 and Mike Swenson '89 picked up assists on Bakken's goal for the 3-0 lead before the 1600 stunned Polar Bear faithful. Bowdoin did not take long to answer, however, scoring their first just over three minutes later and pulling to within one with five minutes remaining in the evenly played second period.

Although Bowdoin erased the Eph margin just 4:10 into the third, Williams dominated play in first half of the final period, and goule Mark Morrison '88 kept the Polar Bears off the board for the next thirteen minutes. Morrison was sharp in the nets for the Ephs, turning away 41 Bowdoin efforts on the night.

Backbreaker

With five minutes remaining to play, Sean Seguin fed Rick Laferriere for the apparent go-ahead goal. The goal was disallowed, however, as Van Belle had been taken down by Bowdoin back-checkers and was called for being in the goal crease. The controversial call sealed the squad's fate, as Bowdoin's slick Swede Thomas Johansson decided the contest at 17:51.

On Saturday afternoon, the squad came out flat in a 7-3 loss against Colby in the second half of their Maine voyage. The defeat, at the hands of a much weaker opponent, was particularly disappointing following as it did the gutsy performance of the previous night.

The squad scored in each of the three periods, the first by Seguin on the power play with 13:26 gone in the game, assisted by Van Belle. Colby came back in the second frame, scoring three goals in the first ten minutes before Will Putnam scored to pull the Ephs within one. The goal, assisted by Van Belle and Seguin, marked the sixth consecutive game in which Putnam has scored and also upped Van Belle's assist total to 14.

Rob Abel's goal at 7:54 of the third, assisted by captain Dave Caswell, was sandwiched between pairs of Colby goals which widened the final margin to 7-3.

Tonight the squad is at West Point to face the Cadets, whom they beat last year in what was easily the most exciting action in Lansing Chapman last season. Over break, Chapman will be the slight of games against Amherst and Union.

"I try to overload one semester with my three most difficult courses, so that the other semester is left relatively free for the fiction."

He might someday give up teaching to become a full-time writer.

W. Hockey

As the month of January comes to a close, the women's hockey team finds itself struggling to maintain a .500 record against stiff competition. Last week the team faced two teams evenly matched with the Ephs, Colgate and MIT, as well as an RPI squad that had fallen to the team earlier in the season.

The results of the week showed a marked propensity toward that familiar .500 mark, as the team soundly thrashed RPI 9-4 before tying Colgate 0-0 and losing to MIT 1-0 to leave the skaters with a 3-4-1 slate.

The Colgate contest saw "two even teams playing excellent hockey" according to coach Jim Briggs, who also called the game "a great women's hockey game in every respect." Although a spectator might disagree from the lack of goals, great goaltending by Daisy Hagey '88 and hard back-checking by the entire team support Briggs' assertion.

In Cambridge on Saturday, the team experienced another tough battle. The contest featured reasonably equal teams playing a very even game until an MIT player made the difference in the second period with a skillfully placed shot over Hagey's shoulder. Coach Briggs commended Hagey's effort in the contest as well as the play of sophomore defenders Kristin Moomaw, Kara Lynch, and Hilary Klotz.

In men's giant slalom races, the team finished in a 6th place tie with New England College. Sophomore J. P. Parisien led the team by placing at 11th. Coach Fisher called Parisien's performance reasonable and said, "[Parisien] could have done much better; in the past he performed as well as a second place finish in that category."

On Saturday, both the men's and women's cross country relay teams failed to live up to their potential, placing 7th and 6th respectively. Coach Fisher attributed the women's team's weak 6th place finish to the fact that two of the team's best skiers, Captain Kathy Wolf '88 and Kristin Hansen '91, were absent from the carnival to participate at the U.S. Olympic ski team trials. Hansen qualified for the U.S. team in the World Junior Championships and will not

In a recent statement by the CUL liaison to the College Council, a suggestion was made regarding the control of the often rude "keg etiquette." The CUL suggested that to eliminate uncouth behavior around kegs at parties, the council might want to talk to all team captains to exert their influence in controlling behavior of team members at parties.

Although the purpose of the CUL's examination of behavior at parties is good, the suggestion evidences an unfortunate and often overlooked campus prejudice against athletes. CUL members are probably not perpetrating this bias consciously. Nonetheless they join the majority of Williams students in assuming that athletes are always the motivators of unruly behavior.

Just as no one on campus wants to be pigeon-holed into one group, athletes have a hard time maintaining an intellectual identity on a campus that paints them as hammerheads. Athletes are among the most visible members of the student body, and are viewed as social centerpieces, like it or not.

As a result, the various stereotypes extend past just the party atmosphere and unfairly into the classroom where professors have been known to warn their students at the start of the semester, "I do not like athletes. I just thought I'd tell you this before you take my course."

Coach Farley winces when fans at hockey games get out of hand because he is invariably approached by angry alumni, townspeople and administrators about "his" players' conduct. Similarly, many people in keg lines assume that the person who pushed ahead of them is a dumb jock. Too many times we have heard derogatory remarks about certain "cement heads" which are almost as malicious and dangerous as stereotyping minorities.

Many people see a Division I standout stammering unintelligibly on a TV interview and equate his academic standing with athletes in general. But just because Melvin Bratton at the University of Miami is majoring in Undergraduate Studies, and is always seen at parties, does not mean that Coach Farley's boys are any less intellectually capable than your average library rat.

Until we all learn to look past a person's physical characteristics or which dorm he/she lives in, the social problems we face on campus will be exaggerated by our misunderstanding of the situation.

Swimmers split with Bowdoin

by Kurt Oeler

Williams swimming suffered a split decision with the Bowdoin Polar Bears on Saturday. The men triumphed 131-84 while the women fell in a close meet, 137-131. Earlier in the week, the women nipped Smith College 136-132.

The men dominated their rivals, capturing every event save the sprint free races. Dan Snyder '90 enjoyed a triple-win day (1000, 500, and 400 free relay) and diver Scott Schwager '91 joined him with two individual wins.

Michael O'Malley '89 won the 200 free, leading placemen Paul Dehmel '91 and Jim Curry '91, while Chris Gliglio '89 nipped teammate Rob Benson '90 in the IM. Benson returned with a win in the butterfly and later qualified for Division III Nationals with a 4:16.89 exhibition 400 IM swim. Versatile Mark Canuel '88 continued his success with a victory in his new event, the backstroke.

Snyder, Dehmel, and Sean Watterson '91 crushed Bowdoin in the 500, followed by Evan Davis '89 and Scott Healy's '88 one-two finish in the breaststroke. Both the medley (Chris Cleurzo '90, Davis, Benson, Kurt Oeler '88) and free relays (Dave Brown '89, Snyder, O'Malley, Gliglio) swept past their opponents.

Coach Samuelson's women tried to play catchup with Bowdoin, but their late rally ran out of steam. Freestylers Michelle Freemer '90 (500, 1000) and Lee Beatty Schroeder '91 (50, 100) led Williams' surge, each with three-win performances. Connie Davis '90 and Anne MacEachern '90 joined the talented duo in the Ephs' 400 free relay win.

Nonetheless, Williams could only manage two wins in the stroke events. MacEachern captured the 100 breast and Dorie Lebeau '91 won the 200 back. Kathia Vandevenne '91 led an impressive one-two-four-five scoring romp in the diving.

Smith sunk

Against Smith, the visiting women earned a last-minute victory with their 400 free relay win. Freemer, Davis, MacEachern, and Schroeder justified their New England-leading position in that event, which finished the upset-minded Smith squad's hopes.

MacEachern, Lebeau, and

Schroeder each scored two individual wins to lead Williams. Caron Whitaker '91, much improved in the 1000, took the 200 fly. Both relays won, and Vandevenne surpassed the national qualifying standard to earn a trip to nationals.

The women's narrow loss Saturday jolted the mostly underclass Eph squad.

"Beating Bowdoin at New England's last year was our big achievement," noted sprinter Davis. "But this loss is our first to a Division III school."

The women's team must rebound quickly if they are to better their runnerup finish of last year and upend champion Tufts. As post-season competition nears, Coach Samuelson, beginning to take stock of his charges, continues to juggle the lineup, which still shows some weaknesses. On the men's team, recent performances promise success, particularly if the sprinting corps rounds into form.

The women carry a 4-3 mark into their home contest with Mount Holyoke Wednesday night, and the 4-2 men join them in a road meet at Springfield Saturday.

Men's hoops ends four game skid with two wins in Maine

by Michael K. Harrington

The men's basketball team traveled to Maine this past weekend hoping to end its four game losing streak. The squad's wishes came true as the Ephs held on to beat Bates 81-80 and surged past Bowdoin 73-67. The two victories left the Ephs at 7-5, as they dropped a thriller at Middlebury on Tuesday 80-77.

The Ephs bolted out to an early lead versus Bates, as Bill Melchionni's '89 dunk sparked a 20-7 Williams run. Withstanding fierce full-court pressure and a hostile crowd, the Ephs maintained their lead, 40-32, at intermission.

When Bates cut the lead to two late in the second half, Williams Captain Mike Masters '89 took control of the game. The junior guard stole the ball and converted a layup while being intentionally fouled. After Masters' two free throws, Garcia Major '90 nailed a three-pointer to give the Ephs a seemingly insurmountable nine point lead. Some late Bates baskets and creative officiating, however, cut the final margin to one, 81-80.

Major led the way for Williams, scoring 24 points, while Masters added 19 points, 5 rebounds and 7 assists. Said Coach Harry Sheehy, "Masters

Men's squash roughs up Jumbos at Tufts

by Alexander Rachmiel

After a harried week of playing against tough Ivy League competition, the men's squash team travelled to Medford on Saturday and took out some of their recent court frustration against Tufts. The Eph varsity nine's 6-3 victory at Tufts confirmed the 3-2 decision that the Williams top five had wrested from the Jumbos days earlier in the Team Nationals at Atlanta.

According to Williams coach Sean Sloane, the match was swung in the Ephmen's favor by "tough and determined" play at the low end of the Williams ladder. Numbers six, eight and nine players Pier Friend '88, Seth Packard '89 and Chris Pentz '91 all enjoyed 3-0 victories.

Packard played one of the best matches of his career, according to Sloane.

"In the past," said the coach, "Seth would relax when he had a lead. This time, for the first time in his career, he got better and better with each game." Packard concurred with Sloane's estimation of his match, saying that he "didn't choke," but played "consistent, intelligent squash."

The importance of the victories by Friend, Packard, and Pentz was highlighted by extremely close matches at four of the top five positions, as the five matches between the two schools in Atlanta were replayed. While the overall result (3-2 Williams) was the same, number five player Robby Hallagan was the only Eph to repeat his previous performance, winning in a 3-0 shut-out that Sloane praised as "merciless." Otherwise, past losses were avenged in every case. Williams' #1 Wendell Chestnut '88 and #4 Doug Gilbert '89, losers in Atlanta, beat their Jumbo opponents. #2 Lew Fisher '89 and #3 Dana Weeder '88, on the other hand, were beaten by the same Tufts players they had triumphed over in Atlanta.

Prior to the Win at Tufts, the Ephmen had suffered two losses at the hands of Ivy League opponents; a 6-3 setback against Dartmouth at the Indians' courts, and a 9-0 shellacking at home against Yale. Sloane shrugged off the loss to powerhouse Yale, calling them "out of our class." He was encouraged, though, by his team's play against Dartmouth.

A major factor in the Ephmen's tough play against Tufts was the fact that they had faced the Jumbos at the Team National Tournament in Atlanta the weekend of January 15th. Williams' top five, after losing 4-1 to Illinois in the opening round, with Weeder getting the only win, went on to finish fifth out of ten teams in the tournament's second division by winning their two consolation matches. One of these was the aforementioned 3-2 victory over Tufts, and the other a 3-2 win over the Washington, D.C. club National Capital, with Chestnut, Gilbert, and Hallagan winning individual glory. While the second Eph five lost both their matches 5-0, coach Sloane saw the tournament as a positive experience for the entire team, especially in the opportunities it afforded to watch the excellent play of such first division teams as Harvard and Yale. "Whenever you're around squash like that," said Sloane, "it's exciting."

Next up for the Ephmen is M.I.T., whom both the varsity and freshman teams will face on Saturday.

CC approves plan to revitalize the Log

by Bill Savadove

The College Council voted unanimously last week to approve funding for a proposal to revitalize the Log. The proposal, submitted by the Log Committee, calls for allocating $5,930 for this semester.

According to the Log Committee, the Log is underutilized at night. In order to bring it back to life, council financial support is necessary. The proposal calls for establishing the Log as a student center, with funding for nighttime non-food activities coming from the council instead of Food Service.

Entertainment

The proposal specifically outlines a structured entertainment schedule, and calls for the hiring of a student promotional coordinator who will work closely with the Log manager to schedule events. The proposal also calls for setting aside money for a general entertainment budget, buying a new stereo system as well as games and tapes, and publicizing the changes across campus.

The cost of the changes for the semester will be $3,500 for the Gargoyle pushes for more self-scheduled final exams

by Mariam Naficy

Williams students may see changes beginning next year in the regulations regarding work due in the frantic final weeks of the semester.

The possibility of an increase in self-scheduled final exams and corresponding concerns about the college honor code have been raised by the Gargoyle Society.

The Gargoyle Society first presented a proposal for an increase in self-scheduled exams to Dean of the College Stephen Fix last spring. The proposal coincided with Fix's examination of procedures for completing work at the end of a semester.

"I've had a sense for a while," Fix said, "that the arrangements we have for the end of the term need some scrutiny."

The issues that Fix said he is considering include: self-scheduled exams, conflicts in scheduling exams that are caused by a greater number of class hours than exam slots, the 24-hour time limit on take-home exams, the last day of classes being the fixed due date for papers, the E-deficiency rule that forbids students to take the final exam in any class in which they do not have a passing average.

Fix said he has consulted with a working group of administrators from the dean's office, the registrar's office and other offices in preparation for submitting recommendations to committees such as the Committee on Educational Policy and the Calendar and Scheduling Committee. These committees could then propose changes to the faculty for a vote.

"I'd like the college to have decided on these issues by the spring," Fix said. "If there are any changes, I'd like these changes to be in place by the fall term."

Gargoyle member David Kane '88 said, "The Gargoyles trusted Dean Fix, and each time that we met with him, spring and fall, I and others got the impression that his committee was meeting then. Fix is clever enough to have meant to give us this impression because he knew it would stall us."

Kane also said that Gargoyle asked Fix to place a student on the committee, but that Fix

Most faculty polled want to abolish winter study period

by Chuck Samuelson

A recent questionnaire sent to the Williams College faculty revealed that 61 percent of those responding would like to abolish Winter Study (WS) completely and start second semester at the end of January.

Fifty-eight professors responded to the poll, which was distributed to all the members of the faculty. Eighteen percent said that they would like to keep WS exactly as it is now, and 21 percent said that they'd like to make it more academically demanding.

The professors who responded to the poll had been at Williams for an average of 12 years and had taught an average of five WS classes. An overwhelming majority (95 percent) said that they felt they gave something up by teaching WS. Most of them, such as Assistant Professor of Computer Science Donald House, said that they give up "both research and time to prepare for spring semester courses."

On the other hand, 65 percent of those polled also said that they gained something by teaching a WS class.

"It's always satisfying to teach if a class goes well," Associate Professor of Classics Meredith Hopkin said, "And I like being with students in the informal atmosphere of WSP — also, in the regular semester I tend to meet non-classics students... only in large classes, so it's fun to meet them in smaller groups. And I like some of the courses I've taught for the opportunity I've had to explore new areas."

Assistant Professor of Economics David Fairris said he gained "The opportunity to explore with students uncharted territory in a more relaxed, egalitarian setting."

In trying to find an explanation for the faculty's somewhat paradoxical feelings about WS, the poll also inquired into their attitudes about preparation. Sixty-four percent did not expect the same work level from students during WS. Yet 57 percent said that their views of the educational purpose of WS had changed since they started teaching them, over half due to student approach WS. Only nine percent said that their view of

Trustees detail college role in MassMoCA

by Scott J. O'Callaghan

The Board of Trustees reaffirmed the commitment of Williams College to the proposed Massachusetts Museum of Contemporary Art (MassMoCA) when they met January 23. This underscores the very close relationship which has existed between the college as an institution and supporters of the project.

College Treasurer William Reed, secretary of the trustees, said that the trustees have been involved from the project's inception. Their action, he said, has been indirect, taking the form of approval of efforts from within the college. He said, "They view it from a very high policy area, to make sure we're not too involved, that we keep our attention to our main purpose, the education of students."

Term Trustee Arthur Levitt, Jr. '52 said that he has known about the project for about a year. Levitt will chair a trustee subcommittee that will consider action on MassMoCA if the project receives funding from the state legislature. He said, "I expect that if the legislature approves the money, we will evaluate the project in its totality... We will monitor the project from the college's point of view." He said that the subcommittee has not yet met, but will meet when significant developments occur.

In expressing their support for MassMoCA, the trustees

restated their belief that the college cannot give capital funding to the project. Trustee Charles Mott '53, chairperson of the Finance Committee, said, "As far as I'm concerned, the financial commitment [of the college to MassMoCA] is zero."

Reed said that if legislative funding is not provided by the end of this month, the trustees will consider the project dead. Sprague Technologies, Inc., which would donate its 28-building mill complex in North Adams to house the proposed museum, has said in the past that the end of February is effectively the end of the period they are willing to wait before selling the buildings the museum would occupy.

Self-Scheduled Suffering

The Gargoyle Society's call for more self-scheduled final exams and Dean of the College Stephen Fix's study of problems and conflicts at the end of the semester focus attention on the way Williams currently administers final exams.

Because fewer time slots exist for final exams than for classes, conflicts inevitably arise for some students. Even without conflicts between two finals, students often have a few exams scheduled close together. This imbalanced scheduling prevents thorough preparation for each final, resulting in unnecessary damage to a student's performance in a class.

The current system of scheduling exams needs greater flexibility. One possibility is to allow as many slots for exams as there are class hours. This solution, however, would extend the length of each semester. Another remedy would be to increase the number of self-scheduled exams.

Although certain finals, such as those in some art history, math and science courses require the presence of a professor to show slides or answer questions, many exams can be taken without a monitor.

If the majority of finals were self-scheduled, students could determine their own schedules within the same time period as is now allotted at the end of a term for finals.

Self-scheduled exams, however, raise questions regarding the honor code. Theoretically, because all students sign the honor code, they will not cheat regardless of the presence of a monitor or lack thereof. Realistically, one should simultaneously believe in the effectiveness of the honor code and acknowledge human weakness in the presence of enough temptation.

Because of the nature of self-scheduled exams, they present students with more opportunities to violate the honor code than does an unmonitored, self-scheduled exam. The college can take steps to reduce temptation while still offering more self-scheduled exams.

Students could take these exams in communal rooms such as in Griffin Hall or in Bronfman instead of in the library.

Additionally, the college could state explicitly the ways in which the honor code governs the taking of self-scheduled exams.

The current scheduling system for finals burdens students unnecessarily. A significant increase in the number of finals which are self-scheduled accompanied by practical measures for reducing the temptation to cheat would allow students the opportunity to prepare thoroughly for their exams and would preserve academic integrity.

Keg Kulture's kooks kry out

To the Editor:

We never thought that we'd be writing to your esteemed publication but boy are we ever upset about the ongoing Keg Krisis that was so movingly reported in the January 26 Record. As the no less than three "keg-etiquette" articles in that issue articulated, there most certainly is a grim specter looming ominously over the Purple Valley, one that threatens not only the social fabric of our community, but the very ideals that made this institution so nice in the first place. Kudos to the Record for putting this thought-provoking and timely issue ahead of such meaningless fluff as "Rev., prof. claim assault," and "Faculty-staff briefs."

Well after three days of teeth-gnashing, hyper-loving sophomores of medium build are ready to share our four-point plan with the Berkshires and the beer-drinking peoples of the world. Without further ado, we propose the following policy options as steps towards the speedy and efficient solution to the aforementioned keg crisis, possibly the most pressing problem yet to test the strength and integrity of our community:

1) Kapture the Keg. Under this plan, each party-goer is allocated a sash of a random primary color upon entrance to the solree. This sash will affiliate each student with a particular team, e.g. "Red team," "Blue team," or "Mauve team." At the sound of the starting pistol (fired by the "Budweiser Athlete of the Week" or Dean Fix — unless they are the same person) each team fights to gain possession of the keg. Once acquired, the keg is returned untapped to the Spirit Shop for a full refund and a couple of movies are rented. Remember, you don't need alcohol to have a good time.

2) Keg Rationing. The proven effectiveness of gas-rationing measures during the '73-'74 crisis is applied to the highly similar keg situation with a dramatic improvement projected for both waiting times and efficiency. All students with an odd S.U. Box number are permitted to drink on Monday, Wednesday and Friday, while those with an even number have access to beer on Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday. It is hoped that this measure would put an end to the panic-fueled early-morning line-ups seen at Mission Park during the peak of the January crisis. And, of course, nobody ever drinks on Sunday anyway, except sports team captains, who can drink whenever the hell they want to.

3) Easy-Access Beer Troughs. Taking on the whole keg/cup scenario as the heart of the problem, this plan alleviates these inherent structural difficulties by replacing the outmoded keg with an 8-foot long trough, perfect for sustained drinking. An assortment of plastic prizes (kazoos, toy boats, waterfowl, etc...) float inside as an added incentive. Novices and the squeamish can even be provided with cups for a nominal fee.

4) Hopkins Hall takeover. A non-violent takeover of the former home of our administration as a gesture expressing the overwhelming absurdity of the entire "keg-etiquette" issue, or at least its prominence in last week's Record. As Ghandi once said, "Nothing pressures a ruling elite so much as taking over a building under renovation and threatening to redecorate it in a nautical motif." And hey, if we did that, there just might be something interesting to report in an upcoming issue of the Record.

Change students to change school

To the Editor:

When I read the Gaudino Report, I was struck by the amount of thought that these people had put into the difficult job of figuring out ways to reshape our institution so as to encourage emotional involvement in learning. They deserve to be praised.

But I think a very obvious point is being overlooked. The reason the job is so difficult is that we are only allowing ourselves to consider indirect, secondary ways of changing the intellectual climate here. Build a new coffeehouse. Create new opportunities for independent study. And so on. All this is fine, but it's like trying to build a room that is particularly good at encouraging the people who live in it to think.

And that's an odd approach. The obvious thing to do is to be careful about what people you put in the room in the first place. What I'm saying is that the primary way of changing a college is to change the admissions policy. If we want to change Williams, we ought to have some substantive open discussion about admissions criteria.

When it comes down to it, we may not want to change. We would have to make

New interest is needed to put the Log back in the limelight

by Bill Hilty '88

Let's start by asking one basic question: "How many times have you been to the Log at night this year?" The Log is a perfect social gathering space: a great locale for budding campus musicians and practiced vocal groups to display their talent and a unique place to relax and chat with old friends as well as meet new friends. Yet the Log's long and colorful history is presently being smothered under two and one-half year's accumulation of dust. Few seem to realize that what was one of the best college hang-outs in the United States, still is — but is simply not being used.

Enough of the past. This is 1988. As Williams students, let us not lie to ourselves. We are at the best small liberal arts school in the country, but it is a small school and Williamstown night life often does not offer the variety available at other college locations. Our social life is typically reduced to the party scene of hot, crowded parties — standing room only — with long tap lines. Perhaps one-out-of-five of these parties have dancing or diversion other than "catching a buzz." Much of the time the same people are at the same parties, which is great sometimes but other times leaves you wondering what the other two-thirds of the students in your classes are doing.

How many times have you been to the Log at night this year?

Don't get me wrong; I love Williams. I admit that I have grown accustomed to and like these keg parties as the wild part of the college experience, but I'll be the first to admit also that I would often take advantage of other social options

Variety is the spice of life: new courses need to make div. III interesting

by Marisa Reddy '89

Last spring, as a result of their two-year review of the Williams curriculum, the Committee on Educational Policy (CEP) recommended to the college that the number of courses required in each division be increased from two to three. This proposal was approved by the faculty by a vote of 85 to 13 and meant that, beginning with the class of 1991, students would be required to complete two courses in each of the three divisions by the end of their sophomore year and an additional course in each division by the end of their junior year.

While many students seem displeased with the increased requirement, most complaints center on the difficulty of completing one more Division III course. The problem, it appears, is twofold: the courses offered by the departments in this division are either too difficult for the student not interested in a Division III major or in fulfilling pre-medical requirements; or, they are "guts" that seem to cater to those seeking only to fulfill their requirement and which hold little educational value, yielding the sense that the Division III requirement is more of an inconvenience rather than a valuable portion of a liberal arts education.

After receiving several comments and suggestions on this issue, the College Council saw a need for more "middle ground" courses — courses which teach the sciences in a manner that is intellectually challenging but which is intended for non-Division III majors and hence does not subject these students to the rigors found in the current introductory course offerings. One course in particular, Chemistry Demonstrated, was applauded by members of the Council as a course which teaches students the basics of chemistry without demanding the same workload or laboratory time that the traditional introductory chemistry courses do.

To further investigate this issue, the Council created an ad hoc committee whose job it was to talk with Division III department members about what could be done to make fulfilling the increased requirements more worthwhile. Because it was not clear where student discontent lay, the faculty of several departments seemed reluctant to change any specific courses. In order to pinpoint what Williams students wanted from Division III courses, the committee has created and distributed a questionnaire which asked students to rate 27 current introductory and non-major oriented courses on variables such as the educational value of the course, its work load and level of difficulty in relation to the student's other courses at Williams, and whether the course should be made easier, more difficult, or kept as is. The administration has stated that they will carefully review the results of this survey and the suggestions made by the Division III committee and the Council.

If Williams is sincere in its encouragement of a broad range of study, it should not be the case that students are often intimidated by taking traditional Division III introductory courses. The discrepancy in work loads and time demands of these courses in comparison with most introductory courses found in Divisions I and II should not be so great that fulfilling this requirement becomes an obstacle in rather than an integral part of one's education at Williams.

However, I also feel that this requirement should not be a question of what one can "get away with" in order to complete the mandatory number of courses.

If there were other social options. A classic Williams dilemma is finding oneself in one's room at ten-thirty on any given week night with schoolwork adequately completed for the following day, but not having anywhere to go to hang out and talk to other students. Your roommates are still studying, you are too tired or not psyched to go to a party, and hanging out in the snack bar often only involves watching the late-night studiers come and go.

Thus, the rejuvenation of the Log. The New Log. The secret greatness of the old Log that Seniors remember and the rest of the school just hears about was that on any given night groups of students were there. The Log committee has carefully worked out a structured entertainment schedule in conjunction with the College Council's $6,000 grant to ensure precisely that on any given night something will be going on and students will be there. This is an important action; the successful re-establishment of the Log as a social alternative during this semester will improve the social lives of Williams students for years to come.

However, we are the students; only you and I can make it work. The college council money is our money — the money each of us pays in student activities tax. Use the Log, the new sound system will take a week to install, but after that, I urge you to go check out the New Log. Let's make the Log our Log again.

Calendar may be amended

At its meeting tomorrow, the faculty will vote on a proposal to amend the 1988-89 fall semester academic calendar.

The amendment calls for a return to a more traditional version of the calendar, which would include the elimination of Mountain Day and the week-long Thanksgiving vacation and the insertion of a fall reading period on October 17-18 and a Thanksgiving recess from November 23-28.

Professor of the History of Science Donald Beaver, who chairs the Calendar and Schedule Committee, and his committee proposed the amendment after polling the faculty. The faculty opposed the current calendar by a three to one ratio. Students, when polled, also responded against the calendar three to one.

The current calendar is the first installment of a two year experiment that was originally scheduled to be evaluated by the calendar committee next year. Beaver said that this month is the latest possible date that the faculty could vote to adjust next fall's calendar due to scheduling constraints.

If the faculty approves the amendment, the president and trustees must still approve the calendar, Beaver said.

Also at tomorrow's meeting, the faculty will vote on a proposal from the calendar committee calling for an extension of Freshman Days to three full days and part of a fourth day, beginning fall of this year.

ACSR adjusts disinvestment

The Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibility (ACSR), meeting for the first time in 1988 on January 25, voted in favor of a shareholder resolution calling for John Deere Corporation's withdrawal from South Africa. The committee voted against a second resolution asking Emerson Electric Company to study the effect of ceasing its production of military goods, according to College Treasurer William Reed. The college owns stock in both companies.

Reed said late last week that the college, as part of its disinvestment advocacy policy, will embrace a new definition of withdrawal from South Africa advanced by the Teachers Insurance and Annuity Fund

(TIAA), the college's pension company. TIAA's new definition specifies, "the termination of all marketing rights or obligations in South Africa, as well as any licenses, franchises, or other agreements to supply goods, materials, products, services or technology to that country."

TIAA sharpened the definition of withdrawal because they were "concerned that some of the corporations continued to have strong business ties to South Africa after having supposedly ended operations there," according to an article that appeared in the January 20 Chronicle of Higher Education.

According to ACSR Chairperson Donald Dubendorf '75, John Deere and Company has not yet bowed to pressure to disinvest from South Africa. Company management feels that it exercises a more positive influence by staying than it would by leaving, Dubendorf said. The ACSR voted 3-1, with one abstention, in favor of the proxy.

On the second vote, the ACSR unanimously opposed a proxy asking Emerson Electric to study the effect on the company of switching its production of military materials to entirely civilian goods, according to Dubendorf. Political Science Professor Fred Greene, a member of the committee, said that the resolution implied that no company in the United States should produce military goods. Eleven percent of Emerson's revenue comes from production of military materials, Dubendorf said.

Bryan Jennings '89, one of two student representatives on the committee, is studying in London for this semester, and will resume his position next fall. In the interim, Jason Phillips '89 will fill his position. Phillips was the runner up for the position in the last election.

Biochemistry program?

The Committee on Educational Policy (CEP) voted unanimously to endorse a proposal for a program in biochemistry and molecular biology at their January 27 meeting.

According to the proposal sent to the CEP, the idea for the program has been discussed among the biology and chemistry departments for over a decade. Professors of Chemistry Lawrence Kaplan and Charles Lovett and Biology Professor Robert Slocum represented their departments at the meeting. According to Kaplan, "There is general widespread support among the two departments for this." The faculty will vote on the program at tomorrow's meeting.

A concentration in biochemistry and molecular biology would be open to everyone, but it would be primarily of interest to biology and chemistry majors due to the large number of prerequisites for the courses, Kaplan said. A student majoring in biology or chemistry could complete both the concentration and their major with 14 courses. A person majoring in another department would need 13 courses in addition to his or her major.

The program would replace the biochemistry course in the biology department and the two in the chemistry department with a two semester course which could be taken for major credit in either biology or chemistry. A senior seminar is also planned. These courses would be team taught by members of both departments and require no new faculty. Slocum said, "I think that the curriculum as it exists now is an artificial barrier to cooperation between the departments."

The program would allow students and professors to examine biochemistry from the viewpoints of both sciences. According to the proposal sent to the CEP, "a program in biochemistry and molecular biology is meant not only to encourage that more extensive interactions will take place on the research plane but to ensure that they take place on the educational level."

Kaplan said that they were concerned that the concentration not be viewed as a pre-medical major. "They would not be taking just a gut thing to look good on their med school application, because this is too rigorous," he said.

No break for FRS

The Freshman Residential Seminar (FRS) may be offered again next year, according to Dean of the College Stephen Fix. The program, after a two year trial run, is slated to end this year, to be followed by a year-long evaluation period. However, if the FRS evaluation committee, which Fix chairs, gives a positive evaluation, then the faculty may vote to let the program continue for another year. "The question is whether we have a sufficient amount of evaluation to recommend that it be continued," Fix said.

At this time, no decision has been made. Vice Provost David Booth, a committee member, said, "The committee has really not done anything beyond collecting information." Members of the committee talked to FRS students, attended classes, collected questionnaires, and interviewed FRS faculty. They are planning to evaluate the information and make a recommendation at the April faculty meeting.

Booth said that based on the committee's recommendation the faculty could vote to either end the program, and go through with the scheduled one year hiatus period to allow time for further evaluation, or to continue the program, either for a year of permanently. "Some people feel strongly that there shouldn't be a hiatus," Booth said.

Associate Director of Admissions Thomas Parker, another committee member, said he would like to see the program continued for another year. He said the program sees to have met its primary goals: "The idea that intellectual life would spill out of the seminars into more informal life."

If the program does continue for another year, the college will need to find two to four professors to teach the courses that participants are required to take, according to Booth. Housing for FRS students would remain in entries C and D of Williams Hall.

Complaints withdrawn

Visiting Professor of English Robert Chrisman and Reverend Muhammed Kenyatta '66 have dropped charges of assault and battery they had filed against one another last month in Northern Berkshire District Court.

Chrisman and Kenyatta dropped the charges together on February 1, according to a court clerk. The charges stem from an incident that occurred last month in which Chrisman alleged that Kenyatta had caused a small cut of his upper lip and knocked his glasses to the ground, breaking them. Kenyatta alleged that Chrisman had grabbed him by the coat and held him briefly. The incident occurred near Brooks-Rogers recital hall, police said.

Kenyatta taught a winter study course on the moral philosophy of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. He could not be reached for comment on the decision to drop the charges. Chrisman declined comment when questioned.

Awards

Margaret Magner, a student in the graduate program at the Clark Art Institute, has received a Quadrille Ball Fellowship and has been recommended for a Fulbright Travel Grant for study next year at the Free University of Berlin. Magner intends to explore the contribution of nineteenth-century German art to the development of Expressionism and other avant-garde art movements in the early twentieth century.

Andrew Erdmann, a senior at Williams College, has been awarded the Carroll A. Wilson Scholarship for two years of graduate study in England at Worcester College, Oxford University. The fellowship, which provides for living, educational and travel expenses, was established in 1949 in memory of John Wilson '44, who died during World War II, a year after he graduated from Williams.

Norman Petersen, Washington Gladden Professor of Religion at Williams, has received the American Academy of Religion's 1987 award for excellence in analytical-descriptive studies for his book, "Rediscovering Paul: Philemon and the Sociology of Paul's Narrative World."

SOAR's year takes off after initial difficulties

by Marilyn Germano

Williams is not alone in its recent struggle to deal with problems of racism, and it shares with other New England colleges not only the problem but also a network of student discussion groups designed to examine racial differences and communications. This network is the Society Against Racism (SOAR), and Farhan Hag '89 and Courtney Saunders '89 head its Williams chapter. While SOAR has faced problems with funding and membership in the past, its campus activities are on the upswing at last this year.

According to Hag, the Williams branch of SOAR began about three years ago. On SOAR's role as a discussion group, Hag said, "We provide historical information and objective information for people who are interested enough to explore the problem of racism."

"It hasn't had that much of an effect so far because it's been under-utilized."

Attendance at SOAR meetings increases when there is a specific issue confronting the college community. "After the crosses went up on Baxter lawn last year," he said, "SOAR attendance went up, because the crosses generated a real concern that people wanted to discuss."

Hag said he thinks, as a discussion group, SOAR has been an effective means of addressing racial problems for the people who have taken the time to attend meetings. He wonders, however, how much influence SOAR has had beyond this handful of people. "It hasn't had that much of an effect so far because it's been under-utilized," he said. The group, he continued, did not receive funding from the College Council until this year and consequently was unable to plan many projects.

Hag is hopeful, however, that with this year's increased funding, SOAR will be able to host more interesting lectures and workshops, and perhaps even plan a SOAR party in order to make students more aware of the group's existence.

SOAR's past has been anything but inactive, though. Last year the Society sponsored a reggae concert with the group Soul James. It has also set up panel discussions on racial affairs in conjunction with other campus groups and brought a number of speakers to the college.

Fluctuations

One of the biggest problems besides funding that Williams' chapter of SOAR has had to face, Hag said, is fluctuating attendance at meetings. The situation is now starting to improve. "We plan to have a weekly table for lunch next semester," said Hag, "so that members of the Williams community can get together informally to discuss racial issues that are bothering them."

The large attendance at the race relations panel first semester served as an incentive for SOAR members to get more involved in planning projects. Hag said that the group is currently trying to put together a videotape on racism at Williams. "It would primarily be used for groups that felt that they wanted training sessions, such as Junior Advisors or professor," he said.

In spite of the existence of a SOAR network in New England, each individual group is independent. The group learns of other SOAR network events, like inter-college conventions (open to SOAR members and non-members) held to discuss current racial problems, through Mary Kenwatta, the group's faculty head, and Roberto Ifill, who is on leave this year. Kenwatta and Ifill, Hag said keep abreast of happenings by attending meetings for faculty in the SOAR network, where the professors talk about how racial problems on their campuses are being handled.

After the crosses went up on Baxter lawn last year, SOAR attendance went up, because the crosses generated a real concern that people wanted to discuss.

The Williams chapter of the Society Against Racism is concerned both with keeping in touch with the wider, New England group of organizations and with addressing the problems which are specific to the Williams College campus. It attempts to keep the campus informed about issues which have an impact on relations among the various racial groups. SOAR is available as a resource to anyone who is interested in finding out more about racial communications at Williams.

Conservation lab brings art back to life

by Rob Weisberg

While many Williams students go to the Clark Art Institute to view fine painting and sculpture, few know about a small building behind the museum where many works of art are brought back to life.

The Williamstown Regional Art Conservation Laboratory, Inc., opened in 1977, restores and conserves paintings, paper drawings and sculptures for 35 galleries and historical societies located throughout the Northeast, according to its director, Gerry Hoepfner. He said that the Laboratory currently repairs anywhere from 1500 to 2000 works of art per year. "Each (organization) is obligated to send a certain dollar value in art each year...in return for having access to this service," he said.

The process of repairing a painting is complicated and varies for the specific need of each one, he said. Before any actual work is done, Hoepfner explained, "We photograph it, decide what the procedure will be, and make a proposal to (the organization), outlining the repairs to be made." In this process, the Laboratory uses a number of special diagnostic tools, including infrared, ultraviolet and x-ray cameras.

The Laboratory also decides whether a work needs to be "conserved" or "restored." "Conservation is a holding pattern that prevents further deterioration. Restoration means 'bringing back' the work, reinstating its former condition," he said.

Filling in the gaps
For instance, a hole in a painting can be treated two ways, Hoepfner said. In a conservation technique, the gap would be treated so that it would not increase in size; however, restoring the painting would mean filling in the hole so that it would not be visible, Hoepfner said. Often, the process of repairing a painting involves undoing the work of previous restorations. Associate conservator Sandy Webber was working on an early 18th century painting from the Marble House at Newport, Rhode Island, that had been restored before.

This one involves a megatreatment," she said. "Old restorations have to be undone. For instance, in an earlier repair, the conservator just painted over the original sky to hide discolorations. After you get back to the original state, this one will be remounted, given a full cleaning, and holes will be refilled." She added, "Still, this one isn't in really bad shape—it will take 250-plus hours to complete."

In another room, Department Head of Paintings Tom Branchick was working on a large Thomas Hart Benton painting suffering from cracked paint. "The glue that held the pigments together had deteriorated with changes in temperature and humidity. The pigments had to be consolidated with each other and back onto the canvas..." The whole repair process should take about 120 days (over 850 hours) to complete," Branchick said.

"We may have no idea what the whole looked like originally."

Sometimes, complete repairs are not always possible. Hoepfner pointed out a painting which had been damaged in a fire. "We can repair some of it, but the upper area, which was subject to intense heat, may have been damaged permanently. In other cases, if large parts of the painting are badly damaged, we may have no idea what the whole looked like originally—we may just have to accept it as a fragment," he said.

Paintings plus

He added that the Laboratory also has an entire room devoted to repairing paper drawings, though the number of these materials received is not as large as the number of paintings museums send. The Laboratory recently created a department for other types of art. "Around two years ago, when a new building was added, we added space for conserving and restoring sculpture, frames, furniture, metal, and other things," he said, adding that the Laboratory will soon be getting a full-time furniture conservator and then a full-time "objects person."

Hoepfner said that the Laboratory is one of about half a dozen successful operations of its kind in the United States. "Many major museums, such as the Metropolitan Museum of Art, have their own facilities...but we pick up a lot of museums that couldn't do their own 'repairs', he said. Hoepfner noted that the Laboratory has expanded from serving five museums to serving organizations located from Pennsylvania to Maine.

About his line of work, Hoepfner said, "Like any other profession, it takes a combination of training. Many of the conservators have two master's degrees, one in art and one in science." And though they handle up to 2000 works of art per year, he said the people there take pride in seeing each work come back to life. "It's like going into an old castle and seeing it covered with cobwebs, and then seeing it lived in again."

'Wallwork' takes a new perspective

by Jeff Perroti

Artist William Ramage has created the most recent Wallworks installation at the Williams College Museum of Art. Ramage's tape and paint drawing, which covers the 24' x 35' three-story wall that dominates the museum atrium, explores ideas of spatial perception and how they relate to that space. By analyzing how three-dimensional shapes and planes are rendered in two dimensions, Ramage proposes a new sense of perspective, one vastly different from the convention of linear perspective.

The geometric configurations rendered in Ramage's work entice viewers to label it "illusionistic." Ramage insists, however, that "illusion is serendipitous to the process" by which he creates the work. He calls his wall drawings "visual constructions" and cites his background in sculpture as the origin of his interest in how objects are perceived in space.

Rather than drawing from the convention of linear perspective, which enables an artist to render three-dimensional objects and spaces in two dimensions by mimicking the act of seeing, Ramage uses centripetal perspective. He chooses a perceptual point of origin within a space—a hypothetical point of sight that organizes all of the objects and planes in that space as they appear around that point, along a circular horizon line.

By measuring the distance between that point and the wall on which the drawing will appear, he determines a radius for this perceptual circle. Ramage then mathematically pinpoints objects and planes according to where they appear within this circle. By flattening the circle in order to render it in a plane, Ramage generates the geometric configurations with which he "plays" in order to arrive at the final composition.

Different perspectives

The installation Ramage designed for WCMA is the first piece which he has attempted in a vertical space. In past wall projects, Ramage has worked exclusively in single gallery sized spaces, which offer one horizon line to the viewer. WCMA's atrium wall offered Ramage two challenges: three possible points of perspective—the standing level from each of the three stories that the wall spans—and a visual obstruction in the flight of the stairs that cuts diagonally directly in front of the wall. To solve the problem, Ramage organized perceptual circles both horizontally and vertically, after choosing two separate perceptual points of origin—one from the standing level on the atrium floor, one at the level of the bridge that cuts through the upper space of the atrium.

William Ramage's Wallwork in WCMA challenges the conventions of linear perspective. (Ward)

Using a grid within this system, Ramage generated a multitude of geometric configurations, rendered in his drawing Untitled (Vortex series) (1987). From the shapes he encountered through this system, Ramage chose only a few to bring to the final composition; the most prominent of these in the final work is the drome, an octagonal-shape formed within nine adjacent squares.

By dividing the wall drawing into an upper and a lower half while drawing from different configurations for each, Ramage offers two very different, but mutually supportive, perspective situations to the viewer. The strictness of Ramage's organizing principle compresses the geometric play into a strong compositional structure. Ramage uses tape lines to sparingly render the complexity of the shapes, while carefully choosing shapes—such as the drome—that most strongly invite viewers to experience a different sense of perspective. In so doing, Ramage successfully creates an installation that takes advantage of the multiple points of perspective of the wall without losing a strong central composition. Ramage's installation offers viewers a separate perspective, one that questions conventional ways of seeing.

Ramage's Wallwork will be on display until April 17.

Cap & Bell's Glengarry Glen Ross entertains but has flaws

by Matt Tarses

From January 25 to 27, Cap & Bells staged an entertaining production of David Mamet's Glengarry Glen Ross in the DownStage of the Adams Memorial Theatre.

The play focuses on the cut-throat real estate business, and, in doing so, discusses the state of human affairs; but, as in many of Mamet's plays, the heaviness of the theme is buried under a very intelligent sense of humor. Glengarry Glen Ross may not be Mamet's best play, but with the aid of some solid direction, a clever set design, and a few fine performances, Cap & Bells managed to get the most out of the piece.

The opening scene was the strongest, successfully pulling the audience into the real estate world. Seated at a simple dinner booth, Levene, an aging real estate salesman played by Tim Hanes, clawed, slobbered and drawled his way through what was essentially a monologue. It was the strongest part of Hanes' performance; his timing was impeccable, his character consistent, and he managed to make himself understood in a scene which could easily be muddled by an actor speaking too quickly or muddling his words.

The first act faltered in the next two scenes, although Steve Scoville was excellent as Aaronow, a nervous and precariously balanced (both mentally and physically) character. A short scene with Michael Baratta as Roma foreshadowed his excellent performance in act two.

The second act, taking place in a ransacked real estate office, cleverly designed by Mark Solan, was dominated by Baratta, whose performance was only one of the saving graces of the play. He moved confidently, but beneath his movement was an underlying feeling of tension, with which he managed to capture his character.

It is possible to attribute such a fine detailed performance to the director, and at least partially, Paul McGreal's presence could be felt in all of the performances, but his direction was less effective with a few of the other actors. Whereas Baratta's movement was so appropriate to his character, some of the other characters were at their worst when in motion. Overall, however, McGreal's direction worked well.

Glengarry Glen Ross is a difficult play to successfully perform, and, despite some minor flaws, was a good production from Cap & Bells.

CUL studies Security

by Peter Balaban

Public relations for the security department, ways to make students more aware of security issues on campus and party policy occupied the Committee on Undergraduate Life (CUL) at their last meeting of winter study.

The committee talked with Director of Security Ransom Jenks and Assistant Director of Security Jean Thorndike about ways to break down barriers between students and security officers so that the officers are not perceived as authority figures.

Thorndike suggested that one way for students to get to know the officers better would be through freshman orientation programs, or through meetings in upperclass houses.

"I think it would be a wise thing," Trace Blankenship '89 said. "I've never seen an officer be obnoxious to students but I have seen students be obnoxious to officers. For students to hear an officer in an informal situation . . . would be a pretty exceptional thing."

Daniel Comiskey '88 said, "Before if you saw a security officer at an illegal party you'd grab the tap [of the beer keg] and run. It's different once you get to know them."

"Sense of Community"

Assistant Professor of Philosophy Peter Lipton, a member of the committee, said, "Safety depends upon a strong sense of community. That depends on seeing members of security not as employees but as members of a community."

"One of the reasons I like it here is because students see us [faculty] as real live people," Lipton said that the same thing has to happen with security officers.

In response to a question from a committee member, Thorndike said that she was the only woman security officer because women do not apply for the job. She said most women do not want to work the 12 a.m. to 8 a.m. shift, which is what most new officers work.

Committee chairperson Olga Beaver suggested several ways that the college could publicize security issues on campus. She said the college could distribute pamphlets on alcohol use, party policy, parking regulations, location of telephones, escort information, proper response to rape or assault, date rape, fire safety, and the necessity to lock room doors.

The committee had an off-the-record discussion in which Associate Dean Mary Kenyatta responded to preliminary recommendations from the CUL on fine-tuning the school's party policy, which was instituted last year.

Number of kegs

Kenyatta said last week that the two proposals concerned increasing the number of kegs allowed in a given location and accepting "spontaneous party plans" from small groups of students on the night they want to throw a party. The party policy states that all parties for between 21-75 people must be registered with Security at least two days in advance if alcohol is to be served.

But Kenyatta said that Security has been accepting party plans for small groups on the morning of the day the party is scheduled for. "Mr. Jenks has been very flexible on that," she said. She said Jenks does not want to prevent people from having parties, but that he needs to know about them in advance so that he can find officers to work at the parties.

Kenyatta, speaking as a CUL member and not as a member of the Dean's office, which will make the final decision on the party policy proposals, said, "I don't see any reason to change the policy we have. If anyone is sued, the college will be sued too because the college is the one with the deep pockets."

"We have a party policy right now that is, compared with many institutions, very, very liberal. It is one that does not really infringe on student parties. . . . I don't see that there has to be any more liberalization of it."

She said the Deans will take any formal recommendation that comes from the CUL very seriously because it represents the thinking of a student-faculty committee.

Arthur Miller causes campus stampede

by Alex Oh

For a brief moment on Friday night, the Williams College campus was transformed into the site of a mini-riot as herds of people ran from Adams Memorial Theatre to Chapin Hall. People were running to see Pulitzer-prize winning dramatist Arthur Miller, who is most famous for his plays The Crucible and Death of a Salesman, speak.

The playwright participated in a panel discussion entitled "The Struggle for Artistic Freedom," part of a three-day symposium sponsored by the Center for Humanities and Social Sciences. Originally slated to take place in the Adams Memorial Theatre, the unprecedented turnout prompted a last minute move to Chapin Hall, in order to stay within fire code regulations. Over 1,000 people attended the panel.

"We should not have a need for an American glasnost!"

The symposium, entitled "Toward A Cultural Bill of Rights" was the brainchild of Woodrow Wilson Professor of Government, Emeritus, James MacGregor Burns, a Senior Fellow at the center. Moderated by center director and Professor of Religion Mark Taylor, the panel also included David Eppel, assistant professor of theatre and Herbert Mitgang, a New York Times journalist.

"A few remarks"

Taking the stage, Miller said, "I haven't prepared any notes. I'll just say a few remarks and tell you a few stories."

Miller recounted his attempt to make a movie about gangsters during the McCarthy era which was thwarted by FBI intervention. When the script for the movie had to pass FBI inspection, the bureau approved it on condition that the gangsters become communists. Miller refused to make the film as such. He said that Harry Kohn, a Columbia Studios executive, commented, "It's really funny how, when we try to make the movie pro-American, you pull out."

Miller also criticized the current state of American television. "If we gave the medium to artists for two or three weeks, a miracle might occur. People might actually learn something," he said.

Discussing newspaper monopolies, Miller, addressing Mitgang, said, "And lastly, I have a beef with your newspaper." Criticizing the New York Times monopolistic control of New York City theatre reviews, Miller charged that a bad review guaranteed a production's failure.

Cruelty of Censorship

Eppel, a native South African, devoted most of his talk to the cruelty of censorship of the creative mind. Citing a recent Connecticut court ruling that allowed high school principals to censor school papers, Eppel said, "This is the most insidious form of self-censorship. Through conformity . . . the act of creation is minimized."

Eppel directed and performed in numerous plays in South Africa, and he talked about the financial difficulty of staging productions independent of government stipends with strings attached. He currently performs at the Market Theatre, South Africa's first fully non-racial theatre.

The question of governmental intervention on artistic freedom intensified as Herbert Mitgang, a New York Times journalist, spoke of FBI surveillance of American writers. Speaking of FBI's participation in such activities as wiretapping, license tracing and dossier keeping on private citizens, Mitgang said, "Sinclair Lewis once wrote a novel entitled, It Can't Happen Here. It did happen here."

Mitgang cited the FBI's dossier on the noted children's book author, E.B. White. "It was noted on E.B. White's dossier that he was a subversive," Mitgang said. "We who wrote and teach have to be subversives to do our job." In concluding his remarks Mitgang said, "We should not have a need for an American glasnost!"

The three-day symposium included closed discussions throughout the weekend on topics including freedom of the journalist and visual art.

Ski teams improve positions in meet at Mount Mansfield

by James Lee

The Eph ski team took charge down the slopes of Mt. Mansfield at Stowe, Vt. ten days ago at the University of Vermont carnival to an improved overall finish from the previous carnival at Bates.

The women's squad mounted an especially strong showing by capturing second place overall behind UVM. Ephmen also improved by moving up from the previous carnival's 6th to 5th place finish overall this time.

The women skiers displayed stellar performances on both Friday and Saturday. They placed second overall in both the individual and the team relay cross country races, the giant slalom race and third overall in the slalom race. Freshman alpine skiers Amy Sullivan and Amy Belliveau continued their winning streak from the previous carnival, and the cross country skiers, led by Captain Kathy Wolf '88 who returned from the U.S. Olympic ski team trials, hit the trails to an impressive improvement over the previous carnival's weak showing.

Sullivan set her personal best on Friday by placing 5th in the giant slalom race. Her strong showing the next day in the slalom race, a 10th place finish, and Belliveau's 10th and 16th place finishes in the two races decisively contributed to the women alpine Eph skiers' fine showing at the carnival, along with junior Mari Omeland's 5th and 10th place finishes in the same two races.

Wolf returns

Wolf returned to make a significant contribution to her teams; she finished third in the individual race on Friday and teamed up with Kirsten Froburg '90 and Ann Bokman '91 in the relay on Saturday to finish an impressive second. Froburg also raced well by placing 7th in the individual race. Sophomore Helde Andersen also raced well by finishing at 14th in the individual race. With the expected return of Kirsten Hansen '91 this week from the World Junior Championships to join her team, the Ephwomen's cross country ski team looks stronger than ever.

Individual efforts

The men's team skied less impressively than the women's; yet, several individual Ephmen exhibited impressive races. Peter Milliken '90 broke his personal best set at previous carnival by placing 8th in the individual cross country race. Jason Priest '91 skied amazingly well for a freshman by placing 7th in the slalom race. Priest's fine finish and those of J.P. Parisien '90, Pat Gilmartin '90 and Charles Kaplan '89 at 8th, 10th and 11th, respectively, placed the Eph team at an impressive second place finish in the category. Parisien also skied well in the giant slalom race by finishing 11th.

The ski team looks ahead for the Dartmouth carnival scheduled for this weekend.

The Williamstown Board of Selectmen last week advised abutters to the college's land on Pine Cobble to air concerns about development before the Town-Gown committee. (Ward)

Abutters worried about Pine Cobble houses

by Todd Owens

The Town Gown Liaison Committee will hold a special meeting between college officials and town residents who own property bordering land owned by the college off North Hoosac Road. Director of the Physical Plant Winthrop Wassenar said the meeting will allow the abutters to voice concerns about the college's plan to develop the 212-acre parcel into 70 lots for faculty and staff housing.

At the Selectmen's February 1 meeting, abutters complained that they had not yet had an opportunity to speak with college officials about the plans. Georgine Ames, who owns property on Coles Grove Road, which abuts the proposed subdivision site, said that residents have tried twice to contact college officials, but have had no response until recently.

In a letter to the Selectmen, abutters requested, "the aid of the Board of Selectmen in establishing some dialogue between the college and the public on the issue." Abutters expressed concern with several issues, including traffic and pollution problems, the visibility of a proposed water tower and the fact that the lots will be available only to college faculty and staff.

At the meeting, Selectman Anita Barker said that the abutters should take up their concerns with the Planning Board or directly with college officials. Coles Grove Road resident Bill Jacobs said the abutters were told by the Planning Board that that was not the place to raise questions. "We're just looking for the proper channels to voice our concerns," Jacobs said.

Selectman J. O'Brien Locke recommended that they go to the Town Gown Liaison Committee, which he chairs.

Mailed Letters

During the week of January 25, the college mailed letters inviting abutters to meet with college officials to discuss the proposed 70-lot subdivision. College Treasurer William Reed said. Since that time, the college has met with Louis and Michelle Schroeter, who live on Locke Avenue, Wassenar said. Locke Avenue also abuts the proposed subdivision.

But in light of the proposed Town Gown meeting, the college has given up plans to meet individually with abutters, Wassenar said. Instead, they will meet with them at the proposed Town Gown meeting. Wassenar said a date for the meeting had not yet been set.

Ames said that the concerns voiced by abutters are not just neighborhood issues, but will affect the entire community, including students at Williams. The relocation of the Pine Cobble hiking trail, which will accompany the development of the subdivision, and the visibility of the water tower are such issues, Ames said.

Because of possible delays in state approval of the project, it could be as late as the spring of 1990 before individual lots are ready for sale to Williams College faculty and staff, Reed said. College officials were originally hoping to have the lots ready by next spring. "It's a little more complicated now. They've put out a few more hoops for us to jump through," he said.

One of the major stumbling blocks could be an Environmental Impact Report (EIR), according to Wassenar. The college will not know if they will have to file an EIR until more state surveys are completed. If an EIR is required, the filing process could take 4 to 6 months, he said.

The college hopes to file a final subdivision plan in March. Between now and the time Pine Cobble is ready for sale, the college has no lots which it can sell to faculty and staff, Wassenar said.

If MassMoCA receives funding, Reed said, a municipal entity will be created to make it a reality. It is expected that this entity would contract with the college to design specifics for the project. Reed said that the trustees know this is a possibility, but have declined comment on whether they will approve of such a contract.

Term Trustee Hedrick Smith '55 said, "We've got to see what the demands are. . . . You have to be clear that policy has not been set."

Advance planning

Reed said that he expects that Joseph Thompson, a special consultant to the Williams College Museum of Art (WCMA), and WCMA Adjunct Curator Michael Govan '85 will be asked to help with the further planning and administration of MassMoCA. He said that they would probably be employed by the college, but would work at MassMoCA. Govan and Thompson are currently working with WCMA Director Thomas Krens, the originator of MassMoCA, on advance planning for the project.

When asked how he would feel about such an offer, Govan said that he was definitely interested. He said that a comparison of that arrangement to the Prendergast fellow would be appropriate. In the case of the Prendergast fellow, a private foundation gives support for the employment of a museum staff person with specialized responsibilities. Salaries, he said, would be paid by the museum. "But the mechanism is the college."

Concerning his relationship with Krens and Thompson, Govan said, "It's been a close working relationship between all of us in conceptual planning. To some degree, we're interchangeable." He said that they have lobbied legislators in Boston, negotiated with artists and collectors both within the United States and in Europe, and studied the effects the project may have on the North Adams area. He said that Thompson is primarily responsible for financial analysis. He described his own role as the specialist on curatorial and architectural planning.

Thompson and Govan are employed only part-time by WCMA. They are both pursuing graduate degrees.

their second and third entries in each event. Whitaker, Captain Suz MacCormac '88 and Alison Furniss '91 scored crucial points. Kathia Vandevenne '91 continued her success with wins in the 1 and 3-meter diving.

Schroeder (50, 100, and 200 with pool records in the first two), Vandevenne (1, 3M), and Whitaker (1000, 400M) spearheaded the Ephs' dismantling of Mt. Holyoke. The women won thirteen of sixteen events as nine different swimmers won or gained a share of first.

The men dominated Spring-ford but only won 103-90. Coach

Sam, trying not to run up the score on his alma mater, swam many as exhibition entries. O'Malley earned two wins (1000 and 500) while Benson. Snyder, Davis, Chris Giglio '89 and Mark Canuel '88 scored individual wins.

The women finish their dual meet season at 6-4 with a Little Three title while the men stand at 5-3 with a meet v. RPI remaining. Fifteen women qualified for New England Championships and will travel to Bowdoin in two weeks. Improved health and Coach Sam's perennially strong taper program will help Williams' chances of improving on last year's runnerup to Tufts.

WS changed due to a change in their own beliefs.

"In principle, the WS idea seemed good, but three years of experience suggest to me that that most students have marginal interests in the intellectual goals of WS," Associate Professor of Anthropology Michael Brown wrote.

Another professor wrote, "In addition to my disappointment with students during WSP, I have come to the conclusion that preparing a WSP was very much at the expense of my own scholarship and preparation for second semester classes. I also am deeply resentful when I compare my workload to other professors at institutions like Williams who don't have to teach January."

percent of their time on course-related activities, 23 percent on administrative work, and 53 percent of their time on professional work. In contrast, when they do teach WS, 53 percent of their time is spent on course-related activities, 20 percent on administrative work and 27 percent on professional work.

When asked to respond to the statement, "Some professors feel that their time would be better spent devoting the winter term to their own research," 53 percent of the respondents said that they agreed strongly with the statement, and an additional 17 percent said that they agreed with the statement. In response to the corresponding statement, "Other professors feel that WS provides an excellent opportunity for students to learn in an environment that is slightly different from the one they are accustomed to," only 16 percent strongly agreed, time professors would otherwise devote to their research. Assistant Professor of English Lisa Haines Wright said, "Certainly, I could use the time for my own research and writing. But I am paid to teach. So long as I believe that students are seriously committed to the courses I design for WS, I will support WS."

Hopkin, on the other hand, had this to say about WS: "Despite my many positive feelings about WS courses, I've taught and despite the benefits I definitely see in WSP for thesis students and the like, the negatives have come to outweigh the positives. And the positives could be — should be — integrated into the regular semester courses anyway."

while only 33 percent agreed at all.

some hard decision about the kind of place we want to be. Does it matter that students here should have been presidents of clubs? That they should have "leadership?" That they could have gotten good grades? Do we want well-rounded people or people who are passionate about one thing? Should athletics matter in admissions?

And even if we want to change, we may not have the power to do it. The admissions department seems to be a secret domain, insulated from the rest of the college, and which escapes the debate and thorough questioning that surrounds decisions like faculty tenure, for example.

What I'm saying is that we should put up or shut up. If we at Williams really want to change, the steering wheel is in admissions. We should make those hard choices or stop complaining.

Recycler thanks those who helped

To the Editor:

In the past year or so, Williams' paper recycling program has taken off: College community participation has grown significantly, and the program itself has gained stability for the short and the long term. Williams Recycling owes much credit for this growth to all the staff at Building and Grounds who, headed by W. Wassenar, have contributed time and earnest support to this program. Key features of Williams Recycling, such as newspaper racks, Baxter boxes and the "dog houses" created especially for dorm recycling, reflect B&G's ongoing commitment to the ideals of recycling; this follow-up of financial backing and administrative encouragement has been instrumental to the program's development. For Williams Recycling and for myself, I would like to thank Norm Quinn, Bob Fowler, the Carpenter Shop, and all those friendly faces in the front offices and custodians everywhere for their individual efforts; B&G works as a team, though, and as an institution deserves recognition as well. Thanks to all.

Men's squash downs Stony Brook, M.I.T.

by Alexander Rachmiele

On Sunday the men's squash team played host to the State University of New York at Stony Brook and won an 8-2 decision against the top-heavy Stony Brook squad.

Although the lower men on the Eph ladder had little trouble with their opponents, the Williams one-two punch of Wendell Chestnut '89 and Lew Fisher '89 went down in straight games to their Stony Brook counterparts. The lower the position of the match, it seemed, the better the Williams player's chances.

At one end of the spectrum was the number ten match, in which Williams' Jack Phillips '88 surrendered only four points in scoring a 3-0 shutout. Robby Hallagan '89, Pier Friend '88, and Chris Pentz '91, playing numbers 5, 6, and 9 respectively, also won mercifully short and one-sided shutouts. Adam Kimberly '89, playing in the #7 slot, lost the initial game of his match, but gradually took control and won the next three games with an overpowering hard serve and some timely drop shots.

Fisher, who suffered a minor muscle pull in his #2 match, allowed an opponent he seemed equally matched with benefit from unforced errors enroute to his shutout while captain Chestnut was simply worn down by Stony Brook's Rob Bruno in a battle of two All-American hopefuls.

Experience prevails

Their match was the last of the day, and although Williams was already assured of the overall victory, both teams stayed and watched in rapt silence as Chestnut and Bruno put on a display of squash pyrotechnics in which a few long, hard-fought points approached epic status. Unfortunately, the blistering pace set by the more experienced Bruno soon proved too much for Chestnut. As Williams coach Sean Sloane said, "Bruno's more experienced and comfortable with that kind of play. He's played in New York City against some great competition, and he's had much more experience with matches like that."

Earlier in the week, the team traveled to Hartford, Connecticut and took on Trinity College, losing to the Bantams by a 6-3 margin. Packard, who came back from a 2-0 score to win 3-2, Pentz, who recorded a 3-0 shutout, and Doug Gilvert '89, who won 3-1 at number 4, had the Williams victories there.

Over break, the Ephmen hosted M.I.T. and rudely welcomed them to Lasell Gym with an 8-2 beating in which only Hallagan and Packard lost matches. In the absence of Chestnut, who had gone to play individually in a tournament at the Harvard Club in New York, Fisher was pressed into the number one spot. He proved himself equal to his task as he came back from 1-0 and 2-1 deficits to win 3-2 in a match that was close at all times.

Tonight the team takes on Amherst in Lasell Gym.

Women runners ready for Invitational

by Mariam Naficy

One word sums up the attitude of the women's winter track teams: confident. They have reason to be, judging from their strong performances in four consecutive meets. Last Saturday's win in a home meet against Fitchburg State and Springfield capped off performances at the Tufts Jumbo Invitational on January 23, the Greater Boston meet at Harvard on January 24, and the Smith Invitational on January 30.

Running on Tufts' interesting tunneled track, the Ephwomen placed fourth out of 11 teams. Division II teams Springfield and Southern Connecticut University took first and second places, while Division III Tufts took third with a mere six-point lead over Williams. Highlights included a new school record in the 4x200 relay, 1:52:06, set by the first-place team of Joan Davis '88, Kira Shields '91, Nicole Jefferson '90, and Allison Smith '90. In addition, Dawn Macauley '89 took first in the 600 yard race and Anne Platt '91 took second in the 1500m with an impressive time of 5:06 minutes.

The next day at the Harvard meet, Williams ran into stiff competition. The meet was open to the Greater Boston area, and over 500 competitors, including Olympic athletes, entered the meet. Another school record was set, this time in the 4x400 relay by the sixth-place team of Davis, Kim Barndollar '91, Jefferson, and Macauley, who achieved a time of 4:08:91. Coach Pete Farwell commented on the two meets, "We go to those meets to rub elbows with the best. It's a good opportunity to go against calibre competition."

Second at Smith

The Ephwomen went on to place second out of five teams at the Smith Invitational the next week. Final scores were Tufts 90, Williams 61. Smith 38. The team's performance was significant not only because they outran Smith, a strong team which has given Williams runners trouble all year, but also because they beat Amherst, one half of their Little Three competition.

The Ephwomen's strong performances last Saturday at the home meet started in the very first event, with Norah Vincent '90's win in the weight throw and 2nd place in the shotput. Racing started off with the 1500m, in which Jen Morris '89 placed 2nd. In an exciting 3000m race, Pierce moved ahead of her competition from her fourth-place position to win the race, while Mika Brzezinski '89 did likewise and took second place. The team ended their day with a first-place win in the last event, the one-mile relay, with Gray, Platt, Davis, and Macauley running to a time of 4:19:0.

Macauley observed, "We're immensely strong, have a lot of depth, and have very few injuries." Farwell added that none of the teams at next Saturday's Williams Invitational have as well-rounded teams as Williams does; the meet should be something to look forward to.

general entertainment fund (to be used to pay for bands, D.J.'s and other forms of live entertainment), $3,000 for the new sound system (minus a $1,500 matching contribution from Food Service), $400 in salary for the student promotional coordinator, $280 for publicity and $250 for games and music tapes.

Answered questions

The Log Committee was present at last week's council meeting to answer questions about the proposal. Committee member Bill Hilly '88 said, "This decision is going to affect Williams undergraduates for the next 15 years."

Council officers supported the proposal. Secretary Trace Blackenship '89 said that adding more structure will mean, "You can depend on it, go there, and be entertained." President Carter Zinn '88 expressed support for the plan, and added that it opens up possibilities for future improvements in the Log.

Treasurer Mark Ralsbeck '88 said, "I see this as a very good way to spend money." However, he said that the council is already at the spending level of last year's council and that this request will have an effect later on other organization's requests for money.

One amendment

The council made one amendment at the meeting that specifies that the student promotional coordinator selected by the Log Committee and Dave Lamarree, manager of the Log, would be subject to council approval by a majority vote. The vote on the amendment was 21 supporting, four against, and two abstentions. Marissa Reddy '89 suggested the amendment. "I just feel uneasy because it is a lot of money," she said.

The approved funding is for the upcoming semester only. The Log Committee will have to return to the council to get funding for next year.

Calendar

Other discussion at the meeting centered on the calendar. Vice President Nicole Melcher '88 reported that the faculty opposes the new calendar by a ratio of three to one and that the faculty will vote at its meeting tomorrow on whether or not to revert to a version of the calendar similar to last year's for next fall. "If we pressure faculty members, maybe we can get it to go through so that next year we have the old calendar," Melcher said. She encouraged Council members to talk to one or two professors about the calendar.

Reddy, the CEP liaison, asked Council members to encourage faculty to support the biology and chemistry departments' new biochemistry concentration, which the faculty will also vote on tomorrow. "We're really in favor of it, and we think it's going to be good for the school."

Exams

rejected the idea.

When questioned about his current activities on the issue, Flx responded, "I'm considering the Gargoyles' proposal in the broader context of all that goes on at the end of the term." He noted that any individual or organization may submit a proposal to any committee without the dean's support.

Meanwhile, according to Gargoyles member Rob Chase '89, "The Gargoyles Society is no longer unified behind the original proposal for more self-scheduled exams because after looking into the proposal, larger issues concerning the Honor Code came into question, and we don't think it would be responsible to move until those issues are investigated."

Specifically, Chase said, the Gargoyles Society is investigating the lack of explicitness of the Honor Code as to how self-scheduled exams should be governed.

Several faculty members expressed satisfaction in the effectiveness of the honor code, and they indicated that more self-scheduled exams would not jeopardize the code.

"There's something about someone telling you, 'I trust you,' that's very effective," Assistant Professor of Computer Science Thomas Murtagh said. "I trust students enormously."

Assistant Professor of Philosophy Philip Clayton, a member of the Honor Committee, echoed

Murtagh's trust in the Honor Code and added, "there is a widespread tendency among the faculty to minimize the temptation that students might face."

Assistant Professor of Art Matthew Rohn remarked, "Dependably some students try to find ways to take advantage of the system. In the three years I have been here I have experienced four cases of honor code violations."

Some professors said that the reasons they don't give self-scheduled exams involve logistics and not distrust.

Professor of Mathematics Guilford Spencer cited the math department's need to have tests turned simultaneously in order to insure consistency in grading and assigning partial credit as a reason for the lack of self-scheduled exams.

Self-scheduled exams, which are usually administered in Hopkins Hall (now under renovation), are currently given in Sawyer Library. Registrar Charles Toomajian said the lack of space caused by the renovation would force additional self-scheduled exams to be held in less than ideal locations.

At least one professor seemed to believe that questions of distrust are irrelevant with respect to self-scheduled exams. Professor of History Peter Frost said, "We the faculty can very easily design self-scheduled exams which will make cheating ineffective."

Three third period goals, one each by Putnam, Seguin, and Van Belle, assured Amherst a long bus ride home. The final score, however, hides the fact that the team did struggle in its victory and did not look sharp. Despite that, it was a victory to be savored.

Conference mishaps

Neither of the Little Three wins counts toward the squad's conference record as both of those foes play in Division III. Also over the recent break, the Ephs lost 3-2 to conference rival Union at home. Van Belle scored both goals, one in each of the first two periods, in a game in which the Ephs never led. His first goal tied the game at one goal apiece, and the second narrowed the Union lead to 3-2 in the second period. Neither team added to their totals in the third, and the squad was left with another narrow loss.

Two weeks ago at West Point, the team squandered an opportunity for a big win against Division I Army. Army held a 3-2 lead after two periods of play, but their margin was erased by an Eph rally in the third. Freshman defenseman Mark Hall and Laker Lakerle both scored to earn a 4-3 lead with ten minutes remaining.

Just as they poised for a hard-fought win, a mental meltdown by the entire team allowed Army to score twice in the last five minutes and steal the win. Hauntingly similar to the 4-3 loss at Bowdoin the previous weekend, the result was difficult to swallow.

The Little Three wins boosted the men's overall record to 6-11, but the loss to Union dropped their ECAC Div. II record to 3-9. Tonight the squad hosts Hamilton at 7:30 and travels to Middlebury for a Friday night meeting with the Panthers.

SPORTS SHORTS

Wrestling

The Williams wrestling team continued to show its improvement this weekend as it finished seventh in the Northern New England Tournament. The team was led by junior co-captain Mark Duff and by sophomore Steve Felix.

Felix finished second in the 126 pound class as he dominated two opponents before losing in the finals. Duff pushed his record to 15-0 by methodically beating three consecutive opponents to finish first in the 190 pound class. Duff said, "the hard work is really starting to pay off in allowing us to beat out teams like Amherst and Bowdoin in such a competitive tournament."

Another wrestler who put in a good showing was junior Keith Ritzke who pinned his Bowdoin opponent in the first round of the tournament. According to junior co-captain John Dillon, "Ritzke looked really good and his win was good for the team in setting the stage for next week's match against Bowdoin."

Dillon also won his opening match and advanced to the second round of the tournament before being eliminated. The tournament was important to the grapplers because they finished ahead of Amherst and Bowdoin, two of the teams the Ephs must face in their next three matches. The seventh place finish is a psychological boost that creates the confidence that the team needs to win the Little Three crown at Lasell Gymnasium during Winter Carnival weekend.

Williams has two last warm up matches before the all important Amherst match, grappling at Curry before returning to Lasell for their first home match in a month this Saturday versus Bowdoin.

The Women's Ice hockey team regained its familiar .500 mark these past two weeks by defeating Skidmore and the University of Connecticut before falling to Wesleyan. Their record now stands at a solid 5-5-1 as the team starts on the final stretch of the season.

In the Skidmore contest, the team was guided to an impressive 7-2 victory by the outstanding play of first line forwards Kirsten Neuse '89, Sarah Shull '89, and Catherine Eaton '88. Neuse led the Eph barrage with three goals and two assists while Shull contributed with two goals and an assist and Eaton had with two assists. The remaining scorers in the rout were Jill Magnuson '90 and Sarah Benloff '88.

The next obstacle for the Ephs was their Cardinal rival from Middletown. This game featured two even teams playing excellent hockey in a heartbreaking 2-1 loss for the Ephs. After the Ephs and Cardinals traded goals in the first period, thanks to yet another Neuse goal, the Cardinals won the battle on what Coach Briggs described as "a purely accidental goal" in the second.

Continuing on with their rollercoaster season, the squad bounced back from the Wesleyan defeat to soundly trounce UConn 4-1. Captain Shull tallied two goals and an assist and Allison Jones '89 with her first goal ever as an Eph. The win marked the first time in the history of women's ice hockey at Williams that the team has beaten UConn. According to Coach Briggs, the team did it in style, playing the "best period of the year in the second" before gliding to an eventual victory.

Hoping to break into a winning record, the team looks to tomorrow's contest against RPI to provide the means. The Ephs, already having beaten the Engineers, will face off at 7:00 PM in the Lansing Chapman Rink.

M. Track

"A great competitive team effort. I was pleased with the team's improvement." Those were the words of first-year head coach Peter Farwell in summing up the performance of the men's track team, even though it was defeated 46-88 in last Saturday's meet against visiting Springfield College. Several races were decided in Springfield's favor by less than one tenth of a second, prompting Coach Farwell to remark that, "In reality it was a very close meet."

Steve Moran '91 placed second in the pole vault alongside classmate Jason Zimba, who produced solid all around performances by placing third in the high jump, long-jumping over 20' for second and battling to another second in the 55m hurdles. Senior Kenneth Alleyne placed first in the long jump with a 21'3-1/4" showing. Michael Simpson '90 placed third in the 35lb. weight throw, and Carey Simon '90 won the 400m dash, extending an unbeaten streak in regular season meets.

Senior co-captains Scott Purdy and Ted Arrowsmith performed well, with Purdy placing third in the 55m hurdles and Arrowsmith leading the team with two victories in the 1500 and 1000 meter runs. Jim Simmons '90 and Evan Driscoll '91 both ran seasonal bests as they placed second in the 800 and 1500 meter runs, respectively. Nate McVey-Finney '90, showing great improvement from the beginning of the season, won the 3000m run handily.

Said Coach Farwell after the Springfield meet, "It's been a little bit of a struggle due to the lack of depth, but now with a few key performers returning, we have established good momentum going into the Williams invitational." Men's track is now 3-6 after defeating Fitchburg, Westfield and Worcester at home the previous Saturday by the score of 58-23-48-31, respectively. Victories by Alleyne, Ben Soriano '90, McVey-Finney, Simon and Arrowsmith proved to be seals of victory as the opponents lacked the manpower and depth to avoid defeat by taking the second, third and fourth place positions.

During this weekend, Arrowsmith and Simon competed at a Harvard invitational meet, Arrowsmith qualified for the ECAC's in the 1000m run and Simon for the Division I New England's in the 400m dash. The next meet is scheduled for this Saturday at home as the Ephs face Amherst, Wesleyan, Trinity, Middlebury and Norwich in the Williams Invitational.

From The Locker Room

by Stewart Verdery

I just finished watching the highlight of the Broncos-Browns playoff game narrated by, not Brent Musburger, no, not Bob Costas, not even by Howard Cosell. Describing the action was a guy named Angelo Abela.

You see, I am in England in the Williams-at-Oxford program, and they show NFL highlights here. It's great to see the ol' gridiron action, but Angelo and his co-host know about as much about X's and O's as Gary Hart knows about morals. You think Brent has a helmsman's hairdo; this guy's looks like one of those vacuum attachments. They had Jim Kelly (from ESPN) in as a guest analyst last week, and you could almost hear him thinking, "Why am I listening to these idiots?"

One other thing about British football coverage; great hits, key goal line stands and third down conversions don't matter much—just be sure to show every kick—meaningless punts, missed field goals, and endless extra points.

If we wanted kicks, there's always soccer here. It is unbelievably popular and, even for a sports fan who thought NASL stood for Not Another Soccer League, a lot of fun to watch and keep track of.

The big event last weekend was an important darts tournament. Between chugging brews, the finalists, Bob Anderson and John Lowe, threw darts for four hours before Anderson wrapped up the deciding tenth set with a four leg win sparked by a clutch triple double-20 followed by a tough triple-19, double-8 combo. The 16,000 pound prize should enable him to buy a new shirt to replace the one with white tassels that he obviously stole from the set of "Urban Cowboy."

Darts, though, beats the heck out of some of the stuff they show here: snooker, lawn bowling, and, of course, cricket. Snooker is kind of like pool, except the table is twice as big, the balls are twice as small, and they put it on TV for 5-6 hours a day during big tournaments like last week's Mercantile Credit Classic. I like pool and everything, but at least NBC and friends have enough sense to dump it on some obscure sports anthology like "Super Saturday Sports Spectacular," along with belly-flop contests, celebrity tennis, and sports fantasies.

Lawn bowling is a lot like watching grass grow, except a ball rolls by every once in a while. With cricket, I don't even pretend to understand a single rule, but I hear that the players don't really know what's going on either.

The rest of British TV is just as amusing, but this is the Sports section, so that will have to wait. Seriously, though, England is a great place to be, and we're having a really good time. During the spring, however, I'll definitely miss the NCAA's and ESPN's "Great Wall of Hoop," and the Masters and the NBA and NHL playoffs, and the start of baseball. I guess I can always watch the rerun of the quarterfinals of the young ladies' lawn bowling consolations instead.

Women's basketball to 13-3 as Hedeman shatters record

by Jim McDermott

The women's basketball team bounced back from a brief mid-season slump to win seven straight games and improve to 13-2 on the year before losing to Connecticut College last Saturday.

Two high points stand out from the background of the seven game win streak. The first was the Ephs sweep of the Conn. College tourney where they defeated Babson (who had beaten Conn. College in the first round) in the championship game on the strength of Junior Missy Crouchley's 36 points. The second was Junior Nancy Hedeman's shattering of Teresa Dancwicz's six year old career scoring record of 950 points.

Hedeman poured in 32 to lead the Ephs to a 72-68 OT victory over Wesleyan enroute to breaking the record. After the Conn. College contest in which she scored ten, Hedeman stands just one point away from the 1000 point milestone.

Camels snap streak

Against Connecticut, the Ephs struggled to keep the Camels' lead within striking distance for most of the game. The team staged a comeback at the opening of the second period and pulled to within three at 40-37 on a long jumper by Missy Crouchley. This was as close as the Ephs would get, however, Connecticut had a larger line-up and managed to work the ball inside on each trip for an easy lay-up or a foul. They balanced this set offense with an effective fast break that kept the Ephs in disarray.

Hedeman continued to be a dominating force inside, though Connecticut's size advantage made working the defensive boards difficult. Missy Crouchley carried the offensive load for the Ephs in the second half, hitting several shots from the outside and running the fast break almost by herself as Connecticut pulled away to win.

The Ephs' play against Connecticut contrasts greatly with their performances during the winning streak. Crouchley said of the game, "No one really played well for us. I was surprised at how we weren't playing together. We have a lot of talent and we had been doing well lately."

Hedeman and Crouchley provided offensive punch for the Ephs throughout January. Against North Adams, Crouchley scored 25 and Hedeman pitched in a 19 point performance as the Ephs blew out their traditional rivals, 80-55. The Vassar game featured more balanced scoring, with Hedeman producing 16, Rebecca Borden 12, and Crouchley 11.

Hedeman now leads the Ephs in scoring (18.8 p.p.g.) and rebounding (13.8 r.p.g.) while Crouchley paces the team with a .926 free throw percentage and is second in p.p.g. with 14.5. Senior co-captain Kim Hatch leads in assists and Freshman Chrissy Cadigan has grabbed the most steals and is third in scoring (12.5 p.p.g.)

The Ephs can bounce back tonight when they host Trinity at 7:30 in Chanler Gymnasium as Hedeman guns for four figures in scoring.

Swimmers drowned by Red Raiders

by Kurt Oeler

Saturday, February 6, the men's and women's swim teams fell to powerful Division I Colgate, 136-115 and 179-121, respectively. The disappointing losses capped a busy two weeks for Coach Samuelson's squads, as the women downed visiting Mt. Holyoke 165-103 on January 27, and both teams celebrated the end of double sessions with wins over Springfield College on January 30.

All-American Rob Benson '90 led the Ephs in their first home defeat, setting pool records in the 100 and 200 butterfly and 400 IM. His times in the latter two events bested the Division 3 National Championship qualifying time. Evan Davls '89 enjoyed a big day with pool records in the 100 and 200 breaststroke, the latter also under the national standard.

Michael O'Malley '89 added wins in the 200 and 500 (pool record) and Dan Snyder's '90 second in the 1650 earned him a trip to nationals; His 1000 split gave him a pool record. Records fell in nearly every event due to the blistering competition, seven by Williams, but the Red Raiders' strength in the sprints and diving, season-long trouble-spots for the Ephs, finished the hosts' upset bid.

with Caron Whitaker's '91 shoulder injury in the second event. Without the versatile frosh, Williams couldn't match Colgate in the endurance events (200 fly, 400IM). Ironically, Michelle Freemer '90 qualified for nationals in the 1650, the same event Whitaker was hurt.

Dore Lebau '91 won the 50 and 100 backstroke and Lee B. Schroeder '91 captured the 50, 100, and 200. Both frosh narrowly missed qualifying Saturday and have hovered near the mark all season. Anne

Men's hockey takes Little Three

by Ted Hobart

"It's nice to have a Little Three Title under our belts," said Coach Bill McCormick, echoing the entire team's sentiments after Saturday's 5-1 victory over the Cardinals of Wesleyan at the Lansing Chapman rink.

The win, following a 7-3 drubbing of Amherst ten days ago, gave the Ephs their first Little Three Title since 1985, and may have salvaged what has been a disappointing season so far.

Once again it was the high powered line of Will Putnam '89 and Sean Seguin '91, centered by the team's leading scorer Ron Van Belle '90, that led the team to the coveted title. The trio totalled seven goals and six assists in the two games, and over the last four games has nine goals and nine assists.

The victory over Wesleyan was particularly satisfying because of the steady domination of the contest by the more talented Ephs. In previous games, the squad has played up or down to the level of its opponent, but against Wesleyan two early Eph goals set the tone for the game.

"We thought Wesleyan would really come out fired up, but those two early goals put them away—just one wouldn't have been enough," Coach McCormick said.

That pair of first period goals came from, not surprisingly, Van Belle and Putnam, with assists from three defensemen. Van Belle was fed by the freshman pair of Rick Laferriere and Tim Hale, who have become more assertive offensively as this season has progressed. Putnam's goal came from Van Belle and Jim McNulty '89, who has become one of the squad's steadiest defensemen after sporadic play last season.

The large but rather quiet crowd watched as the Ephs kept the Cardinals off the board for the first two periods with swarming defense and strong play on the nets by senior Mark Morrison. The domination continued in the second period as Van Belle, assistant captain Tim Frechette '89, and Laferriere all beat the shell-shocked Cardinal netminder to put the game out of reach.

Men's Hoops in 3 game slide Melchionni nets PR in defeat

by Michael K. Harrington

Inexperience continued to plague the men's basketball team this week as sloppy play contributed to an 84-82 loss at Connecticut College on Saturday. The last-second loss was the Ephs' third straight and leaves their record at 9-8 on the year. Earlier victories over Brandeis and Union preceded the three losses.

In New London on Saturday, the Ephs held a slim 37-35 lead at the half. They widened the margin in the second stanza, assuming a 75-66 lead with just five minutes to play, behind the scoring of Junior Bill Melchionni. The Camels rallied back, however, taking advantage of three consecutive Williams turnovers, and Camel point guard Steve Schnier scored the next eleven points of the game to give Conn. College the lead.

With time running out and the score tied at 82 apiece, disaster struck. Conn. College's Scott Sawyer was fouled with one second remaining while attempting a 20 foot jumper. He proceeded to make both free throws to secure the win.

The loss overshadowed a brilliant performance by Bill Mel-

Content with the five goal lead, the Ephs settled into a defensive stance for the final period but were unable to keep the shutout, as Wesleyan popped in a lone goal in the final stanza. The tide of the game is reflected in the shot totals for the two teams, with Williams firing 48 short at the Cardinal net while Wesleyan could manage only ten.

Rout the 'Herst

Facing the hated Lord Jeffs of Amherst in the friendly confines of Chapman rink over mid-winter break, the squad had to fend off a strong Amherst rally in the second period to capture the first leg of the Little Three Championship.

First period goals by Van Belle and captain Dave Caswell staked the squad to 2-1 lead at the first intermission, but Amherst was quick to rebound. Two Jeff goals in the first 8:44 of the second gave Amherst a 3-2 lead and silenced the large home crowd. The enemy lead was short-lived, however, as Rob Abel '91 notched his fourth shorthanded goal of the season to tie the game at the 10:01 mark, and sophomore Bob Santy scored the gamewinner shortly thereafter.

chionni. The Junior guard was a one man wrecking crew, scoring 35 points and hauling down twelve rebounds. Rich Williams '90 chipped in 19 points for the Ephs.

The defeat is indicative of the entire season, as the Ephs are continually unable to prevail in the close games. "We're doing everything but win," said Coach Harry Sheehy. Sheehy dismissed many mistakes as due to youth and inexperience, but he questioned the sloppy play of his team at the end of Saturday's game. "The question is 'Do we learn?'"

Tough road losses

Last Wednesday the Ephs travelled to Worcester to battle the WPI Engineers, a team they had not beaten in their last four tries. Unfortunately for the Ephs, the streak continued, as WPI downed Williams 100-93. Bolting out to a 49-42 halftime lead, the Engineers had to contend with repeated Eph rallies. The gap was never less than three, as the Engineers connected on 18 of 22 second half free throws and coasted to the victory. Melchionni had another fine performance, scoring 33

Faculty changes calendar back

by Scott J. O'Callaghan

Acting Dean of the Faculty George Goethals called for a more uniform system of evaluating non-tenured faculty with respect to mandatory course evaluation surveys, student interviews and class visits by faculty members at last week's faculty meeting.

The faculty approved an amendment to next year's calendar eliminating the week-long Thanksgiving break and inserting a fall reading period. They also approved a program in biochemistry and molecular biology and a proposal to extend the length of Freshman Days.

Goethals asked for comment on drafts of three proposals for evaluating non-tenured faculty for annual staffing reports, reappointment and promotion decisions. The first proposal calls for the evaluation of all faculty members by means of a shortened student course evaluation survey (SCES). Under the proposal, the results of the surveys for non-tenured professors would automatically be sent to the Committee on Appointment and Promotions (CAP) and tenured members of departments.

Results

The results of the survey, which is not now mandatory, are currently forwarded to department chairpersons only when individual instructors specifically request that they be forwarded, according to Goethals.

The second proposal spells out guidelines for mandatory student interviews and the third presents guidelines for optional class visits by tenured faculty.

Mandatory SCES

Professor of Religion Mark Taylor said that he was suspicious of making the SCES mandatory. Taylor said that he feared that a mandatory SCES would place too great a value on numeric data in tenure and reappointment decisions.

Speaking in favor of making student interviews mandatory, Professor of Sociology Robert Friedrichs said, "In all of what we do, it is important that what we get are student views of the teaching, of how they would like us to teach." While he cautioned against associating what students say is good teaching with what absolutely is good teaching, Friedrichs said that student input is critical for effective evaluation.

Discussion of mandatory faculty class visits proved to be a divisive issue. Goethals said he considers them to be important.

"There is no substitute for seeing what you're evaluating," he said. But other faculty members said they felt such information is shallow, showing little about the class as a whole.

Further discussion and action on these proposals will take place at later faculty meetings, leading up to a final proposal to be voted on by the faculty in the Spring.

The faculty also unanimously approved an extension of Freshmen Days from two and one-half days to three and one-half days. Dean of Freshmen Joan Edwards called the current schedule too hectic, and said the additional time will allow for additional class meetings on subjects like diversity in the community and health issues such as AIDS and drug and alcohol abuse.

"If you wait until it's into the semester, it's too late," Edwards said.

Council vote on sophomore reps nullified

by Bill Savadove

College Council passed an amendment for the creation of four sophomore seats on the council by a vote of 24 to one last Thursday. But council officers determined after the meeting that the vote must be nullified because a quorum was not present.

According to Secretary Trace Blankenship '89, two-thirds of the council must be present to form a quorum. Out of 38 voting members only 25 were present.

The proposed amendment will come up again this Thursday.

The amendment would create four new sophomore seats by reducing the number of at-large members from six to four and reducing the number of freshmen representatives from five to three. If passed by the council, the amendment will be subject to a referendum vote by the student body. If the referendum passes, the measure will be implemented next year. It will not affect the upcoming elections.

Vice President Nicole Melcher '88 supported the amendment, "The sophomores don't have as many people on the council who are going to get back to them."

Amy Scott '90 said, "It's hard to get elected as a house representative if you're a sophomore."

Freshmen won't suffer

Josh Becker '91, speaking for himself and Raj Venkatesan '91, said, "We believe that four representatives will be enough for the freshman class. Freshmen have the Freshman Council so they won't be hurt by this."

Council President Carter Zinn announced that a new grievance procedure was one of the proposals the Campus Commission on Race Relations (CCRR) is working on. According to Zinn, the effect of the new procedure, which is in draft form, would be to shorten the time between when an initial complaint is filed and when a committee hears the complaint. When the CCRR's proposal is finalized, an open meeting will be held for students to comment on the procedure.

Zinn said the CCRR is also concerned with the Junior Adviser selection process and is planning to speak with the Junior Adviser Selection Committee about selecting people who really do consider issues of difference and race relations.

Elections

College Council elections will be held on March 3 and 4. The positions that will be filled include the officers (president, vice president, secretary, treasurer), six at-large members, housing-category representatives, two minority representatives, two people from each class for Honor and

Edwards to serve as Acting Dean of the College '88-9

For the first time in Williams' history a woman will hold an executive position.

College President Francis Oakley announced the appointment of Associate Professor of Biology Joan Edwards as Acting Dean of the College for 1988-89 at last week's faculty meeting.

Dean of the College Stephen Flx will be going on sabbatical next year. He will resume his position on July 1, 1989.

Edwards is currently an Assistant Dean of the College and Dean of Freshmen. She came to Williams in 1979 and has been an Assistant Dean since 1986.

Oakley said that the trustees approved the appointment at their January meeting.

In an interview later in the week, Edwards said that she considers the appointment exciting.

"It's important for women in college to see women in power."

Nancy McIntire, assistant to the president for affirmative action, said that the promotion of women to senior positions demonstrates the increasingly important role of women in the college.

Oakley said later in the week, "As women enter the tenured ranks of the faculty, they are likely to enter also into administrative positions ... It's part of a steady evolution that we'll see continuing."

College moves forward on improving campus lighting

by Gillian Lippert

A number of headless lampposts appeared this past week near Mission Park. The posts are part of a program the college has undertaken to improve lighting on campus.

In March of last year, the Committee on Undergraduate Life (CUL) submitted recommendations to the Dean's office for improving campus security. Part of the recommendations were to improve campus lighting.

According to Dean of the College Stephen Flx, the size and significance of the project necessitated thorough research and careful consideration.

The Mission Park area was chosen to serve as the testing place. Director of the Physical Plant Winthrop Wassenaar explained "It is one of the areas people are most concerned about from a lighting standpoint." The second phase of the project, the lighting of the remainder of the campus, will take place when details such as brightness have been decided upon.

Evaluating professors

Student input and opinions are vital to the evaluation of non-tenured faculty for reappointment and tenure. In soliciting this essential feedback from students, the procedures employed must be made both uniform and mandatory for all departments.

The three proposals created by the Committee on Appointments and Promotions (CAP), in conjunction with the department chairs, which were presented for discussion at the faculty meeting of February 10, contain changes which would improve the present system.

The first proposal, to make a shortened form of the Student Course Evaluation Survey (SCES) mandatory for all departments, represents a good step toward standardizing the review process for non-tenured faculty. Although objections concerning interpretations of the significance of such numeric data have been brought forth by members of the faculty, some quantitative measure of students' opinions of faculty permits comparison between faculty members.

It is important, however, that the discussion of teaching evaluation and review not be confined to non-tenured faculty alone. The fact that a professor is tenured should not prevent students evaluations of his or her classroom teaching skills, organization, availability or helpfulness from being heard. The present proposal suggests that the survey be administered to the entire faculty but, "Results for tenured faculty should be made available to the chair and the CAP only if a senior faculty member wishes them to be." Department chairs and the CAP should be aware of student concerns and criticisms of tenured and non-tenured faculty alike.

The remaining two proposals, establishing guidelines for the conduct of student interviews and class visits, are likewise welcome reforms. Whereas most departments do conduct student interviews and classroom observations, in the past there have been no requirements for the submission to and approval by the CAP of specific plans for the selection and interviewing of students, nor guidelines for visits to ensure that they were done "systematically and consistently."

While the establishment of basic practices to be followed by all departments is a favorable change, it is restricted to non-tenured faculty, once again ignoring student opinions of tenured faculty members.

Tenured members may not require interviews or class visits for the purpose of reappointment or tenure, but such evaluations should, if less frequently, be performed as part of a routine teaching evaluation. Student interviews and periodic in-class observations, perhaps once every two years, along with SCES completion, could form an on-going evaluation of the entire faculty.

Back to the future

Two important steps, one back to tradition and one toward the future, were taken at last Thursday's faculty meeting.

Responding to overwhelming dissatisfaction from all parts of the Williams community, the faculty voted to reinstate the "old" calendar, including a four-day fall break and a four-day Thanksgiving vacation.

College President Francis Oakley announced the appointment of the first woman to an executive position at the college. Assistant Dean and Dean of Freshmen Joan Edwards will serve as Acting Dean of the College for the 1988-89 academic year, while Dean of the College Stephen Fix goes on sabbatical.

Kudos to the faculty and college for reinstating one tradition and breaking another.

Quote of the Year

"They were passing judgement on something before it was tried. It shows the conservative, reactionary nature of the students."

—Professor Russell Bostert in the 9/22/87 issue of the Record criticizing a student petition to reinstate a more traditional version of the calendar, a move the faculty approved last week.

Air concerns on development now

To the Editor:

The Environmental Impact Report (EIR) for the proposed ski development on Mount Greylock has been completed and a copy is available in the library at the Center for Environmental Studies. We have until February 26 to comment on this report (i.e. to agree or disagree with the predicted impact of a development of this size, to point out important issues that have been overlooked). If the public does not respond to this report, the State Office of Environmental Affairs is free to go ahead and approve the development proposed. If concerned citizens come forward and voice their discontent, the state will listen and has the right to alter the proposed plans.

If you have ever hiked, skied or biked up Mount Greylock, and enjoyed its unspoiled beauty; if you came to Williams because of its scenic location and rural atmosphere; or if you're concerned about the unsolved traffic, waste or sewer problems this very large development will cause, it is your responsibility to voice your opinion on this project. Come down to CES and look over the report, call Geri Tierney '88 458-8609 or Susan Paulson 458-2262 for information on the project and how you can help and/or come to a meeting of the Purple Druids (the Student Environmental Awareness Group) on Tuesday, February 23 at 8:30, when we will draft our response. If we don't speak out now, we will have to live with the consequences.

Your blood was put to good use

To the Editor:

At last week's Bloodmobile over 300 students came to offer their blood, and dozens of others, who were ineligible to give blood, volunteered their time. If you were a donor, you can take pride in the fact that within 36 hours your blood was in the veins of as many as three people who might not have survived without it.

No one was happy about the lines that meant some donors spent more time than usual in the process. Students who stuck it out are to be congratulated, not only for their persistence, but for their unfailing good humor.

On the basis of the excellent turnout, the Red Cross will send more beds and more nurses the next time they visit in April. We know your enthusiasm can be sustained and that you will remember how important your blood is to others.

The Red Cross is delighted with the generosity of Williams Students.

School's policy of affirmative action is discriminatory

by David Kane '88

WARNING: The opinions expressed in this article will probably be called racist. Most, if not all, of them are also true. Since Williams trains us to believe the truth and not to believe anything that anyone has ever called racist, some students may want to preserve their liberal sensibilities by not reading further. You have been warned.

Challenges should not go unanswered. In a letter to the Record last fall, six self-styled "concerned members of the black community" challenged me "to provide empirical evidence to support [my] assertion of reverse discrimination [in faculty hiring]." That letter came in response to my Op-ed piece on Marine Corps recruiting on campus and to the parallels I drew between Marine Corps policies and reverse discrimination as practiced by Williams. This article is not about the Marines. It is about the actual policies of Williams and the intellectual cowardice and fear of being labelled racist that surrounds discussion of them.

First, let's define some terms. To discriminate is to treat one person differently from another for an irrelevant reason. Picking members of your chess team on the basis of height is discrimination. Doing the same for your basketball team is not. Racial discrimination is treating people differently for the specific (and mostly irrelevant) reason of their race. (In certain situations, such as assigning under-cover cops, race is a relevant factor. Selecting an Italian over a black cop to try and infiltrate a Mafia operation is not discrimination.)

In most cases, discrimination (meaning, in this article, only racial discrimination) involves barriers against members of minority groups. Reverse discrimination applies to those cases where someone discriminates in favor of a member of a racial minority (and therefore against a member of a majority) because of her membership in that minority. Affirmative action is a liberal euphemism for reverse discrimination.

The official policy of Williams College in both faculty hiring and tenure decisions is one of affirmative action. Ms. Nancy McIntire serves as Assistant to the President for Affirmative Action and Government Relations. Ensuring that people at Williams are treated differently based on the color of their skin is part of her job. She says that, "Gender and minority status are positive factors in making final decisions among qualified candidates."

Other College officials agree. In fact, they insist that so-called "close calls" are not the only times that these factors come into play. According to acting Dean of the Faculty Goethals, "Gender and race are important and can be more than just tie-breakers. They can effect the overall evaluation of what the candidate can contribute to Williams."

In other words, in the final selection process it is possible to say, for the most part, that professor X is better than professor Y. Hiring and tenure decisions are more than just coin-flips. Without any affirmative action, these decisions would be based on a variety of criteria, most importantly scholarship and teaching ability. Some professors, including members of different races and both genders, would be hired and given tenure and others would not. With affirmative action, at least some of these decisions are changed. The most qualified candidate, regardless of race, is not always chosen. Some white professors suffer from reverse discrimination just as surely as some minority professors gain from affirmative action. They are opposite and inseparable sides of the same coin.

I understood all of the above to be common knowledge. I was amazed when the authors of the above-quoted letter referred to the "alleged discrimination against white professors by the college administration." Alleged? Professors are hired and tenure is granted at least partially on the basis of race. Chairman of the Economics Department Professor Michael McPherson says, "If race were not a factor, decisions would come out one way; but since race is a factor, they can sometimes come out differently." Certainly, this is racial discrimination in the broad sense of the term. Thirty years ago, being black was a hindrance — sometimes an overwhelming one — in getting work as a professor. Now being white is. No one hesitates to accuse of discrimination those officials who favored whites or to call them racists, and yet few would do the same to officials that favor blacks. Why the double standard?

The issue becomes even murkier when one remembers that many minority faculty are not dependent on affirmative action for their jobs. They would have been hired even if they were white. So, on one side of the balance we place the value of the presence of — not all minority and women faculty at Williams — but of

How does it feel knowing that the professors that teach you may not be the best (ignoring race and gender) available?

The answer centers around whether or not race should be "an irrelevant reason" in hiring and tenure decisions. As Dean Goethals says, "We try to hire the best person, but our assessment of who is the best person will take into account gender and race." But should it? Our racist 50's official would agree with that quote. He would just insist that being non-white or a woman was a minus rather than a plus.

There are many reasons for believing that race should be a factor. First, to make up for the effects of past discrimination. Second, to ensure that minorities make up a proportional share of the Williams faculty, thus enriching everyone's educational experience. Third, to serve those who owe their job to affirmative action. On the other side, we have the value of negatively affecting, in a major and unfair fashion, the lives and careers of some white professors and the cost of being taught by a faculty whose composition is motivated, at least partially, by racial favoritism. Call me crazy, but I often think that professors should be selected on merit.

There are no easy answers to these questions. But we must get our facts straight in order to argue intelligently about affirmative action. Denying that race plays a role in hiring and tenure decisions is a lie. Revealing this lie is a first step to informed debate. Let's hope that the debate is a fruitful one.

Natl. Review publisher talks conservatism

Imagine a beach and a surfer riding the waves into the shore of the beach. If the surfer doesn't like the direction from which the waves are coming, there is not very much he can do about it. He can only ride the waves, for the most part, in the direction they are going.

But if he cares passionately about where the waves are coming from, he may decide to use a dredge to change the beach so that the waves come from the right direction. As soon as he does this, however, he becomes an engineer, not a surfer.

This is the metaphor William Rusher used to describe his own life at a lecture he gave last week entitled "The Rise of the Right."

"A politician is, by and large, a surfer. If you care deeply about the waves, you want to be an engineer. I decided not to be a politician, but an engineer," Rusher said. As publisher of the National Review since 1957, he has been a leading conservative voice in politics for the last 30 years.

According to Rusher, the current conservative swing in politics had its beginnings in the early 1950s. At that time, Rusher said, the general assumptions and ideas in both the Republican and Democratic parties were liberal ones.

But at the same time, conservative voices were beginning to make themselves heard through publications such as the National Review.

The new conservative movement was based on free enterprise, anti-communism and the Judeo-Christian tradition.

"We identified modern American liberalism as the enemy," Rusher said.

He said that a number of factors combined to make 1964 (the year that Barry Goldwater won the Republican presidential nomination) a watershed year for the conservative movement and the Republican party. First, the power base of the party shifted from Eastern conservatism to the South and the West and has never gone back. This shift also began to incorporate social conservatives with concerns about family values, drugs and pornography, Rusher said.

Second, the number of people who donated to the Goldwater campaign was enormous. From these donations, a list of conservative activists was formed which could be used as a future resource to provide a way around an extremely liberal media, he said.

By the 1970s, the movement had grown so large that the founders of it, Rusher included, could no longer keep track of all that was happening, he said.

In 1980 came Reagan. "The most important thing that the Reagan administration has done, in a word: blood troops," Rusher said. The conservative movement now has trained conservative and experienced proponents in all sectors of government, he said.

Off-campus housing is spared

The Williamstown Planning Board decided at its February 9 meeting not to proceed on a motion by the Williamstown Board of Selectmen calling on the Planning Board to consider possible revisions in town by-laws regarding off-campus housing of Williams College students.

Instead, the board effectively sent the issue back to the Town-Gown Committee, where the impetus for the motion originated.

The selectmen voted on January 10 to ask the Planning Board to investigate possible new by-laws that would improve relations between the neighborhoods and off-campus students. The selectmen's motion came in response to a request from the Town-Gown Committee that the selectmen consider limiting the availability of off-campus housing for students.

Board member Donna Wied said, "Some people had asked us to legislate against a group of people, apparently students. I think that is patently illegal." Wied said that she didn't think it was within the purview of the Planning Board to do what was asked of them by the selectmen.

When reached later last week, J. O'Brien Locke, chairman of the Town-Gown Committee, said that he had not yet discussed the Planning Board's response with other committee members. He said that the committee might address the issue at its March 1 meeting.

In a memo to Town Manager Steven Ledoux dated February

10, Charles Schlesinger, chairman of the Planning Board, wrote that the selectmen's request was "too vague to allow proper action by [the] board. We believe that the proper forum for determining the direction and thrust of such by-laws (or changes to existing by-laws) would be the Town-Gown Committee itself, where representatives of town residents and the college could work out mutually acceptable terms for off-campus student housing."

Once these terms are defined, the Planning Board would be able to convert them into proposed by-laws or by-law changes and proceed with the process for obtaining town meeting approval, the memo said. According to town laws, any recommendations by the Planning Committee for the changing of town by-laws must be brought to a full town vote.

At the meeting, Schlesinger said that the Planning Board is not in a position to determine what the rules and regulations for off-campus student housing should be.

"We are not the proper forum for consensus building between the college and the town," he said.

In the memo to Ledoux, Schlesinger also wrote that it would take about six months from the time that specific off-campus housing terms are provided to the Planning Board before the proposed by-laws or by-law changes would be ready for inclusion on a town meeting warrant.

Schlesinger said that one of the tasks of the board during the time after it is given a proposal would be to look at what action other college towns have taken with regard to off-campus housing problems.

House O.K.'s MoCA

The State House of Representatives approved a $35 million bond authorization to fund the proposed Massachusetts Museum of Art (MassMoCA). Last Thursday, supporters of the project testified before the Senate Ways and Means Committee, where the bill awaits approval before going to the Senate floor.

An initial vote of 105-34 on January 25 gave an indication of support from the House, Representative Sherwood Guernsey D-Williamstown said. According to Guernsey, further blockades in the form of procedural votes had to be overcome before the bill was finally approved on February 1 by a vote of 93-47.

Guernsey said he was optimistic about the bill's outlook in the Senate, saying, "The President of the Senate has said to me that he fully supports it and will not attach Hynes funding to the bill." Conflict between the House and Senate over funding for the Hynes Convention Center prevented passage of the Convention Centers Bill in the last legislative session. The Convention Centers Bill was supposed to provide funding for the proposed art museum.

The Senate Ways and Means Committee met last Thursday to discuss the project. College Treasurer William Reed and Williams College Museum of Art Director Thomas Krens testified on behalf of the college. Charles Park, president of Sprague Technologies Inc. (STI), and Fred Windover, deputy vice president and general counsel of STI, testified on behalf of the company which has said it will donate the buildings for the museum.

Reed said that he felt the hearing went exceptionally well. Speaking on the reactions of the senators, he said, "I think I'd characterize them as supportive and interested in the dimensions and scope of the project." Reed said that Senator Houston of Worcester seemed to be the only senator present who did not support the bill.

If the Senate passes the MassMoCA bill that is currently before the Ways and Means Committee, it will return to the House for a vote of enactment. Passage would require a two-thirds majority since it is a bond authorization bill.

S. African student tells her story

Money that Williams and other colleges and universities in New England donate to a scholarship fund for black South African students does make a difference, according to Mary Jane Morifi, a recent graduate of the University of Cape Town and a scholarship recipient in 1986-87.

In a lecture last Thursday night, Morifi, now coordinator of the Open Society Scholars Fund for the University of Cape Town Fund, described the program, through which participating institutions provide room and board of $2,800 for one or more black or non-white students at one of South Africa's five integrated universities.

Williams College is one of 39 New England institutions that provides money to the program.

Morifi noted that an accurate representation of blacks at the integrated (open) universities remains a distant goal. According to Morifi, the schools are now about 20-25 percent black, but are trying to more accurately reflect the balance of society by achieving at least a 50 percent black population.

Despite the numbers, Morifi underscored the significance of the gains made so far.

"Ninety-five percent of blacks in South Africa are unable to fund their own education," she said. However, many are qualified for positions at the universities. She said American financial support is providing opportunities for students who would have no chance to receive tertiary education.

Morifi came to the University of Cape Town several years ago with only about $25 to her name. "All I knew was I wanted to go to college and come home or storm I was going to get a degree," she said. After pleading her case to a school official she was awarded a scholarship. "An American who didn't even know me cared enough to offer money for me to receive an education."

In her closing remarks, Morifi emphasized the importance of contributions offered through the Open Society Scholars Fund. "Even though Williams College is directly helping only two students right now, and even though it might receive criticism from inside or out about their efforts being futile because it's just a drop in the bucket, we need all those drops to fill the bucket."

CUL looks at freshmen advising

According to Chairperson Olga Beaver, the Committee on Undergraduate Life (CUL) will meet tonight with Dean of the College Stephen Fix, Dean of Freshmen Joan Edwards and Registrar Charles Toomajian to discuss possible suggestions for a revision of the Freshmen Advising system.

The CUL, meeting last week, came up with four specific proposals which they hope will add to the effectiveness of the current system.

The first proposal is to assign freshmen to advisors after the end of the drop/add period. The benefit of this approach would be that it limits the amount of administrative paperwork which must be completed by the advisor, according to Assistant Professor of Philosophy Peter Lipton, who serves on the CUL. Assistant Professor of English Lisa Wright, a member of the CUL and a freshmen advisor, said that most advisors are over-taxed by their responsibilities.

Under the proposal, during the drop/add period, one advisor would be available from each department to help freshmen with course selection. Additionally, there would be a centralized information center to take care of the administrative paperwork.

The second CUL proposal is to pair advisors and advisees according to academic interests. Lipton said that, although it is good for a student to be confronted by other fields, "intellectual closeness between faculty and students with the same interests is, on the balance, more important."

The third proposal concerns structural features of the advising system. Specifically, the CUL proposed holding three special dinners per semester for all freshmen and their advisors. Wright said that such meetings would allow advisors and advisees to get to know each other much better outside of the office.

The final proposal suggests that three one-on-one meetings between advisor and advisee would be mandatory every semester.

Also at the meeting, the CUL went into executive session to discuss their review of the college's party policy. After the meeting, Beaver said, "We have come to the conclusion that, except for minor tinkering, there aren't many changes we can make. We have to work within the legal system. We're really constricted by the law."

Beaver also said last week that she had met with Fix and Daniel Comiskey '88, who heads the housing committee, to talk about the party policy.

"The framework of the party policy has to stand as it is ... [we] have our hands tied because of the law ... it's an unhappy situation," she said.

Community to create playground

by Rob Welsberg

Although Williams students traditionally do most of their recreation at parties, the children of Williamstown will soon have a new playground of tremendous proportions for their recreation if a community-wide project comes to fruition.

Dubbed "Kids' World," the recreation area would encompass an area 80 by 50 yards near Williamstown Elementary School and cost from $40,000 to $60,000, according to Cathy Pohle, general co-ordinator of the project. Planned for construction the last week in April, the playground will be entirely funded by donations and built by volunteer brigades.

The idea for a huge new playground began three years ago, said Pohle, when a parents group at Williamstown Elementary felt that a renovated, updated play area was needed for local children. However, the plan took an unusual turn as the parents discovered the large costs that would be necessary for the playground. Pohle said, "It cost $3500 for a single ordinary slide, the kind that rusts and tips over. We really wanted that playground, but we knew it would cost a lot, so we began looking around at different options."

Last year, she added, the work of famous playground architect Robert Leathers came to the attention of the group. Robert had designed football field-sized playgrounds in other communities using all-volunteer efforts like the one the parents were considering. The principal of the school invited him for a visit, Pohle said. "He spent an entire day at the school, asking all the children what they would like in a playground. They gave him ideas, even drew him pictures of what they wanted, and he incorporated them all," she said.

Bouncing firetruck

According to a proposed map of the playground, the completed recreation area will include tire-tunnel mazes, a "haunted castle maze," a bouncing firetruck suspended on tires, a treehouse, a clubhouse, dozens of swings and slides and handicap access points.

Everybody has a jar of pennies just lying around.

Feedback from the parents was so positive that committees were immediately created to begin the project, Pohle said. Since the parents decided to build the playground without taxes, the tasks of organizing hundreds of volunteers and raising the money were formidable.

"We have to take care of everything — money, work schedules, food, child care," Pohle said. "We're now going out into the community, getting companies to donate supplies so that on April 26 (the anticipated date for groundbreaking) everything is on-site and ready."

The method of raising the necessary funds will be as unusual as the playground itself. According to Pohle, Leathers gave the group the idea of a penny drive. "It's easy to get — everybody has a jar of pennies just lying around," she said. So on Friday, February 26, and through the next day, pennies collected around Williamstown will be brought to a room at the school, where the group hopes to break the world record for covering a floor with pennies and raise $15,000 at the same time, she said.

Jim Woodruff '88, volunteer coordinator for the Kid's World project, said he hopes the project will attract Williams student volunteers to help with both the penny drive and the actual building of the playground. "There are a lot of resources on campus — fundraising and manpower," he said.

Woodruff said he believes students will respond enthusiastically to the project. "We have free time, and a lot of students want to help the community. Many will want to work on the construction, to do something with their hands for a change." Pohle said she thought that the community was lucky to have a resource like the college available, and that the parents were very excited about students getting involved with the project. "As alums, they'll be able to bring their kids to the playground and say, 'I helped build this,'" she said.

As far as the construction work goes, Pohle said, two people from Leathers' company will be on hand to supervise the work.

"We have exact construction plans of what to do and what's needed, down to the last nail," Woodruff said. "There will be a list of 'teams' during the week of building, with one skilled worker and two unskilled volunteers in each team. It's all very well-planned."

"It'll be just like an old New England barn raising," Pohle said.

Skinner runs for selectman and walks town-gown line

by Ann Mantil

Town-gown relations may not have been at their best since the issue of off-campus housing became such a controversy. But Anne Skinner, part-time lecturer in Chemistry, recently decided to try to bridge the town-gown gap by running for a seat on the Williamstown Board of Selectmen.

If elected, Skinner said she would not vote on any issue concerning the college because of conflict of interest. However, she emphasized that her connection with Williams would not influence her decisions on matters before the board.

"I'm not running because I feel the college needs a representative on the board. Equally, I don't think that people from the college should be discriminated against when running," she said. "But at the moment town-gown affairs are a matter of steady public comment. I am allowed to have an opinion, and I do."

Skinner said she feels that students should not be banned from living off-campus.

"Student involvement with the town has shown that they understand that they're part of a larger community. They should be able to live off-campus and know that they're expected to conform to the standards of the neighborhood they live in."

The municipal government of Williamstown harks back to the days of colonial New England towns, when chief authority lay in the town meeting. The board of five selectmen are elected by the town for three-year terms.

"The selectmen act as a filter for what will go to the town meeting. Any major decision they make has to be ratified by the town meeting," Skinner said.

Skinner joined the chemistry department as a part-time lecturer in 1967. She has a history of involvement in town affairs during her 22 years of residence in Williamstown. She has been a member of the Williamstown Finance Committee for seven years, serving as chairman last year. In 1975-76 she was elected president of the Williamstown League of Women Voters, and currently acts as a women's issues specialist for the organization.

Skinner said she was motivated by the town's current financial situation to run for the board of selectmen.

BIG little SCULPTURE opens at WCMA

by Travis Pierson

BIG little SCULPTURE, an exhibition of more than thirty small-scale sculptures that opened at the Williams College Museum of Art on February 13, is an assemblage documenting various sculptural styles of the last two decades, as well as the overall trend towards smaller, more personal works.

Phyllis Tuchman, guest curator and opening lecturer of the exhibition, discussed the pieces selected and how they represented the efforts of three generations of artists coming together in the mid-1970s: the Abstract Expressionists of the 1950s, the minimalists of the 1960s, and what Tuchman deemed, "The Janus-headed generation," those who had been told not to trust anyone over thirty, but who were now forty themselves. By displaying their works together, Tuchman said she hopes to demonstrate that the history of twentieth century art has not been a funnel ending at minimalism, but instead, should be re-evaluated as a running thread to which what are often considered mutually Independent styles are tied.

This thread can be seen in the work of Willem de Kooning, one of the foremost Abstract Expressionists of the 1950s, who turned to sculpture in the early 70s. His Floating Figure (1972), rather than coming out of the minimalism dominant at that time, takes from older sculptors, including Rodin, who, as Tuchman pointed out, was sometimes denounced in the seventies as being maudlin and bathetic. Floating Figure's very sculptural and expressive form is enigmatic, but, like de Kooning's paintings, creates a great emotional impact.

Variety of styles

Very different from de Kooning, but equally impressive, are Joel Shapiro's works. Minimalist in style, but representational in subject, his constructions are cool and detached, but they harbor a great deal of concentrated energy. His Untitled (1975-76) consists of a tiny bronze house surrounded by a square bronze yard. Tuchman points out that, by being placed about two feet above the floor, the work challenges the viewers perception of space and size — a house, something usually very large, is now small, and the viewer must bend down to it, thereby requiring a reaction from both the mind and body.

Also minimalist in tone, Bryan Hunt's King Crest (1976), which juts out from the wall far over the viewer's head, is a beautiful, Zeppelin-like creation which, due to the plane of the wall and the nature of the sculpture's placement, acts more like a large sculpture, requiring the viewer to look upward, creating a sense of the monumental.

BIG little SCULPTURE tests some new territory, not all of which is entirely successful. Tom Otterness' small, rounded figures contain some comic irony and geometric simplicity, but these pieces, which were part of a successful large scale display of Otterness' sculptures at the Museum of Modern Art, lose something when extracted from their collective world. At MoMA, the sculptures were placed on large, bronzed picnic tables, creating an entire environment for Otterness' little

The Bodeans: mid-western flair

by Ellen Drought and Sean Spence

The Bodeans, a roots rock quartet from Wisconsin, performed to a crowd that filled half of Lasell Gymnasium on Thursday.

lamstown as part of the first solo leg of the tour after opening for U2 this fall. Their 1985 debut album, Love & Hope & Sex & Dreams, met with great critical success.

Known for their straight up rock and roll style in the vein of John Cougar Mellencamp and R.E.M., the band distinguishes their danceable songs with an effective, droning harmony by lead singer Sammy Bodean and guitarist Beau Bodean. The group mixed upbeat dance tunes with slower ballads, all punctuated by Beau's spirited guitar, such as the digital delay effect used in the opening of their hit "Fadeaway".

Although Beau seemed shy on stage, leaving Sammy to establish contact with the crowd, this did not affect his playing, and the crowd responded energetically to the first song, "Dreams." The first two-thirds of the band's set consisted of songs from their albums, after which they switched to several songs they claim to have played "since they were kids."

Ups and Downs

The crowd surged up to the stage after Sammy requested that the security guards move aside, and he entertained with an enjoyable, active stage show, at one point leaving the stage to mix with the crowd. Highlights of the set were the upbeat "Fadeaway" and "Angels," again enhanced by Beau's guitar and Sammy's unique, if rather nasal, vocals. The group provided the thrilled audience with two encores. As they took the stage for the third time, Sammy explained that they had run out of their own songs, and proceeded to do an effective cover of the Replacements' "Can't Hardly Wait" and finished with the Ramones' crowd pleasing "I Want To Be Sedated."

Although much of the Bodeans' songs have the same sound and tend to run together, this is not uncommon for a young band with only two albums to draw from. The audience did not complain, however, as the band succeeded in leaving them satisfied after hearing two hours' of energetic rock and roll.

The warmup band, "Roger Saloon and the Stragglers," was introduced as "Western Massachusetts' best rock band," leaving the crowd wondering about the dismal state of rock and roll in the area. Their tepid songs ranged from standard variations on love cult themes to a schlocky tribute to a Czechoslovakian immigrant residing in their home town of Worcester. Equally unfulfilling was their medley of Bob Marley's "Stir It Up" and the Raspberries' "Good Lovin'." The middle aged lead singer tried to excite the crowd, but the audience's only noticeable participation was when a few audience members re-made the band's opening song "Gotta Get out of Worcester" into "Gotta Get off the Stage."

round men and women. Taken alone, works such as Death (1986-87), a cloaked, smiling, spherical headed figure, come perilously close to mere cuteness.

Also troubling is Michael McMillan's Titanica (1986), a miniature facade of an old building, which seems content to act as a clever illustration. The intricate painted wood and metal construction is full of entertaining details documenting the life of the architecture, but, counter to the goal of this exhibition, its smallness detracts from its impact.

More successful is Peter Gourlain's Save the Earth (1986), a wooden plane decorated with carved images depicting an inter-connected chain of life, man, and nature.

The neo-primitive carvings on an object with the purpose of cutting wood creates a subtle paradox of life and death.

Overall, BIG little SCULPTURE successfully fulfills its claim of testifying "to a renaissance in contemporary American sculpture." Two outstanding examples of this renaissance are from Herbert Ferber's Semaphore Series, which manage to synthesize the two and three dimensional, the sculptural and painterly and the minimal and expressive into impressive, but still relatively small constructions. Semaphore Series #5 (1983), made of brass, copper, and painted canvas, has planes of bright blue floating among golden curves opening towards the sky. Recalling Matisse's papiers decoupees, Ferber's work, just as most of the artists in the exhibition, manages to capture a colorful and dynamic expression in a small space.

"Letters Home" explores the troubled life of Sylvia Plath

By Erik T. Burns

The life of poet-author Sylvia Plath is a case study of a tortured genius, trapped in a life and time that did not benefit nor nurture her multiple talents. The psychological intricacies of Plath's short life are masterfully explored in Ross Leiman Goldenberg's epistolary drama Letters Home, performed last weekend at the Williams Downstage and presented by Cap and Bells.

The play itself is a carefully woven choric poem, based on letters from Plath to her mother, Aurelia, from her early days at Smith College to her last days in Europe.

As Aurelia, Birgit Huppuch is both stunning and haunting, and it is her character that is most fully explored throughout the course of the play. She reads Sylvia's letters and reminisces about both of their lives, painting a portrait of a mother as tortured by life as her daughter. Aurelia feels as though her life is a failure of sorts, the product of forced marriage and inadequacy in dealing with the pressures of the world. She watches with sparkling eyes as Sylvia's charmed life reaches pinnacles of unimagined success, as she revels in the attention of men, and as she composes the foundations of her prolific oeuvre. But there is always a sadness in the eyes of Aurelia, a feeling of having missed the boat. She lives vicariously through her daughter, and is umbilically attached to her life.

In the part of the ghost-girl Sylvia, Alice Maurice is compelling, creating from skimpy material (that of letters) a startlingly real character. It is terrifying to watch Sylvia's roller coaster ride of emotion with the full realization that her life will eventually deteriorate and end in suicide. Maurice moves around the barren, brickgirt stage like a wraith, a fragment of her mother's dream, interspersing her words with Huppuch's, weaving an aural tapestry that is sometimes wonderfully melodic, sometimes jarringly discordant, but is always emotionally powerful.

Kudos must go out to the principal actresses, both for retaining such a huge body of complex language and for refining it into a cohesive and compelling drama. Jennifer R. Zaentz's direction, however, is the keystone to the success of the work. It is apparent that Zaentz feels a kinship with this work and used that intimate familiarity with the love of a mother for her daughter, molding it into a wondrous epitaph for Sylvia Plath, for, though the trace of Plath's life is far from uplifting, Letters Home is ultimately triumphant, a celebration of art, motherhood, womanhood, and human spirit.

M. Hockey outskated in OT

by Ted Hobart

Facing off against archrival Middlebury on Sunday afternoon in Vermont, the men's hockey squad hoped to make up for a poor showing in a 7-3 loss to Hamilton last Tuesday. The result, however, was another stinging defeat, this time a 4-3 setback in overtime.

Sloppy play in the opening period plagued the team, and shaky officiating resulted in a myriad of penalties, mostly against the visiting Ephs. Middlebury found themselves with consecutive two-man advantage situations near the fifteen minute mark, and they promptly connected on both for a 2-0 lead at the close of the first period.

The Ephs picked up the pace in the second frame, as junior co-captain Tim Frechette found the Panther net to break the shutout. Two minutes later, Dave Bakken '90 fired a backhand on the power play for an unassisted goal and the 2-2 tie.

Ron Van Belle '90 notched his team-high 20th goal of the season with just 8:55 left in the contest, and Eph hopes were high. But as has happened so often this season, the squad was unable to hang on in the closing minutes, and Middlebury tied the game.

To seasoned observers, what happened in the overtime period was less than surprising, as the Panthers stole the game at the 4:33 mark of the overtime. The loss was particularly disheartening considering the Ephs easily handled this same Panther squad in a 6-1 victory earlier in the season.

Against Hamilton, the squad played a sloppy, penalty ridden game against a strong Continental unit.

Hamilton took a 1-0 lead into the first intermission, and broke out strong in the opening phases of the second, scoring on a power play to take a 2-0 lead just over three minutes into the second stanza. Dave Bakken answered just over a minute later, assisted by Tim Hale '91 and Mike Swenson '89, to pull the Ephs within one.

Hamilton grabbed the momentum in the last part of the second period with two quick goals around the fifteen minute mark.

Lights

The standing lamps are only one of several lighting solutions, Wassenar said. In quadrangle situations, such as the Freshman and science quads, the college is hoping to use building-mounted fixtures. Corner fixtures in particular will be used to shed light in different directions. Tall, fluorescent lamps which spread light over large areas will illuminate the parking lots. The current cans of incandescence, installed in 1964, throw a flash-light-like beam of light.

A lighting improvement made this summer which Wassenar said few people noticed was the reactivation of many of the entry lights around campus. These had been turned off in the mid-1970s due to the energy crisis.

Another change was the installation of photo-cells, light sensitive switches which regulate the operation of the lights, making manual operation unnecessary.

According to Wassenar, once all the lights have been erected in Mission Park, the area will be used to test various alternatives. Three different types of light bulbs will be installed, and the most effective chosen. The space between each lamp will be considered, as well as the number necessary to provide enough light while being as unobtrusive as possible.

"We don't want the campus looking like a Zayre's parking lot at night," Wassenar said.

The astronomy department must also be considered. Light pollution, which damages the view of the sky at night, must be minimized.

An architectural consulting firm, Carol Johnson Landscape Architects, was hired to design

Van Belle then got the partisan crowd at Lansing Chapman Rink excited again on a superior effort on an unassisted goal.

The third period started a disturbing trend for the squad which was unfortunately carried into the Middlebury game. Trailing 4-2 at the start of the crucial third period, the Ephs were whistled for penalties seven times, sometimes with a corresponding Hamilton penalty but often not. The occupancy of the penalty box left the team shorthanded for ten minutes of the final stanza and killed any comeback hopes.

Bakken notched his second goal of the game at the 16:39 mark, but three more Continental goals made the third period anti-climactic, and finalized the score at 7-3.

The two disappointing losses, both to conference foes, leave the squad's overall record at 6-13 and 3-11 in the conference, both of which are real eyesores considering the team's potential. Tonight the squad is at Babson and on Friday the Mohawks of North Adams come to town for the traditional showdown, both of which will be featured on WCFM.

and implement the lighting scheme. The college ordered several different styles of lamps to choose from. The lamp selected costs $2800.00 apiece, fully installed. The budget for the Mission Park area is $90,000. The lighting of the entire campus is budgeted at $1,000,000. The money was allocated to the college by the trustees at the January meeting.

Wassenar said he hopes that the entire project will be completed sometime this fall.

As for the headless red poles, Wassenar said that their crowns are expected any day. They will also receive a coat of black paint in the spring, he said.

clarity. But money is getting somewhat tighter. As I looked at the board, I realized that the people on it aren't aware of some of the problems that we face," Skinner said. "Some members of the board have been on the Finance Committee, but not as recently as I have."

Skinner pointed to the tax-cap laws as responsible for the town's financial problems. "Williamstown's primary sources of income are the property tax and state aid. Both are capped. The net effect is that our income is capped in a rate of increase less than the rate of inflation."

Because of this situation, Skinner warned, the town will have to be careful about financing new programs. She also projects a search for new sources of revenue.

Other issues which Skinner said she sees as pressing are replacement for the town landfill, transportation for the town's growing elderly population, and availability of affordable housing.

"When people retire here after living in Boston and New York, the housing prices look like nothing. Real middle-income people in the $20,000-$30,000 per year range can't live in Williamstown because there aren't any houses to buy. We must work to keep a mix of ages by providing affordable housing."

Skinner is running against incumbent John Locke, a teacher at Mount Greylock Regional High School. The election will be held May 10.

Faculty

significant dissent on the parts of students and faculty."

Beaver said the amended version of the faculty approved is very similar to those of previous years and said that he and the calendar committee will propose ones like it for 1989-90 and 1990-91 when the committee makes its recommendations this May. The amendment to next year's calendar passed by voice vote, but with several dissenting votes.

The amendment included the elimination of Mountain Day and the week-long Thanksgiving vacation and the insertion of a fall reading period on October 17-18 and a Thanksgiving recess from November 23-28.

The trustees must approve the calendar change before it is enacted, but President of the College Francis Oakley said on Sunday that he thought the trustees would follow the faculty's recommendation.

In the portion of the meeting for questions for administrators, Professor of Computer Science Kim Bruce asked Oakley if he had any intention of forming a committee to consider abolishing Winter Study Period (WSP). Bruce referred to the Record's survey of faculty, in which 61 percent of those responding said they would like to abolish WSP completely, as a possible expression of discontent over the program.

Oakley said no committee would be formed. He said afterwards that faculty committees may take the matter up, but that he will take no such initiative. He added that a study done two years ago on WSP showed it to be educationally sound.

Battling the snow and gusting winds, the Amherst, Wesleyan and Trinity women's track teams came to Williams-town last Saturday for the Williams Invitational only to be defeated, thus once again giving the Williams women's track team the unofficial Little Three champs. In a banner day, the Ephs outscored all other teams combined with the final scores ending at Williams 81, Amherst 29, Trinity 20 and Wesleyan 18.

Field events set the tone the rest of the meet was to follow. The long jump saw Sue Northen '89, Cassandra Kirk '89 and Noriko Honda '89 take one-two-three respectively. Dawn Macauley '89 jumped her way to first place in the high jump, the first of her four victories in the course of the meet.

Co-captain Sarah Pierce '88 and Mika Brzezinski '89 ran a lonely twenty-five laps in the 5000m to a one-two finish. Other strong races were senior co-captain Sara St. Antoine's second place finish in the 1500m, and junior Jen

Morris' second in the 1000m. Susan Gray '90 blew away her opponents in the 500m finishing over six seconds ahead of her nearest competitor. In a blaze of speed and grace Macauley took first in the 400m followed by Kim Barn-dollar '91 in third.

Finally, the mile relay team of Barn-dollar, Morris, Macauley and Davis easily won and the two mile relay of St. Antoine, Christie Dempsey '89, Pierce and Gray came from behind to win by a good margin. Team support was amazing as both the men and women rallied around the triple jumpers Northen, Kirk and Honda as they completed the scoring by finishing two, three and four respectively. The last lap of the meet saw both the men and women's team following Pete Farwell as he was carried celebrating his first defeat of Amherst and Wesleyan as head track coach.

St. Antoine summed up the meet when she said "We've known from the start what a talented and deep team we have, but it's at a meet like this that it really all comes together. Everyone worked tremendously hard, the team spirit was great and the results are there to prove it." The team is looking forward to next week's final regular season dual meet at home against Smith.

Skiing

In the wake of their improved performances at the previous UVM carnival, the Eph skiers produced yet another solid showing this weekend at the Dartmouth carnival in Hanover, New Hampshire. The men's team bettered its previous carnival's fifth overall finish to place fourth this time, and the women also stood at fourth overall, a strong performance even though it did not quite match the previous carnival's stellar second place finish.

The men's team skied reasonably well on the whole, with bright spots in individual performances. The strongest team placement was in the slalom events held on Saturday, at which the Ephs finished in a commanding second place. Pat Gilmartin '90 emerged as the highest finisher among the men by placing at eighth in the slalom and ninth in the giant slalom races. Teammate J.P. Parisien '90 also skied well, finishing ninth in the slalom and falling on the second run after standing at third on the first run in giant slalom. The team captured 4th place in the giant slalom races.

The women's team also skied well with some outstanding individual performances. Cross country team captain Kathy Wolf '88 had a tremendous carnival, placing second in the individual races and teaming up with Helde Andersen '90 and Kirsten Froburg '90 in the relay to finish third. The team skied well in the individual races, finishing fourth, one point behind Dartmouth and Middlebury, who tied for second place. The team might have fared even better had Kirsten Hansen '91 competed, but she was unfortunately injured in the World Junior Championship races in Austria last month.

In the alpine events, the women's team witnessed fine and consistent performances by the trio of Amy Sullivan '91, Marl Omland '89 and Amy Beliveau '91. Sullivan had another fine weekend, placing sixth in the slalom and eighth in the giant slalom races. Beliveau's 13th and 15th place finishes and Omland's 8th and 16th place finishes in the same two races contributed to the team's eighth overall finish in the two categories.

In assessing the strengths of the team for this weekend's home carnival, head Coach Bud Fisher commented, "The men hope to equal or better their fourth place finish and the women are shooting for second [after the powerhouse UVM who rarely yields first place to anyone]."

Wrestling

Amherst and Wesleyan beware, the Williams Wrestling team appears ready to seriously challenge for this year's Little Three Championship.

The momentum that has been building up over the past month intensified last week as the Ephs outclassed Curry College 42-18. The Williams grapplers were paced by junior co-captains Mark Duff and Jon Dillon, each of whom pinned their opponents. Duff continued his stellar season by winning his sixteenth match of the year and remaining undefeated. Wins were also gained by Steve Felix '90, Ed Anderson '90, Kevin Cook '90, Keith Ritzke '89 and Sean Glynn '91.

According to Coach Roger Caron, "the most impressive of all our wrestlers was Ed Anderson. He used excellent techniques and it was definitely his most dominating match of the year." Aside from Anderson's victory, the most impressive performance by a Williams wrestler came in a losing effort. In the 177 pound weight class, Sophomore David Lerner, who only weighed 163 pounds, wrestled a great first period before he was caught by his heavier opponent. Caron notes that, "Lerner looked great and wrestled very well until the heavier kid caught him." Duff was also impressed in noting that, "Lerner looked really good and it was a shame that he got caught in a freak move or he would have won." Lerner's match was one of only two that the wrestlers lost on the mat all day.

This week's Little Three championship presents many interesting possibilities. Williams is a heavy favorite against Amherst as it out-pointed the Lord Jeffs by over thirty points in the Northern New England tournament. The Wesleyan match, however, will be very difficult as the Cardinals have recently dominated the Little Three, winning every contest since the mid seventies.

"Amherst is more like us and they've been struggling lately so we should beat them," Caron said, "But in order to beat Wesleyan we are going to have to get a little lucky."

The Little Three's also will be interesting as Mark Duff will face two stiff challenges in trying to continue his undefeated season. Both Amherst and Wesleyan are known for their prowess in the upper weight classes. The matches promise to be very exciting and the wrestlers hope that a big crowd will come out and support them in their quest for the Little Three Title.

Major said, "I just want to get in the flow."

Tufts made a short comeback bid, as the Ephs exhibited sloppy play, but never got closer than seven. Major and Melchionni secured the victory with good foul shooting down the stretch, and some late Jumbo treys made the score closer than the game actually was. Major finished with 26 (16 in the first half), Melchionni 21 (19 in the second half) with 13 boards, and Williams chipped in 16 points. The Ephs shot a dazzling 55 percent for the game, well over their season average.

"It was a good win," the coach said, "We had good scoring balance and offensively took what their defense gave us."

On Wednesday, the Ephs sprinted out to an early 21-4 lead over the sleepwalking Trinity Bantams behind Melchionni's ten points. Defensively, Williams shackled the Bantams, causing them to shoot very poorly while leading 44-29 at halftime.

Trinity came out inspired in the second stanza, applying heavy pressure on the Ephs. Williams, however, subdued the Trinity rally and went on to crush the Bantams. Melchionni continued his dominance on the court, scoring inside, outside and from all angles enroute to his third straight thirty-plus points performance. As hot as one could be, the junior guard shot an incredible 17 for 21, totaling 41 points, and also hauled down 10 rebounds.

"Bill's been carrying us lately," Sheehy said, "He's been absolutely incredible!"

Mike Masters contributed a solid all-round effort, totaling 11 points, 6 boards, and 6 assists.

The Ephs are in hot contention for a return to the ECAC playoffs, but ahead lie some large obstacles.

"Next week is very big for us," Sheehy said of his upcoming home games with Middlebury and Wesleyan, two teams that have previously beaten the Ephs. "If we win two next week, we're 13-8 and I like our chances," Senior Mike Roach added.

Melchionni's 62 lifts Men's hoops to 11-8

by Michael K. Harrington

"I definitely think we are in the thick of it," Coach Harry Sheehy said, assessing his team's chances of earning an ECAC playoff berth after their convincing 91-85 victory over Tufts at Chandler Gymnasium on Saturday. The win, coupled with the Ephs 92-66 rout of Trinity on Wednesday, lifted the squad's record to 11-8 and kept alive its slim post-season playoff chances.

Both Williams and Tufts came out flying, with the Jumbos assuming an early 19-14 lead behind the strong play of Vern Riddick. But a Garcia Major, '90 coast to coast, driving 1-hander and a Rich Williams '90 3-pointer gave the Ephs a 26-25 lead that they never surrendered. Another Williams try helped extend the lead to seven, but a late Tufts surge left the Eph lead at 40-38 at intermission.

Second half tear

The Ephs picked up the pace of the game early in the second half, and in familiar fashion, guards Bill Melchionni '89 and Major led the way. Melchionni chucked in ten of the next 14 Williams points as the Ephs bolted out to a 56-47 advantage with 15:40 remaining. Mike Masters '89 was instrumental in the run, dishing out three assists.

Next it was Major's turn. The sophomore point guard began to exploit the heart of the Jumbo defense, handing out two perfect passes to Dave Morrison '90 and freshman Than Healy for easy hoops. Major followed with a running basket, a long trifecta and one more assist, and Williams was in control, 75-57 with 8:25 to go.

Junior Bill Melchionni, co-recipient of this week's Budweiser Athlete of the Week award, finishes a drive to the hoop with a commanding stuff for two of his points against Trinity. (Scala)

The duo has repeatedly come through in the clutch for the Ephmen as it has become apparent that they are the players who want to assume control. "I just took it upon myself to take control of the game,"

Men's Track sprints to Little Three title

by Carey Simon

"We have really jelled as a team; rather than just performing, everybody competed." First-year head coach Peter Farwell's comment was prompted by the strong teamwork of the men's track team in its exceptional performance at last Saturday's Williams Invitational against Amherst, Wesleyan, Trinity and Norwich.

And indeed, the entire team did contribute to a 76-65-28-44-39 victory during a day that saw at least eight Williams trackmen achieve their personal bests.

"Mike Simpson finally put it all together and got the first victory to start the day rolling," said coach Alvin Pearman about the sophomore who threw his personal best in the 35 pound weight throw at the start of the field events competition. His performance set the tone for other fantastic showings, notably freshman Steven Moran who pole vaulted to a personal best and victory with a 13' vault and second place with a 20'9 3/4" long jump, also his best.

Once again, freshman Jason Zimba showed his characteristic all-around competence by placing in four different events. Zimba took third in the long-jump, fourth in the high-jump, third in the 55m hurdles and fourth in the triple-jump with two of his events at seasonal bests. Senior Kenneth Alleyne won the long-jump with his best jump and placed second in the triple-jump with what was nonetheless an excellent jump. The 1-2-3 finish in the long-jump was critical and helped to seal the meet. Junior John Berger, recently returned, did a 12 foot pole vault for fourth place in what was a strong field. His personal best rounded out the field events with Williams in firm control at that point.

The running started and, against a field of two national qualifiers, senior co-captain Ted Arrowsmith battled his way to third place in the 1500m run. The other captain, Scott Purdy '88, ran brilliantly to finish second in the 55m hurdles just ahead of teammate Zimba, and triple-jumped his best in order to finish third. Sophomore Carey Simon coasted to a victory in the 400m dash as the strong freshman John Habjan and junior Jeff Etemad took fourth and fifth in the 500m run respectively.

David Nadelman '89, just off a ten day layoff due to injury, ran for third place in the 800m run ahead of senior teammate Bob Cain, who took fifth. Strongly developing freshman Evan Driscoll and junior James Simmonds both ran personal bests to finish fourth and fifth in the 1000m run. Finally, sophomore Nathaniel Mcvey-Finney and freshman Josh Raymon both ran well to finish third and fifth in the 3000m run.

Saturday was a strong finish to a good season that got better as the team developed both as individuals and as a unit. The next meet is the New England Div. III contest, scheduled for Saturday, February 20 at MIT.

Hedeman nets 1000th; leads W. Hoops to 14-3

by Jim McDermott

Nancy Hedeman broke the 1,000 point barrier early in the first half against Trinity on Tuesday, making her the first Eph ever to reach this mark in women's basketball.

Throughout the game, Hedeman continued to add to another record she broke recently, the Williams total points record, in leading the Ephs to a convincing 78-66 victory against an important Northeastern Intercollegiate Athletic Conference foe.

The Eph's star center said she thinks the support of her teammates and the basketball program played a large part in allowing her to set the records.

"I can't believe that no one has ever done it (1,000 points) before. I'm pleased for the program mostly. I think people sometimes forget that it's not so much me alone as the whole team," she said.

Hedeman's turnaround jumper in the first half gave her the hoop she needed to reach 1001 points and set the record. Coach Nancy Roberts noted that Hedeman's accomplishment is especially notable because she reached the mark in only three seasons.

Roberts listed Hedeman's physical strength as her most important asset. "This allows her to double pump, hang in the air and do things that other girls can't," she said. She also mentioned Hedeman's consistency in both scoring and rebounding and her ability to control the boards.

The Ephs trailed in the first half against Trinity before jumping ahead for good in the second half. Chrissy Cadigan

'91 led the Ephs in a quick scoring burst to open the second stanza. Cadigan made two lay-ups, blocked a shot, made a nice pass on a fast break for an easy lay-up, and hit a short jumper all in the span of five minutes to put the Ephs ahead 39-33. Trinity penetrated the Ephs' 2-1-2 defense periodically for offensive rebounds, but they were cold from the outside in the middle of the second half, and the Ephs widened the gap to 51-41 with about ten minutes left. Missey Crouchley '89, Hedeman, and Meg Brown '91 provided scoring punch throughout the half and the Ephs coasted to the 78-66 victory.

Roberts stressed the importance of the Trinity victory. "We're looking for NIAC and ECAC bids, so all wins from here on are important," she said. The Ephs have four more games, at Smith tonight, against Wesleyan at home on Saturday and two road games against RPI and Amherst next week.

Women Racqueteers stroke way to title

by Marc McDermott

With all the force and decisiveness of a frehand winner, the women's squash team bashed both its Little Three opponents this past Saturday to take the coveted title and reach the .500 mark for the first time this season. The team was so dominating that the Wesleyan nine failed to capture a single game and the hated and obviously inferior defectors could manage to defeat only one of the Ephwomen.

Playing in the friendly confines of Lasell Gymnasium, Williams kicked off the competition by soundly thrashing Amherst. Although number one player and team captain Jeanne Cloppse '88 dropped a see-saw five game marathon to long-standing rival Carrie Cuthbert, third player Lisa Brayton '91 got the Ephwomen back on track with a 3-0 drubbing of Mary Shipley. After that it was all easy stroking for the Ephs as Allison Buckner '89, Lori Schaen '89, and Susie Piper '90 led the way to victory with easy wins in the remaining top five spots.

After the Jeffs salvaged some small vestige of their broken pride by beating the Cardinals, the Ephwomen went to work on Wesleyan in the day's final competition. Once again, the Ephs proved superior, especially in the lower ranks where Sopit Poosanakhom '88, Timmie Friend '90, Amy Davidson '90, and Chris Boddicker '88 won the six through nine spots in straight sets.

Team "up and down"

Coach Lisa Melendy commented on the title and the attainment of an even season's record, saying, "We've been up and down so much this season, it's nice to win the Little Three. It's also a relief to see how well we can do against regular competition."

Melendy was referring to recent matches played versus division one opponents, especially archrival Trinity, who defeated the Ephs 5-4 earlier in the week.

"That's the closest we've come to beating them in years, we really played well," said Melendy. Williams was paced in defeat by Cloppse and Buckner, both of whom pounded tough five game victories out of their Bantam opponents.

Recently, Williams placed eleventh of twenty-six teams in the Howe Cup tournament. The Ephs were hindered by the absence of Cloppse, who was knocked out of the competition with a first round injury. Williams attempts to improve on its 5-5 record when it travels to Smith before returning home for a Winter carnival match versus Tufts next Saturday at 2:00.

William Rougeau, Jr. 61

William Rougeau, Jr., 61, a Baxter Hall custodian, died last Monday evening, February 15, after suffering an apparent heart attack at work. Assistant Director of Food Services Karl Kowitz notified the college community in a letter distributed last Wednesday.

Rougeau was born in North Adams on September 29, 1926. He graduated from St. Joseph's High School in North Adams, where he was a member of the varsity basketball team, in 1944. During World War II he served with the U.S. Navy in the Asiatic-Pacific theater of operations. He was employed with the James Machine Company in North Adams for 36 years, and had been a Food Service Department employee for the past three years, usually working the night shift at Baxter.

"I've always associated night time at Baxter with Bill," Sheldon Jobe '88, a student manager at Baxter Food Service, said. "He always would say 'have a nice night', or ask 'how's school going?' and he always showed interest in the students he met ... He was a really shy man but also a very friendly man," Jobe said. "It's really a big loss."

Rougeau was a communicant at St. Raphael's Church in Williamstown.

"We always used to talk shop," Chaplain to the College Carol Pepper said. Pepper's office is in Baxter Hall, and she said she'd see Rougeau every afternoon. "I liked him very much," she said. "He was a very gentle, kind person."

"I considered him to be a work partner. We all know each other pretty well in Baxter, and it makes a difference that he's not here in the way the building feels," she said.

Pepper said she remembered one time when she came to work and Baxter Hall had been totally trashed after a student party, and she asked Rougeau if it bothered him. "It didn't," she said. "He really liked students here, and young people in general ... and he seemed to understand that young people make a mess."

"When a man like this dies, it reminds you that the lives of faculty and students very much depend on his work," Pepper said. "We don't give it a lot of thought, but all these meals, all these clean buildings, all these services are performed by people. When one dies it's a loss for the whole community."

Rougeau is survived by his parents William and Emma Rougeau of North Adams and his wife Viola. He also leaves six children and 10 grandchildren.

The family requests that any contributions be made either to St. Raphael's renovation fund or the American Heart Association.

Second weekly paper gets funding from CC

by Bill Savadove

College Council granted a $2,250 budget request to The Issue, a new weekly Williams newspaper, by a vote of 26-1-3.

According to Adam Ruderman '88, an organizer of the paper, the first issue of the paper should come out a week before spring break.

The council's allocation provides funding for a trial run of four eight-page issues. The paper will also try to supplement the council's allocation with advertising revenue.

Amy Scott '90 encouraged council members to vote based upon the merits of the proposal for a new organization.

"We're really not voting on if The Record needs improvement," she said.

• levying fines at a differential rate, with the first 3-5 violations incurring a fine of $10 and all subsequent violations incurring a fine of $20;

• expanding the parking lot behind Weston Language Center to accommodate an additional 45 vehicles, 10 of which would be reserved for faculty, staff and visitors, the remainder assigned to students living off-campus;

• widening the circular drive in front of the art museum for visitor parking;

• allocating more spaces currently assigned to students to faculty and staff in the Fitch Prospect lot and the lower Dodd lot;

Comments and suggestions

College Council is scheduled to review the proposal this Thursday, and the Town-Gown Liaison Committee will probably discuss them at their March 1 meeting.

According to Assistant Dean of the College William Wagner, who chairs the ad hoc committee, other bodies whose comments and suggestions will be solicited are the Committee on Undergraduate Life, Buildings and Grounds and the art museum. The town planner, the athletics department and the theater department will also be contacted, Wagner said.

The committee will probably formally submit its proposals to College Treasurer William Reed by spring break, if not before, after hearing feedback

Parking committee: no cars for freshmen, build new lot

by Peter Balaban

A preliminary report on parking facilities and policy calls for prohibiting freshmen cars on campus starting next fall and building of a new parking lot off of Park Street on the field below Thompson Infirmary.

The report, which comes from an ad hoc committee formed by the college vice president in response to strains placed on existing parking facilities by faculty, staff, students and visitors to the campus, also recommends the following changes:

• establishing a taxi service administered by the security office that would provide transportation on a regular route around campus together with an on-call service for students needing assistance or an escort;

• providing transportation to and from certain nearby regional centers such as Albany based on a system of prior reservations and available space;

Vandalism hits Mission area: t.v.'s, car windows smashed

by Karen Costenbader

Vandals smashed two Mission Park recreation room television sets and windows on four student cars near Mission Park early Friday morning, according to Director of Security Ransom Jenks.

"We did have a lot of damage done last night," Jenks said on Friday. "At 2 a.m. they were O.K., and this morning they were found damaged."

Televisions in the Mills and Dennett recreation rooms were destroyed, one apparently with a beer bottle. Jenks said he had no idea whether the vandals were college students or not. Nothing was stolen from the cars, according to Security's report.

The damage was reported to the Williamstown police. Police Chief Joseph Zolto, Jr. said that the incidents were under investigation. "I know the boys were working on them last night," he said Saturday.

Patrolman Vincent Zolto, Jr., who is investigating the vandalism incidents, said he thought that the televisions were probably smashed by students who had had too much to drink at a party at Mission Park on Thursday, and that the students did not want to come forward now to make restitution.

Police are also investigating another group of vandalism incidents and larcenies that occurred in the Mission Park parking lot last week. Andrew Stern '90 reported to police on

The Williams Record

An independent newspaper, published

Baby, you can park my car

Steps to combat the Williams College parking crunch might be taken soon. This potential action is now in the form of a set of proposals put forward by the ad hoc campus parking committee chaired by Assistant Dean of the College William Wagner.

It is about time that something is done to alleviate the increasingly annoying problems caused by the current parking situation. A new parking lot off of Park Street below the old Thompson Infirmary, and an expansion of the existing lot behind the Weston Language Center would surely help to relieve some of the current parking pressure. Revamping the present price scale for parking violation tickets, to $10 for the first several tickets and $20 thereafter is also a welcome reform as many students feel they are being gouged by the current steeper rates.

A system of transportation to and from nearby cities such as Albany, Boston, and New York, before and after student break periods, would be a much appreciated service for those students without cars.

However, two proposals must be greeted with more skepticism: forbidding freshmen to bring cars to college and the creation of a taxi service to be run by security.

It seems to be the consensus of parking committee members that, once in Williamstown, students have no further need for their vehicles. This is not true. More valid reasons than sheer laziness make it imperative for most students, regardless of their class, to have access to private transportation. Given Williams' remote location and the lack of reliable private transportation, students need cars for a variety of activities such as reaching off-campus jobs, performing extra-curricular activities in the community, shopping, and attending cultural events in neighboring towns and cities.

Freshmen have the same needs for transportation as do upperclassmen, and a taxi service would be economically foolish if it attempted to meet almost all student transportation needs in the area. Furthermore, if such a service was unable to meet these needs, then the necessity for students to have access to their cars for local travel would remain.

Protesters show their solidarity

To the Editor:

Recently, a group of black students from Williams traveled to the University of Massachusetts at Amherst to participate in the recent protest by black students at the school. The students at UMass demanded that the university investigate racial attacks on black students and do more than has been done to insure a supportive and secure environment for the minority students. The Williams students, by putting the immediate needs and concerns of others before their own, demonstrated what solidarity is all about. Today, too many college students are more concerned about their future earning potential than social and political issues that ultimately affect their lives. Thank goodness the spirit of protest is alive and well in at least one segment of the Williams College community.

School values a diverse faculty

To the Editor:

In responding to the issues raised in David Kane's February 16 article, headlined "School's policy of affirmative action is discriminatory," I wish to stress several key points about Williams affirmative action program.

Williams' commitment to equality of employment opportunity, as President Oakley has underlined on numerous occasions, is long-standing and clear. The goal of our affirmative action program is to increase the proportion of women and minorities on the faculty to a level that is more consistent with the proportion of qualified women and minorities with PhD's in the fields taught at Williams. Our commitment is a principled one, based not only on the requirements of government regulations but more importantly on the value we attach to maintaining a diverse and talented faculty: a faculty with different backgrounds and life histories, prepared to convey to our students a variety of different interests perspectives and educational philosophies.

Three specific points are important. First, the College's major effort is to make sure that the numbers of qualified women and minority applicants in our candidate pool reflect the numbers coming out of graduate school. Since we are an equal opportunity employer, we make strenuous efforts to ensure that all groups of applicants are well represented in our pools, and that they are given full consideration in all stages of the selection process.

Second, once we have done all we can to make sure that women and minorities are fully represented in our applicant pool, we evaluate all applicants by the same criteria and standards. This evaluation process includes weighing the contribution individual candidates can make to our goals of achieving a diverse faculty and broadening our curriculum. All candidates are held to the same expectations regarding their potential as teachers, scholars and contributing members of the community.

Third, all members of the faculty being considered for tenure are held to the same standards. Once again, teaching, scholarship and contributions to the department and the College as a whole are the criteria, and they apply equally to everyone.

A threat from angry residents

To the Editor:

This letter is to inform the school community of the seething rage you have caused in leaving the monstrous scaffolding on the stairs of Washington Gladstone House. This structure has raised the ire of many in the house. To begin with, aesthetically it destroys the wintry beauty of the Greylock quad. Further, the scaffolding has made an important outdoor access way to the house impassable. As a result, many unfortunate souls, forced to climb the ice-covered hill next to the house, have been seen tumbling down toward certain injury, their limbs flailing pathetically in vain. Par-

Wrestlers and corn: why should Iowans choose the candidates?

by Chuck Samuelson

The students of Williams College were saved from catastrophe last week by a stroke of luck. Bob Dole and Richard Gephardt did not win the New Hampshire primaries. Whether or not you support the candidacies of the aforementioned candidates, the process by which they nearly won New Hampshire is cause for concern. Before the Iowa Caucuses, Vice President George Bush was enjoying tremendous support in New Hampshire and throughout the rest of the country. After Iowa he lost considerable support in New Hampshire and elsewhere. By using Smoot-Hawley-style appeals for protectionism, Richard Gephardt seemingly came from nowhere to become a serious contender for the Democratic ticket. Many observers were ready to call the primary season over if Dole and Gephardt had won New Hampshire. It was nothing more than luck that prevented them from doing so.

Why are Iowa and New Hampshire so influential in the determination of the country's Presidential candidates? Why should Williams students care? Rationally, there is no logical answer to the first question. It should be clear to almost anyone that the results from Iowa and New Hampshire directly influence the rest of the nation's attitudes about the candidates. Williams students should care about this disproportionate influence because it means that their interests do not share the same weight as those of Iowans and New Hampshireers.

I do not want to insult those among us that have ties to Iowa or New Hampshire. Their interests are no less important than our own, but they are certainly different. What do you really know about Iowa? In 1980 it had 2,913,808 inhabitants, 97.4% of whom were white. There are a lot of farms in Iowa. Dan Gable's Iowa wrestling team is consistently one of the best in the country. Do you really think that the interests of white wrestling corn-farmers are the same as those of the Williams student body? Pat Robertson's support (many on campus would say alarming support) gave his campaign a big lift and promised to make his campaign an important factor throughout the primary follies. Are Pat Robertson's interests your own?

There are two possible solutions to Iowa and New Hampshire's disproportionate influence in the determination of the nation's candidates for President. One is that the parties could return to the smoke-filled room. A bunch of cigar-smoking, cagey party insiders could choose the candidate they thought, by and large, best served the interests of the entire country. Some might complain that bosses are inherently corrupt. However, the bosses are accountable to their constituency. If they fail to select someone who will help their constituency,

HOW TO SPOT A DIP.

DIPPING IS FOR DIPS.
DON'T USE SNUFF OR CHEWING TOBACCO

they lose their jobs. After all, they realize that their power is based on a constituency that expects results. A lack of results equals lack of job.

The smoke-filled room is not the only solution to the problem. The parties could select a national primary/caucus day in which party members from across the nation voted for the candidate of their choice. This way, no one state or region would, by dint of timing, have an unfair advantage over the other. They could even make this "National Primary/Caucus Day" on April 15. That way, income tax day and the day the Titanic sank could also be remembered as the day this nation chooses its candidates for President.

Sex guide should present more than one view to the school community by Robert Howie '90

and Brian Carlson '91

Last fall, the Williams Guide to Health and Sex, sponsored by Peer Health, was distributed to the Williams community. We fully endorse the concept of such a guide for the student population, recognizing its potential value. Particularly informative and useful, in fact, were sections dealing with such topics as rape and sexual harassment, sexually transmitted diseases, drugs and alcohol, and eating disorders. We believe that most people would agree that a book dealing with difficult and sensitive topics such as these is a clear asset to Williams students.

We are, however, concerned about the way in which several additional topics were handled in the Guide. One section of the handbook with which we take issue is the chapter dealing with abortion, an issue which is debated as fervently and vigorously today as it has ever been. We found this section inadequate in two respects. First, the pro-life viewpoint on the issue is not presented in a fair way.

While all acknowledge the current legality of abortion, we note that the public is divided on the question of its propriety. In one line, the Guide asserts, "So much emphasis is put on motherhood that many people act as though a fetus is (sic) more important than a woman." The truth is that those who oppose abortion believe that, as a life, the fetus deserves equal legal status with, not transcendent importance over, the woman. The pro-life position is thus distorted, and the position taken by the Guide is far from even-handed.

The second deficiency in this section involves the description of an abortion. It is ironic that while sexual acts are discussed in explicit detail, abortions are described only in distant medical terminology.

lead to depression than childbirth. The familiar argument over the beginning of life has not been settled in either side's favor, and we feel that the Guide should reflect accurately students' differing beliefs on the subject.

We were most disturbed by the overall attitude which the book takes toward sex itself. Throughout its pages, one senses an appallingly flippant and careless view of this most intimate and personal of human activities. Two particularly striking manifestations:

cal gratification without regard to the identity and feelings of the other people involved?

2) (On "broach (ing) the subject of safer sex with any prospective partners"): "The only thing that's gonna come between us is a condom." This one-liner, while no doubt intended to be taken in jest, nevertheless encourages a view of other people as merely potential sex partners, an attitude which is greatly damaging to efforts to develop meaningful romantic relationships.

The point we wish to make through these examples is that while we recognize that Williams students hold differing beliefs on such questions as under which circumstances sexual intercourse is morally right, we hope that we can all find common ground in the recognition that it is a profoundly serious entity; and that, as such, sex should never be treated as though it were merely a casual, recreational activity with no inherent emotional or psychological consequences for the people involved.

We have attempted to be both temperate and fair in our raising of these issues. It is our hope that Peer Health will take our concerns and those suggested by other students into account when it prepares the next edition of the Guide.

Sex should never be treated as though it were a casual, recreational activity.

rology. The unborn child, for instance, is referred to as "fetal tissue," never ascribing to it any human characteristics. And while the statistical comparison of abortion to a tonsillectomy may well be accurate, it gives the false impression that these operations are analogous and demeans the significance of pregnancy itself. Motherhood and childbirth are put in an unfavorable light, while abortion is presented as merely an uncomplicated medical procedure and alleged to be less likely to

1) "condom is like an American Express car; anyone who is sexually active should not leave home without one." Such a statement implies that faithfulness to a single partner is unlikely and rather odd, for the moment you become sexually active, you will probably want to sleep with almost anyone you happen to meet. Should we not agree that the decision to have intercourse should be a response to a deep love for another person, and not simply a declaration that one is out to attain the maximum physiolents visiting Williams have expressed concern that their children are living in a construction zone.

As far as we can tell, the scaffolding hasn't been used in months. If it was in fact used at all. As such, and for the reasons we have stated, we demand that it be removed by noon of March 1. We have nothing but the greatest respect for B&G. It would be a shame if something unfortunate happened to their equipment.

CC adds soph reps

College Council voted unanimously to amend its constitution to include four sophomore representative seats at its meeting last Thursday.

The number of freshman representatives will be reduced from five to three, while the number of at-large members will be reduced from six to four to make room for the new positions.

In order to implement the changes, two sophomores will be elected in October 1988, and the remaining two sophomore seats will be filled in the spring 1989 elections.

The amendment also specifies who will elect certain college council representatives. The change was necessary due to ambiguities in the constitution. It now explicitly states that council members from housing groups will be elected by the residents of each house and that class representatives will be elected by the entire student body.

The council also voted unanimously to implement standing rules for election procedures.

"These are basically ideas that we had to make sure elections were run fairly," Council President Carter Zinn said.

The standing rules specify that no campaign materials may be distributed before campaign week; no campaign materials (except mailings) will be allowed in the room where elections take place; any violation of rules will result in a two day reduction of campaign time for candidates; and each president/vice president ticket will be allotted $50 by the council to use for their campaign.

Regarding runoff elections, the new standing rules specify that if more than two candidates are running for a single position and no candidate receives more than 50 percent of the vote, then the two top candidates will participate in a runoff election. In addition, the number of candidates in a runoff election for a position held by more than one person, such as members at-large, will be two times the number of positions available after the first election.

"These standing rules are a definite improvement on what we used to have, which was nothing," Zinn said.

MoCA before Senate

Senator Peter Webber (R-Pittsfield) said last week that he expected the bill which would fund the proposed Massachusetts Museum of Contemporary Art (MassMoCA) to come before the full Massachusetts Senate either yesterday or today.

Webber originally said that he expected that the Senate Ways and Means Committee would discharge the bill to the full senate with a favorable recommendation when it met today. But as Webber described it, things accelerated.

In a telephone interview Saturday, he said that a telephone poll of committee members would take place on Monday (yesterday). This would allow the bill to go on the calendar to be voted on as soon as possible, perhaps on the same day.

Webber said that he realizes that he is asking his colleagues to bend the rules to allow swift action.

"We realize that we have immediate circumstances surrounding the elements of our project," he said.

He also said that he does not expect problems from other legislative delegations requesting money for museums because the comprehensive convention centers bill that would fund their projects is also moving along quickly.

If passed by the Senate, the bill would have to return to the House for approval. It would require a two-thirds vote there for passage since the bill is a bond authorization measure. It would then be enacted immediately.

CUL meets with Fix

Members of the Committee on Undergraduate Life (CUL) suggested that freshman advisors should be primarily intellectual guides and not registration officers at their meeting last Wednesday.

In a meeting with Registrar Charles Toomajian, Dean of the College Stephen Flx and Dean of Freshmen Joan Edwards, the CUL continued their discussion of possible revisions in the freshmen advising system.

"We must differentiate between faculty advising and assisting in choosing courses," Associate Dean of the College Mary Kenyatta, a member of the CUL, said in voicing the committee's consensus that the administrative role of freshmen advisors should be simplified or even eliminated.

While the committee seemed to agree on pairing freshmen with advisors who have similar academic interests, the prospect of assigning the advisors later in the year was quite controversial.

"It is possible to improve registration, but who helps a student drop and add courses?" asked Toomajian. "I'm not offering the Registrar's Office."

Flx, formerly an advisor himself, agreed with Toomajian and said, "I have a sense of my greatest obligation [to my freshmen] during the drop/add period."

Assistant Professor of Philosophy Peter Lipton, a member of the CUL, pointed out that assigning advisors after the drop/add period would also enable many freshmen to be paired with one of their first-semester teachers. He added that such a match would promote a closer-knit, intellectual relationship between advisors and advisees.

The CUL suggested establishing departmental open-houses in central locations such as Towne Field House, to aid freshmen in making course changes. The committee criticized the current open-houses and Dean Edwards agreed, saying "I think we can really work on the open-houses and rescheduling them."

"I want to emphasize that these are ideas and we are not really making proposals at this time," Beaver said after the meeting. About reforms in time for next fall, she said, "It's likely that the registration process will be streamlined and that there will be a shift away from assignments by entry."

Questioned separately on the feasibility of such administrative changes for next year, Assistant Registrar Keith Finan said, "If the community as a whole decides a change is necessary, it can be implemented very quickly."

"We said all along that it was our intention to get some of these changes in place next year and I'm confident they will be," Flx said later in the week.

Elections approaching

Two juniors will vie for the 1988-89 presidency of College Council in the next two weeks.

Candidates for president and vice president are Trace Blankenship '89/John Kelsh '89 and Ted Hobart '89/Dane Dudley '89. John Bellwoar '89 is running for secretary and Brad Gendell '90, Mary Ellen Sullivan '89 and Zia Huque '89 are candidates for treasurer.

The other positions the elections will fill are the two minority representatives, two people from each class for the Honor and Discipline Committee, a freshman or sophomore to serve for two years on the Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibility, six at-large council members and housing category representatives.

College Council elections will be held on Mar. 3 and 4. Self-nominations for officers were due by noon on Feb. 20 and those for non-officers were due by 4:30 today.

Co-ops filled

Last Monday, thirty-one women and twenty-nine men were accepted into co-operative houses for the upcoming academic year, Linda Brown of the Housing Office said. They were selected from a group of 219 students, 140 men and 79 women.

According to Associate Dean of the College Mary Kenyatta, these figures differ significantly from those of last year when only six women as opposed to fifty-three men were accepted.

"Last year was the blip in terms of so many males and so few females," she said. Kenyatta said she was pleased with the current system and said that it should be retained for future years.

Of the six co-ops, Dewey, Doughty, Goodrich, Lambert, Milham and Susan Hopkins, only two are single-sex. Lambert will be all female while Susan Hopkins will be all male. This year, four of the six co-ops are all male.

The method of selection was the same both years. Each student who applied received a random number. This year, however, students were invited to watch the process. Groups of students with the lowest random numbers are accepted first.

Some students have said that the system discriminates against smaller groups because the larger groups have better chances of receiving a lower random number.

This year, the accepted groups ranged in size from one to thirteen (the maximum size allowable due to house size). Nine of thirty-two groups were accepted, Kenyatta said. The average group size was nine.

Williams sets up program to encourage minority teaching

Williams College has formed a consortium with three other colleges to inaugurate a program to encourage minority students to consider careers in college and university teaching. The Ford Foundation and the Andrew W. Mellon foundation have each awarded grants of $280,000 to be administered by Williams and shared with Carleton College, Mount Holyoke College and Oberlin College to fund the project over the next four years.

Williams College President Francis Oakley said, "We are grateful to the Ford Foundation and the Andrew W. Mellon Foundation for giving us the opportunity to proceed with a program which we believe will have a significant impact at four of the nation's leading liberal arts colleges. We believe the consortial approach will produce the widest-reaching effects and provide the fullest use of existing resources."

The four consortium colleges have historically produced disproportionately large numbers of students who have gone on to earn Ph.D.'s and pursue academic careers, in part because students at these schools have been encouraged to collaborate with their teachers on research projects.

At present, a high proportion of minority graduates at these colleges continue their education in professional programs, but relatively few enter Ph.D. programs. The new program is designed to identify talented minority students, introduce them to the process and intellectual challenge of collaborative research through close contact with faculty members, and

by Ann Mantil

The new Soviet policy of glasnost, or openness, directly affected twelve Williams students this Winter Study. For the first time in the school's history, a three-week trip to the Soviet Union was offered as a Winter Study course.

The program was part of an exchange between Williams and Tbilisi University in the Soviet Republic of Georgia, which includes a visit by twelve Soviet students to Williams in September.

Assistant Professor of Russian Darra Goldstein worked through the Citizens' Exchange Council (CEC) in New York City to arrange the trip.

"It facilitated things a great deal," Goldstein said. "The CEC is an organization with a whole staff used to dealing with bureaucracies."

Not everything went smoothly. The group did not receive their visas until an hour before their flight left New York. Once in Moscow, they discovered that many arrangements had not been made.

"We really had to fend for ourselves until we got to Georgia," Goldstein said. "We were housed at Moscow State University, but no meals had been arranged for us, and the cafeteria food was nearly inedible." Although the living conditions were not ideal, the students said they enjoyed the freedom of being on their own.

Any guest in their culture is a wonderful thing. They take hospitality very seriously.

"I'm so glad we had the opportunity not to be in the clutches of Intourist [the state tourism agency]," Patty Donnelly '89 said.

Red carnations

On arrival in Georgia, the Americans were astounded by the openness of the Georgian students. "They each had a red carnation for us," said Donnelly. "The girls were talking and taking my hand, and it was the first day!"

UMass at Amherst

Protesting campus racial problems, 200 minority students occupied the University of Massachusetts New Africa House from Feb. 13 to 17. The occupation was spurred by the Feb. 7 beating of two black students by five white students and ended when school officials met many of the protestors' demands. These included: making the student conduct code more explicit as to the consequences students guilty of racial violence or harassment will face; creating more of a minority cultural center at the African-American studies building; working to increase minority enrollment at UMass by 50 percent and recruiting more minority faculty and staff. Some of the protestors' demands had already received the administration's attention, due to the October 1986 racial tension at UMass which followed a brawl over a World Series game. See related story p. 8.

North Adams State

North Adams State College student Lawrence Cerrito, accused of raping a female NASC student in a dormitory last spring, was declared not guilty by a Berkshire Superior Court jury last week. According to the prosecution, Cerrito raped the woman after assisting her to her dormitory room from a sofa where she had been sleeping. The woman said that she had been drinking earlier in the evening.

Princeton

Princeton University was plagued by alcohol abuse problems during the week of its eating clubs' initiation parties, when the heaviest drinking of Princeton's school year usually occurs. One eating club, the Cloister Inn, has suspended the serving of alcohol for an indefinite period of time following an incident where a sophomore overdrank at the club's initiation party and nearly died. The student was admitted to the Princeton Medical Center in a coma with a blood-alcohol content between 0.4 and 0.5. The university's president, Harold Shapiro, eating club presidents, graduate board members, and university administrators met following the incident to assess the campus's alcohol problems and seek ideas on how to control alcohol use at the clubs.

"We were trying to explain to them how fast our culture is," Cavender said. "There it's expected that you have to wait all the time, like with shopping lines. Maybe that slowness has lent a certain depth to their culture. The people are a little reserved."

Politics

Goldstein noticed that when politics came up in discussions, the Georgian students would withdraw a little. "I don't think they wanted to start the exchange on a political basis. They wanted it to be more humanistic. But now we have this wonderful basis on which to work, so I think I'd like to force the limits of that trust a little when they come here by creating forums for discussion."

Cavender said she did not find the Georgians as reserved on political issues. "Brezhnev is just getting re-evaluated over there, and they were very outspoken about what a stupid man he was. They'd also talk about Gorbachev and how they weren't sure if he'd last, which is a very frank thing to be saying."

Williams women said the Georgian attitude towards women contrasted with American attitudes.

"During toasting at meals, women aren't allowed to stand up," Cavender said. "Suddenly you're four feet shorter than the men. It bothered me that they wouldn't take my elbow getting off the bus. But men would still listen to what women had to say. It wasn't like the women were shrinking violets or anything."

After their week in Georgia, the group spent two days in Leningrad and returned to Moscow for additional sightseeing. "At the end of the trip we were under the auspices of Intourist, and there was something a little

Profs voice expectations of tutorials

by Daniel Drezner

Williams students who feel that their classes bear little resemblance to the aphorism about Mark Hopkins and a student on a log will have the opportunity to experience a more intimate type of learning, British-style.

Starting next September, Williams will offer approximately 25 tutorials, with at least one for every major, patterned after the Oxford University system. Although it is seven months away, preparation for this program started last May, when the faculty overwhelmingly approved the program, and is continuing at a steady pace.

Professor of Economics Henry Bruton, the director of the tutorial program, said he is enthusiastic about its implementation.

"The Williams program is a very rich program in terms of its modes of teaching, and this will add another mode to this array," he said.

Each department will be required to offer at least one tutorial next year. The maximum number of students per tutorial will be ten, organized in five pairs. Each pair will meet once a week with their professor for one hour. Students will alternate giving oral presentations, which will be critiqued.

The actual program under preparation differs radically from the original Committee on Educational Policy (CEP) proposal, which included mandatory tutorials both senior and sophomore years. No tutorials will be mandatory, according to Registrar Charles Toomajian, a member of the CEP.

Expectations

Professors slated to teach tutorials next year have mixed opinions as they begin to prepare for their courses. Visiting Professor of Theatre James Rosenberg, who has taught one-on-one independent studies at Carnegie-Mellon University, said he does not like the Oxford-style format. "It [presenting an essay] strikes me as a little bit awkward. I'll run mine more as a discussion group with only two students," he said.

Professor of Religion Norman Peterson, who will teach a tutorial on religion in the first century A.D., also has concerns about the program. "It's very difficult to come up with a syllabus. You only have 10 classes a semester, as opposed to the regular 25," he said.

Assistant Professor of Philosophy Peter Lipton, who was both student and teacher during his graduate work at Oxford, said he is upbeat about the program. "I'm very optimistic. It's an excellent opportunity for teachers and students to develop a working relationship," he said.

Bruton stressed the special value of the tutorial. "The essence of the tutorial is that the student comes to make a presentation. It will help them to develop a position and defend a position. That's different from handing in a paper. It's an instantaneous reaction," he said.

People who have experienced the tutorial system first-hand noted its special challenge to students. Kurt Klebe '88, who spent his junior year at Oxford, taking three tutorials there, said, "You're on the line, and you've got to present a polished piece of work that you won't be embarrassed about."

Klebe also described a major difference between a regular class and a tutorial. "Everything is independent. It's up to you to do the reading. It [giving an oral presentation] was a bit of a shock the first time, but after the second one, I got used to it."

Assistant Professor of Physics William Wooters taught Physics 411, "Classical Mechanics," as a tutorial last semester. He also commented on the ways tutorials benefit students.

"The students got better at explaining their positions. They also learned to anticipate my questions. The course was different from most physics classes because the students did most of the talking," Wooters said that Physics 411 and 405 will both be taught as tutorials next year.

Bruton and Toomajian, though optimistic, conceded that the program will not be perfect. "We have never tried it; No other U.S. school has anything like it...It's different from anything else at the college," Toomajian said.

"Next year is the first year. We'll goof it up a little," Bruton said.

Onel, Peck and Jorling make news

Erol Onel '88 is one of 10 finalists in a nationwide competition for undergraduates and graduate students, sponsored by the Society for Social Studies of Science. He was selected for his research on the ethics of organ transplants.

Based on an abstract of his research, Onel was chosen as a semi-finalist and was then asked to submit a full-length paper entitled "The Organ Farm Debate: Ethical Questions, Unethical Conduct?"

His paper explores the issues surrounding the use of transplanted organs from anencephalic fetuses and the use of neural tissue from aborted fetuses in treating Parkinson's disease. It was originally a paper for Chemistry 217, a course in reproductive and genetic technology.

Robert Peck, chairman of the Department of Physical Education, Athletics and Recreation, was one of five educators from across the nation named to the selection committee of the Bingham Fund for Excellence in Teaching at Transylvania University in Lexington, Kentucky.

Dr. John Chandler, president emeritus of the college, announced the selection committee appointments. Chandler is a member of the Bingham Board of Trustees and president of the Association of American Colleges in Washington, D.C.

Professor of Environmental Studies Thomas Jorling, who is on leave this year and is currently serving as New York State Environmental Conservation Commissioner, caused a bit of a stir last Tuesday when he went to the 1988 Winter Olympics in Calgary as head of the Olympic Regional Development Authority. The problem was not where he did go, but where he did not go.

The Albany Times Union reported Saturday that Jorling failed to appear for a sparkling engagement at the Association of Towns of the State of New York's annual meeting in New York City. Representatives of half the state's population were expecting to discuss solid waste disposal problems with the commissioner at the meeting. Jorling had cancelled the appointment in advance, but association members were not notified of the cancellation, and they booed when Jorling's stand-in, Deputy Commissioner Dr. Darryl Banks, was introduced.

"I don't know the commissioner. I don't know much about him, but I do know I don't like what he did," one member said. "It's just disrespectful."

Henry Rollins mixes the humorous & horrific

by Travis Pierson

America is discovering a new mode of communication. People, especially young ones, are looking beyond music for ways to express their thoughts, instead turning to something once considered strictly for the staid. It is spoken word, and artists such as Jello Biafra of Dead Kennedys and Henry Rollins of the now defunct Black Flag have used their popularity in the world of music to bring spoken word and the birth of a new poetry-talk-preaching out of small clubs and into the awareness of large numbers of people.

One of the most popular of the new breed of poet/orators is Henry Rollins. In Los Angeles, his home when he is not on tour, which he is for nearly ten months out of the year, his popularity has nearly reached the superstar proportions that X had a decade ago. Through his recordings, which are released through the small Santa Monica based label, Texas Hotel, his self-published books, and his semi-improvisational performances, Rollins has gained a loyal, and sometimes fanatical following, and teenage girls from L.A. are replacing posters of the Smiths' Morrissey with images of a tattooed, grimacing Rollins.

His talks are not expositories on the philosophy of a straight edge punk, but instead, he speaks with a unique brand of black humor which he laces with more serious pieces of prose and poetry. Rollins makes the audience laugh, and, at the same time, cover at his views of the human race.

Last Wednesday, Rollins performed at Williams in Brooks Rogers Recital Hall as part of his current Ugly Big Mouth tour.

Rollins on . . .

Youth in Institutions: I get calls from crazy girls late at night, usually after midnight. They sound like they're from another planet. The other night one calls from a home in Orange County. She told me her parents put her there because they don't want to see her anymore. She says her older brother tells her she's stupid. She believes him. She feels bad. She starts to cry on the phone... She tells me that she lives with a lot of other kids...strangers. She sleeps in a ward with them. A tough, weird reality. She's 12-and-a-half years old.

Performing: ...Some nights it hurts so much to play. Every song hurts -knees, back, head, no air, lungs billowing like windless sails. All I want to do is drink a gallon of icy water and be allowed to die back behind the amps. Some nights it hurts that much...

Writing: I never aspired to be a writer or anything. And the fact that I'm doing this now is kind of crass.

Obnoxious People in Trains: Check out this totally wild hallucination fantasy: You're strapped down to a gynecological set of stirrups and babies are shooting from between your legs and smashing against the facing wall. The gynecologist is in hipwaders and a yellow rain jacket and matching rain hat. No, wait, he's in black leather boots and pants with no shirt on. His nipples are pierced; his head is shaved. He's jumping up and down in his little tights and there's blood and guts aplenty. Ok, hey, just as a joke why don't you blow your brains out?

from "Train Hell"

"I do a lot of shows without a big band behind me," he said, "just talking because I think it is a real honest and direct mode of communication, because so much music and other avenues of communication these days aren't communication. It's like a big ad..."

Rollins' shows are built on some of his prewritten material, but he improvises and takes each performance in a different direction. He began by talking about killing cockroaches in his east L.A. home, followed by a story about a feeble old woman in a supermarket around Christmas time, and how "Grown men in suits were pulling all sorts of lame-o Olympics, running around her trying to get out the door before her," and how, when she got out of the store, she leaned over a trash can and began to cry. Rollins synthesized the tales of the cockroach and the old lady, saying, "The roach crawling. The lady crawling. Me smashing my fist. People trampling over her," and how everyone, at one point, will be made to crawl, and will inevitably be pounded on by someone else.

Rollins' preachings are not always original or really enlightening, but it is his humorous delivery that makes one listen. Like many comics (a label Rollins would deplore), his shows are littered with various ugly stereotypes, and his obsession with women as threatening, evil creatures is disturbing, as in one of his "Date Hell" series depicting the woman as a vampire.

By the end of his performance, it seemed that Rollins had stripped himself bare in front of the audience. He spoke of his sexual and personal frustrations and shortcomings, his difficult childhood and his ordeals with his "nasty mean old dad." At the same time, Rollins was rock hard, in complete, unemotional control.

Indeed, Rollins seems to be built on paradoxes. He acts as a kind of subject/object: he entertains and makes us laugh, but he is so entrenched in what he detests that it is difficult to take him seriously. He says that everyone should responsible for themselves, scoffing at the heroic stature of Bono and Bob Geldof, but, at the same time, he has organized a record label donating profits to battered children, and so much of Rollins' stance is grounded in a hero-worship egotism. He hates a lot of things, but he said in an interview after the show, "I'm totally optimistic in my mind. To me what's negative is Bruce Springsteen, U2, Ronald Reagan — people telling you that everything is all right. I'm for confrontation — getting to things and moving through them. I hate hope. It's passive. Action is what matters."

Trouble Funk forwards new styles with go-go music

by Eric Hanson

Witnessing Trouble Funk live is not at all like "going to a concert." It's more like a celebration, or even an indoor street festival, as the hundreds that packed the Mission Park Dining Hall for the group's Thursday night performance discovered.

Founded nearly 10 years ago in Washington, D.C., Trouble Funk has developed hand-in-hand with the go-go music style that it plays, the city's original blend of funk, rap, and soul.

Go-go music is the product of a generation of musicians reared on the sounds of soul singer James Brown and the '70s supergroup Parliament/Funkadelic whose identifying characteristic is a strong, continuous dance groove. And, as perhaps the only exporter of this otherwise well-kept musical secret — they regularly play in cities throughout the country, have a significant following in Europe, and begin a two-week tour of Japan tomorrow — Trouble Funk is helping the music break out of the city limits of our nation's capitol.

The band wasted no time in establishing a party atmosphere after taking the stage Thursday night. The 12-man band set the dance floor in motion with a commanding presence that only increased in the course of the two-and-a-half hour set. "You Should Be Dancing" led into "Show You How To Do It" and then into a raucous version of "Hey Tee Bone," a song featuring percussionist Timothy David, one of the master-minds behind the creation of the Trouble Funk groove that sweeps up the entire dance in the infectious energy of the group, an energy that the band seeks to maintain as its top priority.

"First we've got to come together, and party. Then we can discuss our problems."

"When you're dancing," explained guitarist and group co-founder Robert Reed in an interview before the show, "you don't want them [the band members] to stop every five minutes and say, 'That was such-and-such and now we're going to play...' You want the music to keep going."

This attitude is a fundamental part of the go-go music formula and of the Trouble Funk philosophy. The groups stayed true to its word, stopping the music briefly only two or three times in the course of the evening. The band eased out of one tune and into the next with such smooth musical segues that often one

At the council meeting, Ruderman told members, "Our idea stems from a continuous disappointment with the function of The Record."

"Another paper is necessary," Ruderman said in an interview, "Because The Record, in my opinion, is not fulfilling the job of being the forum for debate on community affairs, providing necessary information in a well-written and journalistically interesting style, being an outlet for different opinions and being an interesting representation of the high intellectual caliber on this campus."

Opportunity to write
According to Mike Riley '88, the other of the paper's coordinators, a second paper is necessary because it will provide students who are interested in journalism with an increased opportunity to write.

Joe Thorndike '88, a former editor in chief of The Record, said, "I do feel there's a need for another paper. More competition can only help the quality of journalism at Williams College."

More competition can only help the quality of journalism at Williams College.

Ruderman said he discussed the idea of a new newspaper with Associate Dean Mary Kenyatta and Dean of the College Stephen Flx.

Flx said that the nature of his meeting with representatives from The Issue was informational. Concerning the need for another paper, Flx said, "The college has no position on this."

The Issue hopes to reach an agreement with Peer Health for use of their room in Baxter basement. The paper is also negotiating with The Record for the use of darkroom equipment.

Preceding the council vote last week, Ruderman conducted a promotional campaign that included posters and a campus-wide mailing. An article on the new paper also appeared in The Advocate, which, according to a written proposal distributed to council members, will typeset the paper. The college radio station has also run a number of promotional announcements.

Over 60 people
Riley said The Issue currently has a staff of over 60 people. A board of directors, which will probably be appointed tonight, will assign stories.

The method of distribution of the paper has not yet been determined, but it probably will be distributed to S.U. boxes or at dining halls on Thursdays. In addition, 1500 copies will be distributed in Williamstown.

According to the proposal, the North Adams Transcript will print the paper in tabloid format on newsprint.

"It probably won't look the same two weeks in a row," Ruderman said. "Innovation and experimentation are the key to this paper."

"In my opinion," he added, "The Record has become stagnant. Its format is static. It doesn't experiment and change the way I feel a campus newspaper ought to." He said that entrenched administrative methods have served to stop innovation on The Record.

The two center pages of The Issue will be devoted to debate on one issue, usually in the form of two opposing essays, Ruderman said.

Organizers said the paper will also include a community page with restaurant reviews and movie schedules.

"It will attempt to bring the community in a lot more as to what's going on here, invite their input, and lend an appreciation to Williams students of what is going on in the community," Ruderman said.

The paper will also include an international page and a social page.

Ruderman said, "I think we're attempting to do things The Record doesn't attempt to do. We're not trying to put it out of existence," Ruderman said. "I think there probably is space for two papers on campus."

BSU travels to UMass in show of support

by Peter Balaban

Twenty-two Williams students travelled to the University of Massachusetts (UMass) campus at Amherst last Tuesday to show support for student protestors there (see in Other Ivory Towers, p.5).

The trip, sponsored by the Black Student Union (BSU), was organized by Monique Waddell '90, Joyce Rogers '88 and Cassandra Kirk '89.

Waddell said that she called student protestors at UMass last Monday night to ask how the BSU could help or show support after a call had been received by the BSU from a UMass student.

She said that protestors told her that just showing up at the New Africa House on the UMass campus would be sufficient, but that they would have to hurry because negotiations with UMass Chancellor Joseph Duffey were scheduled to begin the following afternoon. So, on Monday night, Waddell and Kirk began calling BSU members, asking them if they would go to UMass on Tuesday.

A total of 22 students, not all of them black, said they would go. The BSU was able to obtain, through the Dean's office, access to college cars on shorter than usual notice.

Rodney Cunningham '88, a BSU member who went on the trip, said that upon arrival at the New Africa House, Williams students were asked to open their bags and take off their coats because of a bomb threat the protestors had received the previous day. Cunningham said that the Williams group was briefed on why the UMass students had taken over the building and what they hoped to accomplish.

Separate room
White Williams students who had travelled to Amherst were not allowed into the main house but stayed in a separate room, Waddell said. She explained that if the protestors had let white students from Williams into the main house it would not have been fair to other white supporters at UMass, because there was not enough room in the house to fit them all.

Cunningham said the protestors were focused on their goals but not militant. "They had no reason to be militant

...these people were wronged and they put forth their needs before the administration and were waiting for the administration to act on [those needs] ...what they were doing is what most black students across the nation are doing, reacting to racism."

"I think that as Williams College students we can certainly see the similarities between the University of Massachusetts and Williams-town in their takeover and our takeover of Hopkins Hall in 1968," he said.

Special reason
BSU member Dawn Pettway '91, who also travelled to Amherst with the group, said, "The special reason I went was because I knew if something like that happened here (at Williams) we would also need outside support because there is such a small percentage of black students here."

Waddell said that although white students did participate in the BSU trip, she did not want people to think that all Williams students show a great enough concern about racism. "We have had a lot of our own problems here," she said.

College establishes Allison Davis lectureship

College President Francis Oakley has announced the establishment of an annual lecture and residency in honor of a distinguished alumnus of the college, Allison Davis, valedictorian of the Class of 1924.

Davis was a pioneer in the social anthropological study of class structure in the South. He taught for nearly 40 years in the education department at the University of Chicago and was the first black to serve with full status in any northern, predominantly white college or university.

The Allison Davis Lectures are to be given in one of Davis' areas of scholarly concern, ordinarily addressing some aspect of race, class or education in the United States. The first lecture is scheduled for tomorrow night, when Troy Duster, chairman of the department of sociology and director of the Institute for the Study of Social Change at the University of California at Berkeley, will speak on the topic,

Troy Duster

"Reverberations of Urban Education: When Do We Pay?"

Allison Davis was born in Washington, D.C. After graduating summa cum laude from Williams in 1924, Davis earned a master's degree in English from Harvard and then turned his attention to what were to become his life-long interests, anthropology, psychology and education. He did further graduate work at Harvard and the London School of Economics, and earned his Ph.D. in anthropology in 1942 from the University of Chicago. He accepted a teaching appointment there, and in 1970 was named John Dewey Distinguished Service Professor of Education.

Davis was one of the first researchers to study the influence of economic and social factors in the education of poor children, and, as early as 1948, attacked the assumption that children of lower-income families were less intelligent than from the above bodies, Wagner said.

The report states that in formulating its proposals, the committee sought to avoid measures that would either harm the campus environment or unduly strain college financial resources, while trying to meet students' legitimate need for transportation both on the campus and to and from the college.

Reed, who received a preliminary copy of the report, said that he expected a decision soon from the dean on prohibiting freshmen from bringing cars.

Economic climate
Building the 90 additional parking spaces and expanding the drive in front of the museum would cost about $200,000, according to Wagner.

"We have to decide whether we want to spend that much ...

Patrolman John Kennedy said he thought the two incidents were related. He said that police had questioned two suspects in relation to the incidents. But Kennedy said that the police did not have enough evidence to charge the suspects and were hoping that students who had information on either of the incidents will come forward.

given the current economic climate," he said.

"I personally hope that we don't have to build more parking lots," Reed said, adding that he would rather spend the money on other things. He expressed skepticism over the taxi service proposal but said he thought providing transportation to places like Albany was a good idea.

The report states that if the demand for parking spaces, particularly by upperclassmen, grows beyond the facilities available, a system for further restricting student use of cars should be established in consultation with appropriate student groups. If parking facilities have to be expanded further, the most appropriate place to do so would be the Denison Park area, the report says.

Wagner said that because the current proposals only apply to changes on college land that would not be subject to envi-

the margin to seven midway through the half. After coach Harry Sheehy called time, the Ephs rolled off six straight points, climaxed by a slam dunk by Bill Melchionni '89 from Mike Masters '89. Good solid defense and excellent foul shooting enabled the squad to cruise to victory.

Major wound up the game with 29 points, while Masters added 15 and grabbed 11 boards. Williams scored a career high 20 points, including three triolks.

"We played well tonight," the sophomore said. "It was a good team effort."

On Thursday night, a combination of turnovers, poor foul shooting and Panther luck allowed Middlebury to overcome a 12 point deficit in the last 3:50 and beat the Ephs. Williams jumped out to an early seven point lead behind the strong play of Major. But Middlebury battled back, as the play went back and forth, and the Eph lead rested at two, 37-35, at the intermission.

Middlebury assumed a 45-41 lead four minutes into the second half behind John Humphrey's two buckets. But Junior guard Bill Melchionni's six points keyed a 10-0 spurt that gave Williams a 51-45 lead with 13:00 remaining. Tenacious defense by the Ephs limited the Panthers to poor shooting, as Williams held its six point lead.

Butler, For Three!

Sophomore Mike Butler connected on three consecutive bombs from Bonus land, and the Ephs had themselves a comfortable 69-58 lead. Williams sustained its double-digit lead when Major sank two free throws with 3:50 remaining and the score stood at 78-66. Two consecutive Eph turnovers led to five Panther points, but a Mike Masters layup kept the score at 82-75 with :40 left. Two Panther trifectas sandwiched a missed Williams free throw, trimming the Eph margin to 82-81 at the :13 mark. Another missed one-and-one opportunity gave the Panthers one last shot, and forward Parker Ward's jumpshot passed cleanly through the hoop as time ran out.

The game marked the second time this season that a last second Middlebury shot nipped the Ephs. This game, however, all but eliminated Williams from the ECAC playoff picture. Humphrey led all scorers with 29 points, and Melchionni and Major scored 25 and 20 respectively to pace the Ephmen. Williams winds up the 1987-88 season at Amherst against the Lord Jeffs on Saturday.

While the Amherst match was close, the Wesleyan match was a massacre. The Ephs were badly outclassed by the Cardinals who have won the Little Three each year since 1970. The most exciting moment of the match came in the 190 pound match in which Duff lost his first match of the year 7-2. The large Williams crowd surrounded the mat and urged Duff on by chanting his name as he came on the mat. Duff was hurt by his inability to take down his powerful opponent and failed to capitalize on the Wesleyan wrestler's inability to hold him down.

The season concludes next week with the New England tournament where the Ephs will get to wrestle many of the Jeffs and Cardinals again. Duff will probably be seeded second in the tournament and is likely to get a rematch against the Wesleyan 190-pounder in the finals.

encourage them to consider college teaching as a career. The consortium members believe that this concerted effort is likely to have greater impact than four individual programs would, and that it will provide students with greater breadth of research possibilities.

Each of the four colleges will annually select four to six academically talented minority students to participate in the program. Each Research Scholar will receive a stipend for his or her work which can be carried out either over a summer or a summer and an academic year. Year-long projects would be conducted at the student's own institution. Summer projects can be undertaken at any of the consortium colleges.

President Oakley has named Assistant Director of Admissions Jo Ann Gray-Murray as the Williams Coordinator of the project. Along with representatives from Carleton, Mount Holyoke and Oberlin, Gray-Murray will be active in acquainting students and faculty with the program and in overseeing its operation and follow-up projects.

but the senior netminder was equal to every challenge.

Nail biting time

The Mohawks kept the pressure on, and finally dented the nets to pull to 4-3 with just 30 seconds remaining. Having pulled its goalie in favor of an extra attacker, North Adams kept the puck in the Williams end and Morrison again came up strong. Junior assistant-captain Tim Frechette took control of a rebound, wheeled around and fired the puck into the center of the empty North Adams goal from 120 feet away.

That the squad got so inspired for this big game was gratifying in light of last Tuesday's lackluster effort in a 7-2 loss to Babson in Wellesley. The only bright spots in the loss were the improved play of the fourth line of Walt Hoffman '89, Bob Santry '90, and Chris Headrick '91, as well as the emergence of speedy forward Ian Smith '91 on a regular shift for the first time.

The squad's record now stands at 7-14 and 4-11 in the conference. With a win over Salem State on Wednesday night at home, the squad can surpass last season's seven win mark.

A three-year agreement that will renew automatically unless either institution objects is under negotiation right now.

"It's so open now, it's exciting, but it could close up," Goldstein said. "If we have this open-ended agreement, we won't be as dependent on the vagaries of the Soviet political system."

Trouble Funk crosses musical boundaries

did not notice the change until the next song was well underway.

Reed prides himself on the band's ability to cryptically communicate on stage in order to maintain the continuous funk feel. The band does not follow a pre-planned song order but instead relies on cues, usually vocal ones, from one of the group's front men, which include Robert Reed, his brother, trumpeter/vocalist Taylor Reed, and their cousin, bassist/lead vocalist Tony Fisher.

"Sometimes," explained Robert Reed after the show, "it [the cue] is as little as someone scratching his eye."

The group kept things at a feverish pitch going into the second hour of the set. "Still Smokin'," from the soundtrack to the little-known 1985 movie "Good to Go," featured some of the catchiest lyrics of the night and even more crowd participation than in the group's first hour of playing. Trouble Funk participates in an ongoing dialogue with its audience. The group establishes a relationship that far surpasses the token level of interaction encouraged by even the most crowd-oriented dance bands. "Let's Get Small," James Brown's "Sex Machine," and "Trouble," from the group's latest release on Island Records, Trouble Over Here, all featured this type of participation as the main focus of attention. At one point, Fisher and the guitarist Reed introduced some friendly competition between the two halves of the dance floor, each of them aligning himself with one of the sides and demanding declarations of his contingency's willingness to party.

The call-and-response format is an integral part of the Trouble Funk formula and, in large part, accounts for the group's attractiveness to even those members of the audience who are unfamiliar with the group or go-go music in general.

"The way we're talking to you now," Robert Reed told this reporter before the show, "is the same way we talk on stage. People are more responsive when you talk like that."

Keyboardist James Avery cited the importance of the community feeling encouraged by this format in regard to the group's ability to communicate with its audience. "First we've got to come together, and party," he explained, "Then we can discuss our problems."

An extended version of "Drop the Bomb," the hit song that first brought recognition to the group after its formation in 1978 ended the show, climaxing with a furious solo exchange between Reed on guitar and Fisher on bass that developed into an out-and-out battle. At the end, Fisher's teeth-plucked barrage of notes was answered by Reed's distorted rendition of "Jingle Bells," which signalled the end of the competition, and of the show.

If the response of Thursday night's audience is any indication, things are looking good for go-go music. Avery has high hopes for this relatively young musical form. "It's got to ease its way into the market," he said, citing the examples of other popular musical forms in support of his optimism for its success. "Before there was jazz, there was no jazz; before there was rock, there was no rock. And before the Beatles came out, no one had heard anything like that." Trouble Funk may not be the next Beatles, but growing popularity seems inevitable. After an hour-long interview and over two hours of witnessing the group live, only one question remained unanswered: why the name "Trouble Funk?" "That's simple," responded Robert Reed: "When you've got 12 guys rolling down the highway in one van, that's trouble. It's trouble, I'm telling you."

Davis

those from more affluent families. His last book, published shortly before his death in 1983, was "Leadership, Love and Aggression," a psychological study of Frederick Douglass, W.E.B. DuBois, Richard Wright and Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr.

Davis received many honors in his long career. He served on the President's Commission on Civil Rights in 1966-67, and from 1968-72 was Vice Chairman of the Department of Labor's Commission on Manpower Retraining. Williams awarded him an honorary degree in 1974.

In addition to his public talk on Feb. 24, Duster will spend several days on campus and participate in seminars and discussions with students and faculty, as will all future Davis lecturers. The Davis lectureship will be affiliated with the Center for the Humanities and Social Sciences.

Women's track flies past Smith to take final dual

by Mariam Naficy

When the women's track team left Northampton last weekend after the Smith Invitational, they took more than a strong victory with them; they also took away the satisfaction that came with beating a team that has been one of their strongest rivals throughout the cross-country and winter track seasons. The scores, Williams 82, Smith 45, hardly do justice to the Eph-women's performance: they won all but one race, and did very well in the field events.

The standout performance of the field events, and perhaps of the whole meet, was the record set by Nicole Jefferson '90 in the high jump. Jefferson added two inches to the previous record with a jump of 5'4", which, according to Assistant Coach Larry Bell, excited her teammates and spurred them on to further victories. Norah Vincent '90 and Dawn Pettway '91 followed with first and second places in the shotput.

"When we got to the track events and were only a point behind [Smith, whose advantage lay in the field events], I realized they weren't as strong as I had thought they were," Bell said.

Williams began a winning streak which never ended. Anne Platt '91 took off at the beginning of the 1500 and was never seriously challenged; Co-captain Sarah Pierce '88 and Jen Morris '89, who outkicked a Smith runner in the final stretch, followed Platt to achieve a Williams one-two-three victory.

In the closest race of the day, Dawn Macauley '89 won the 55m hurdles, determined by a photo finish. Joan Davis '88 and Kim Barndollar '91 followed with first and second places in the 400m. Macauley then came back to place first in the 600m, while Susan Gray '90, Co-Captain Sarah St. Antoine '88 and Kate Ill '90 swept the 800m with first, second, and third places.

In the final stretch of races, Allison Smith '90 ran to first in the 200m, while Pierce came back to run a tough 3000m against a first-race Smithite. Pierce led at first, was overtaken, then fought, winning the race in 11:01. Milka Brzezinski '89 placed third. Capping off the day were victories in both the mile relay and the two-mile relay races.

Does it seem like an awful lot of names to remember? This is an indication of the team's extraordinary depth, which, according to Morris, "has been the key to the whole season." The Smith Invitational was the last race of the season for several team members; some will continue on to run in the women's Division I Meet next weekend and the ECAC Meet at Bates on March 6. Meanwhile, commented Morris, "[Jefferson's record] was a nice way to bring us into the next season—I think we're really ready for spring."

Purple pail pilfered by Amherst grapplers

by Scott Mozarsky

Disappointing a large Winter Carnival crowd, the Williams Wrestling team lost to Amherst (25-20) and to Wesleyan (45-0) in Saturday's Little Three tri-meet at Lasell Gymnasium.

While the Wesleyan debacle was expected, the Amherst match shocked the Ephs, who had beaten the not-so-Lordly Jeffs by thirty points in the Northern New England tournament. Defeat at the hands of the Defectors was especially disappointing as Williams lost control of the Purple Pail which it had regained last year after a fourteen year dry spell.

Williams got off to a good start against the Jeffs as Steve Felix '90 won an 11-4 decision. Felix took advantage of his superior wrestling background by using difficult leg moves to ride out his larger opponent.

Junior co-captain Jon Dillon notes that, "all season, the team has benefitted from Steve's ability to provide us with momentum with a victory early on in our matches."

At 134, Dillon wrestled a gritty match as he dominated his opponent on takedowns, but lost an 11-7 decision as a result of being beaten on the mat. If a turning point was possible this early in the match, it occurred in the 142 pound class where Ed Anderson '90 was leading 8-5 before he got caught in a freak move and was pinned.

Amherst used the momentum that it gained at 142 to take a 21-3 lead into the upper weight classes. The Ephs closed the gap however with victories from Sean Glynn '91, Mark Duff '89 and Jay Powell '91. Glynn pinned his opponent in the second period by using a mixture of upper body moves and speed. Duff continued his impressive season by winning a technical decision 17-1 in the 190 pound class. At heavyweight, Powell received a forfeit. Although Williams impressed in the upper weight classes, it was a case of too little too late as Amherst won back the purple pail which it had lost to Williams last season.

Number two player Lew Fisher '89 stretches for a forehand in his match against Amherst last week. The men beat both the Lord Jeffs and the Cardinals of Wesleyan by identical 9-0 scores to capture their fourteenth straight Little Three Title.

W. Squash

The women's squash team has come a long way in the month of February. Only two weeks ago at the Howe Cup tourney, a powerful Tufts team shut out the Ephwomen en route to winning Division II, yet last Saturday before a standing-room only crowd in Lasell Gymnasium the racquetees came within two games of defeating the Jumbos, as they lost 6-3.

Allison Buckner '89, Lisa Brayton '91 and Susie Piper '90 grabbed wins for the Ephs, taking the second, fourth, and fifth spots respectively. Piper's match was especially noteworthy as she came back from two game point deficits to win the fourth game.

Senior captain Jeanne Cloppse and Christine Boddicker '88 both pushed their Jumbo opponents to five games before bowing. Cloppse's contest was especially disappointing as she was tied with her opponent at thirteen in the fifth game before losing a three point tiebreaker.

"It was a good match. Every game was close and we were in the match all the way," commented Brayton after the match.

Earlier in the week, Williams defeated Smith 7-2 as Cloppse, Buckner, Piper, Sopt Poosankhom '88, Amy Davidson '90 Boddicker and Wynn Hohlt '89 all copped W's for the Ephwomen.

Next Saturday, the Ephwomen travel to Providence for a tri-meet against Division I opponents Brown and Franklin and Marshall. Brayton spoke of the match, saying "F and M has made a lot of progress in the last couple of years and should give us some good competition, but if we all go into it with a good attitude, I think we should win."

W. Hockey

The women's hockey team finished its season this past Saturday with a narrow defeat at the hands of archrival Wesleyan. The final score of that seesaw battle was 4-3 because of they tied it up with five minutes to go in the first period.

For Williams, the second period was an absolute nightmare as Wesleyan pressed the Eph net for two more goals to take a stunning 3-1 lead. All three Cardinal tallies were provided by the same player.

As is the usual case with a Williams-Wesleyan match up, the game tightened up at the end. With about ten minutes left in the game and with the score still at 3-1, rookie Jill Magnuson '90 scored a crucial goal for the Ephs to get them back into the game. Then misfortune struck as star defenseman Kara Lynch '90 received a nine minute misconduct penalty for merely picking up a broken stick and removing it from the ice. With Lynch out, however, the team was in a jam with only three defensemen at a key point in the game. The Ephs gutted it out though and put it together again at the six minute mark to tie the battle at 3-3. Once again, the scoring was produced by veteran Sarah Shull.

As expected, the last five minutes of the game were characterized by ice long rushes by both teams only to be thwarted by Williams goalie Daisy Hagey '88 and the Wesleyan keeper. This continued as Williams rushed in on the Cardinal goalie with three players alone and were rejected soundly enough so that Wesleyan could come back with a three on one. This time, however, there was no futility as the shot zipped into the corner of the net to give the Cardinals their second one goal victory over the Ephs this year.

Looking back over the season, Coach Briggs could only complement his players on their efforts, especially skaters Amy Marr and Jill Magnuson, who is new to the game this year. He also praised the contributions of goalie Daisy Hagey; defensemen Kristin Moomaw '90, Hilary Klotz '90, and Kara Lynch '90; and first line forwards Kirsten Neuse '89, Sarah Shull, and Catherine Eaton. As for next year, Coach Briggs sees an improvement as a lot of the team were beginners this year and the team has Sue Pitcher, a fine goalie in her own right, moving in for senior Daisy Hagey.

Swimming

Last Wednesday, Williams closed its dual meet season with a men's road win over RPI, 151-54. Coach Samuelson's swimmers swam fast and aggressively in the tune-up meet, where many aimed at championship meet qualifying times.

Rob E. Benson '90 and Michael O'Malley '89 opened strongly, finishing one-two in the 1650 by good margin. The whole meet followed this pattern. The young Engineers could not match previous seasons' performances, having lost many, including All-American Hans Forester.

Freshmen Ray Neufeld, Joel Rosenbaum, and Sean Watson, squeezed out of New England championships only by roster restrictions, blistered their hosts with stunning time drops in tapered races. Classmate Scott Schwager earned his first trip to national championships with a strong three-meter diving win. Paul Dehmel '91 shined with 500 and 400 IM wins.

Burly Dave Brown '89 grabbed an eye-opening second in the 500, his first career entry in the race. Evan Davis '89 and Scott Healy '88 looked strong with a one-two finish in the 100 breast. Their fast times showed their desire to repeat championship successes of last year.

Katy Carr '91 and Lee Schroeder '91 led a small womens' group at the meet aiming for qualifying times in exhibitions swims. Carr joined the New England contingent with a determined effort in 50 back, while Schroeder satisfied expectations of qualifying for nationals with a quick sprint 50. The two will be part of the womens' team of sixteen who travel to Bowdoin tomorrow.

Williams should score well at the Division III New England Championships, held February 26-28, and hope to improve on last year's runnerup finish to Tufts. Versatile Michelle Freeman '90, Dore Lebeau '91, and Schroeder aim to justify their lofty regional standings on the time charts this season.

Diving coach Mandy Glenner has produced a strong young diving corps, led by national qualifier Kathia Vandevenne '91, that could dominate the competition.

Karin Johnson '89, Anne MacEachern '90, and Heather Sung '91 form a strong breaststroke group, while captain Suz MacCormac '88, Caron Whittaker '91, and Allison Furniss '91 will challenge for honors in the distance free and 400 IM. Sophomores Berne Broudy and Connie Davis enter the tough sprint free and fly competition.

Amherst, Bowdoin, and Tufts will prove the Ephs' toughest competition. Sam's exceptionally young team (with one senior and one junior) should fare well in the meet's three-day format and could recapture the title from the Jumbos.

Playoff hopes in jeopardy as men's hoops beaten at buzzer

by Michael K. Harrington

The men's basketball team avenged an early season loss by trouncing the Wesleyan Cardinals 97-84 at the Chandler Gymnasium Saturday night. The victory atoned for Thursday's last second shocking loss to the Middlebury Panthers, and left the Ephs record at 12-9 for the season.

The Ephmen came out smoking against Wesleyan, applying intense defensive pressure on the Cardinals. Garcla Major '90 caught fire from all areas of the court en route to a 19 point first half performance. The relentless pressure not only limited Wesleyan's shooting but also enabled to dominate the boards as they led 49-37 at intermission.

The start of the second stanza was highlighted by an uncommon event for a basketball game. Cardinal Ed Googe threw a punch at sophomore Rich Williams and was subsequently ejected from the game. Major hit both free throws and the Ephs scored on their next possession to extend their lead to 16.

The Williams lead was as large as twenty, but a Cardinal rally cut

Women's basketball burns Smith in thriller

by Jim McDermott

The women's basketball team continued to improve its chances for an ECAC tournament bid by beating Smith and Wesleyan this past week. The Ephs squeaked by Smith last Tuesday in Northampton on a last-second jumper by junior co-captain Nancy Hedeman and returned home Saturday to blow Wesleyan out by 20.

Against Smith the Ephs turned in a mediocre performance and still managed to win. Coach Nancy Roberts employed a rare man-to-man against the Smithies early in the game, but was forced to switch to a 1-3-1 after the Ephs fell behind by twelve in the early going.

The Ephs managed to battle back to a 32-32 tie at the half, and the contest was still up for grabs with about a minute to go when senior co-captain Kim Hatch hit a shot to even the score. Smith surged ahead to take the lead in the final minute. Then, with only seconds remaining, Hedeman grabbed an offensive rebound, turned, and released the ball just before the buzzer sounded. The shot fell to give Hedeman the last of her game high 21 points and the Ephs escaped with an important win.

Skiers schuss to fourth at carnival

by James Lee

On what proved to be two days of well-organized and exciting festivity, the Williams ski carnival witnessed lots of fun and skiing. Responding to the cheers of the home crowd gathered at Brodie Mountain, the Eph teams skied well, displaying consistency and continuity in line with their previous carnival performances.

The men's team skied one of its finest carnivals of the season so far, standing at 4th place overall at the end of the two days. The Ephwomen also placed 4th, although their performances didn't quite match their expectations.

Friday was a fine day for the Ephmen as they captured 4th places in both the giant slalom and the individual cross country races. Freshman Jason Priest continued his outstanding performances, finishing 8th in the giant slalom. Teammates J.P. Parisien '90, Pat Gilmartin '90 and Charles Kaplan '89 all contributed to the 4th place finish by placing 9th, 16th, and 18th, respectively. Cross country team captain Mac Nash '88, in his second ski carnival of the season after a period of injury, and Peter Milliken '90 both skied very well, finishing 6th and 10 places. Graeme Davis '89 also contributed to the team's 4th place finish, placing 20th.

The Ephmen continued their fine races on Saturday, placing 4th in the cross country relay and tying for 4th with Middlebury in the slalom races. Priest again had another fine day, hitting the salt-laid wet slopes to an outstanding 6th place finish. Many skiers fell victim to the slopes or were disqualified, among them the Eph skiers Gilmartin, Bill Crowley '91, and Kaplan. Parisien persevered to place 16th.

"[On Saturday] the snow conditions were good, even though it rained the previous night. The Brodie people salted and laid out the hills well. In slalom however, you have a lot more chances to fall than in giant slalom because you have a lot more gates," Priest said.

The Ephwomen's team also had a fine Friday, tying for second place with Dartmouth in the individual cross country and capturing 4th in the giant slalom races. Captain Kathy Wolf '88 continued to display her leadership, finishing in second place. Kirsten Hansen '91 showed her courage by racing despite a rib injury, finishing at 11th. Helde Andersen '90 also placed, finishing 18th. Freshman Amy Sullivan had another fine day, placing 6th in the slalom. Mari Omland '89, Amy Belliveau '91 and Amy Duncombe '89 all placed, 15th, 18th and 19th, respectively.

The Ephwomen continued to ski well on Saturday, with the cross country relay team of Wolf, Andersen and Ann Bokman '91 capturing third place in the category. Wolf, who went last in the relay, again exhibited her leadership, bringing the team up from 5th to third place on the last leg. Omland did well in the slalom, finishing 7th. Monika Kopp '89 also placed, at 17th. Sullivan, Belliveau and Duncombe, however, all had trouble in some form or other, with Belliveau finishing at 30th, Sullivan at 39th and Duncombe not finishing the second run. The team stood at 5th place in the category.

"We are very pleased with the men. Unless they do well, they usually place at 6th. My first praise, however, goes to the Outing Club people who did a terrific job in organizing the races," commented Head Coach Bud Fisher on the carnival. The ski teams face the Middlebury carnival this weekend.

Morrison chills Mohawks as men's hockey wins 5-3

by Ted Hobart

As oranges flew over the ice into the pack of North Adams State Mohawk cheerleading squads, the referees struggled to break up a fight between Ron Van Belle '90 and Darrin Grava. The 5-3 Eph victory was particularly encouraging because it marked the first time all season that the squad was able to hang on in the end of a close game.

Similar to other games this season, the Ephs came back from an early deficit to tie the game and take the lead. A pretty North Adams goal just over a minute into the game had the Ephs on their heels, but the squad quickly regained its edge and Van Belle notched the tying goal ten minutes later.

Freshman defenseman Tim Hale, who many players called "the most improved player on the team," gave the Ephs a 2-1 lead going into the first intermission with a slapshot from the point.

The second stanza featured strong play by both teams inside their own zones and sharp passing in center ice. The period remained scoreless until just under two minutes remaining when the Mohawks knotted the game at two goals apiece. As the third period started, the question was again raised whether the team could hang on in the final phases of a close game.

The Ephs answered the question in convincing fashion as they came out inspired at the start of the period. Mike Swenson staked the squad to a 3-2 lead as he knocked in a rebound while being marauded in the Mohawk goalcrease. His hard work on that effort was indicative of the whole team's desire on the night.

"Nobody had to tell us. Everybody knew what we had to do to beat them," said junior assistant-captain Chris Conway.

Chris Pachus '88 scored on a three-on-one rush, off a feed from Conway, and the Ephs were clearly in control. The Mohawks were down, but definitely not out.

The evenly matched game was vital to North Adams, as a win would have earned them a playoff berth. They tested Mark Morrison '88 with several superior efforts in the third period,

Assefa accepts teaching job; first Bolin Fellow to take one

by Dan Skwire

Bolin Fellow Shanti Marie Assefa has accepted a full-time, tenure-track appointment to teach in the history department beginning next fall, the college announced early last week. Although two other Bolin Fellows were offered positions last year, Assefa is the first to accept the offer.

Currently in its second year, the Bolin Fellowship provides for a minority graduate student in the final stages of earning a Ph.D. to come to Williams for two semesters, concentrating primarily on finishing the dissertation, but also having the opportunity to teach a self-designed course in the spring semester. Because of the quality of the applicants, the college accepted two Fellows both this year and last year, the current

Letter attacks school on affirmative action

by Scott J. O'Callaghan

An anonymous group of about eight students were responsible for a letter distributed to the college community last Wednesday expressing discontent with administration affirmative action performance, according to Gail Henderson, an assistant to the Director of Admissions.

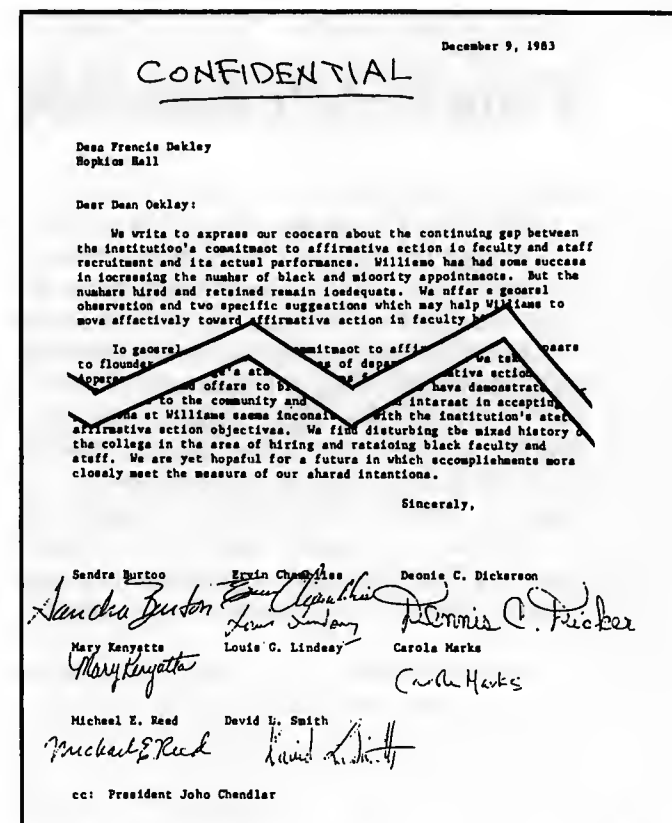

Attached to the letter were: a list of minority faculty currently at Williams; statistics on minority faculty; and a copy of a 1983 letter addressed to then Dean of the Faculty Francis Oakley from a group of black professors expressing concern over the college's commitment to affirmative action.

The cover letter to the Williams community charged that statistics on minority faculty at Williams given to the Williams Black Student Union (WBSU) by Assistant to the President for Affirmative Action Nancy McIntire were not accurate and were purposely doctored. According to the letter, the statistics listed native-born Europeans as Hispanic and also listed faculty that are not on campus this academic year.

The letter also said that keeping the name of Assistant Professor of Theatre Michael Knight on the list was insensitive and insulting. Knight died in December.

Two vie for presidency in Council elections this week

by Peter Balaban

Two Juniors, Ted Hobart '89 and Trace Blankenship '89, will try to gain the College Council presidency in elections to be held this week. Their vice-presidential running mates are Marisa Reddy '89 and John Kelsh '89.

Elections will be held this Thursday and Friday in Baxter Hall mailroom from 9 a.m. to 7 p.m.

Excerpts from interviews with the presidential/vice-presidential candidates appear on page four. The council's discussion of the number of candidates running is on page nine.

John Bellwoar '89 is the only student running for Secretary. Candidates for treasurer are Brad Gendell '90, Zia Huque '89 and MaryEllen Sullivan '89.

The winners begin their terms after Spring break, according to Council Vice-President Nicole Melcher '88.

Amendment

Students will also be voting on an amendment to the College Council Constitution that creates four Sophomore representative seats and that clarifies who votes for certain representatives. At least half of the student body must vote on the proposed changes. The amendment must pass by a two-thirds plurality.

Other positions that will be filled in the upcoming elections are student seats on the Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibility (ACSR), Honor and Discipline Committee and Honorary Degrees Committee.

The election will also fill two minority representative positions on the council, six at-large positions and five housing category representative positions.

Melcher said an all-campus mailing with statements from all the at-large candidates and minority representative candidates will be mailed to students before the election.

Run-off elections will be held next week, according to Melcher.

Also worried

Melcher said she was worried that not enough students would turn out for the election because the council only recently discovered that two candidates were running for President. "If it's not a tough election it's not likely that people will vote for candidates below the officer level," she said.

Concern that not enough students would vote prompted the council to hold the elections in Baxter Hall only, according to Melcher. "We figured we'd get a better turnout. We figured more people would come from off-campus," she said.

The council will hold a forum for the Presidential/Vice-Presidential candidates on Wednesday at 7:30 in Brooks-Rogers Recital Hall.

Laszlo G. Versenyi, 59

Professor of Philosophy Laszlo G. Versenyi died last Tuesday at his home in Williamstown after a brief illness. He was 59.

In various national publications Secretary of Education William Bennett '65 has referred to Versenyi as his ideal college teacher, saying that to him and his fellow students in Versenyi's freshman philosophy class "It seemed ... as if we had come face to face with a reincarnation of Socrates himself."

In 1983 Versenyi was named Mark Hopkins Professor of Philosophy, a chair named after the 19th century figure who is the college's most famous teacher.

Versenyi's colleagues and students spoke of his ability to cut through to central issues and his impatience with extravagance as his most memorable traits.

"One thing we're all going to miss is: he was always the one to ask THE question," Associate Professor of Philosophy Rosemarie Tong said. "His penetrating and honest intelligence cut through everything..."

Professor of Political Science Kurt Tauber, a long-time friend of Versenyi's, said his outstanding trait was his "enormous, incorruptible sense of proportions and moderation, which [made him] ... an inveterate foe of any kind of extravagant claim, or emotional claim or self-proclamation."

"A typical line at one of his lectures, particularly when people were interviewing for jobs, was 'what does this matter?'" Edward Stein '87 said. Stein, who is pursuing a doctoral degree in philosophy, said that as a teacher, Versenyi embodied the Socratic ideals of the midwife (helping others to give birth to their own views) and the gadfly (poking at people's beliefs and getting them to evaluate and question things.).

"Socratic Humanism" meant more to Laszlo than an appropriate title for his first book," College President Francis Oakley said. "It represented an ideal to which he was committed with passionate intensity and total consistency. In the course of a splendid career at Williams, he touched and deeply enriched the lives of countless colleagues and students. We will miss him sorely."

Laszlo Versenyi

Versenyi began teaching at Williams in 1958. He employed the Socratic method of questioning his students in freshman courses, which he continued to teach, and taught advanced courses in Greek thought and in the philosophy of Martin Heidegger. He served as chairman of the college's philosophy department and of the Ancient and Medieval Studies Program which he helped form and which evolved into the college's History of Ideas Program.

He wrote numerous scholarly articles and four books: Socratic Humanism (1963), Heidegger, Being and Truth (1965), Man's Measure: The Greek Image of Man from Homer to Sophocles (1973) and Holiness and Justice: An Interpretation of Plato's "Euthyphro" (1982).

He was born in Baja, Hungary, April 3, 1928. He attended schools in Hungary and studied at the University of Heidelberg in Germany before coming to the U.S. He received his B.A. in 1952 and Ph.D. in 1955, both from Yale, where he taught for three years before coming to Williams.

He is survived by his wife, Diana; his son, Adam of New Haven, Connecticut; his daughter, Andrea of New York City; his sister, Mrs. George Losznik of Scarsdale, New York; and his brother, Eugene of Monclair, New Jersey.

A memorial service will be held at Thompson Memorial Chapel on Sunday, March 6, at 2:00 P.M. In lieu of flowers, donations can be made to the Laszlo G. Versenyi Fund in care of the Office of the President.

The Williams Record

False Accusations

Two weeks ago David Kane '88 informed the college community through a Record Op-ed piece that affirmative action as practiced at Williams is denying the students here access to the most qualified faculty. An anonymous letter distributed to students last week rebuked Kane's assertions, stating "there is no affirmative action for Black, Puerto Rican, and Chicano faculty at Williams College."

Who's right? Does affirmative action exist at Williams, and what purpose does it serve? The College does engage in active recruitment of minority faculty, and although the percentage of minority faculty members on the payroll is low compared to national population percentages, Williams compares favorably with other small liberal arts colleges. While some departments might be more effective than others in their attempts to gain minority appointments, the college administration clearly has demonstrated its commitment to affirmative action.

The unsigned letter indirectly berated Nancy McIntire, assistant to the president for affirmative action, by describing a report sent to the WBSU on minority faculty statistics as "purposely doctored." This criticism is inaccurate. In listing some European-born professors as minorities, the report was following federal guidelines.

The absence of black, tenured professors on campus this year — a fact alluded to in the letter — is unfortunate, but it reflects not the college's inattentiveness towards affirmative action, but rather its commitment to it. Associate Professor of History Dennis Dickerson, who is currently on leave, was persuaded to return to Williams from Rhodes College on the condition that he be granted a year's leave.

Additionally, the college is trying to increase the supply of minorities with Ph.D.s through the Bolin Fellowships. Bolin Fellow Shanti Assefa's recent acceptance of a position in the history department attests to the effectiveness of the program.

Williams as an institution does pursue an affirmative action policy. Inadequacies in the faculty's composition are being remedied, albeit too slowly for current students.

To ensure the hiring of minority faculty in the short term, the Committee on Appointments and Promotions should become more involved and more responsible for appointment decisions made in individual departments. Departments with particularly poor records of hiring minority faculty should be helped and influenced in their recruiting process by the CAP and the administration.

To increase the number of minority undergraduates who enter graduate programs, Williams should systematically encourage further study within departments and provide financial assistance. Encouragement and advising of Williams students to continue their studies in anticipation of returning to undergraduate academics should be undertaken in a more efficient manner by the present faculty.

To attract minority graduate students, the college should expand the Bolin Fellowship program, particularly in the direction of Division III. Similar programs to attract minority doctoral candidates could be established.

Sex Guide is not a moral platform

To the Editor:

We would like to respond to the misrepresentation of the "Williams Guide to Health and Sex" put forth in the article by Robert Howle and Brian Carlson.

The first major problem in the article came in their discussion of abortion in which they stated that "abortions are described only in distant medical terminology." Given the information that the Guide provides, the facts are stated in such a way that makes it clear what the ramifications of abortion are. The purpose of this section of the Guide, as we see it, is to provide information about the options available to women who suspect pregnancy. It is not meant to be taken as advice for abortion nor as a counseling device. Instead, it recommends that one seeks out a counselor and suggests several possibilities of people to go to.

In their discussion of the condom/

American Express Card analogy, they say that "such a statement implies that faithfulness to a single partner is unlikely and rather odd," thus completely misconstruing the intent of the guide. Carrying a condom in no way implies loose sex or the lack of "deep love". Rather, it entails a sense of responsibility and care which may very well be with only one deeply loved partner. That the guide suggests possible ways to broach contraception to a "prospective partner" (p. 24) also does not imply viewing "other people as merely potential sex partners" as the article suggests. Rather, it assists a person in broaching the delicate subject of contraception to someone they are probably emotionally involved with, since this person is a prospective partner.

We would suggest that Brian and Robert reread and rethink the "Williams Guide to Health and Sex," taking into account the above mentioned facts. Perhaps they would then recognize the Guide as the valuable source of information that it is and not as a moral platform advocating insensitive sexual practices.

"Liberal sensibility" says affirmative action prevents discrimination

by Karl Galle '91

I was so happy to see David Kane's article about affirmative action that appeared in The Record. How fitting that a call to "argue intelligently" should be preceded by "WARNING: The opinions expressed in this article will probably be called racist. Most, if not all, of them are also true.... [S]ome students may want to preserve their liberal sensibilities by not reading further."

What more can I say? It exemplifies everything I love best about hard-line conservatives. They're charming, polite, fun to talk to, and (best of all) they know everything. I mean, really. Have you ever met one who didn't? Forget this Aristotelian nonsense about searching for truth. No, by God, they've already found it, and if we treat them with proper deference they'll even cast a few pearls of it before the rest of us brainless swine who need to have our "liberal sensibilities" protected from unpleasant truths. Hallelujah.

With that in my mind, let me make a few remarks concerning common misperceptions of affirmative action policy. First and foremost, it is irrelevant to try to frame an argument in terms of whether or not one should be obligated to hire minorities and women ahead of better-qualified white men. Affirmative action's raison d'être is simply to ensure that discrimination on account of race or sex does not occur. To quote a report by the Carnegie Council on Policy Studies in Higher Education, "Affirmative action does not mean entitlements to proportional representation. It means actions to eliminate discrimination: creation of more adequate pools of talent, active searches for talent wherever it exists, revision of policies and practices that permitted or abetted discrimination, development of expectations for a staff whose composition does not reflect the impacts of discrimination, provision of judicial processes to hear complaints, and the making of decisions without improper regard for sex, race, or ethnic origin."

For some historical background, affirmative action was born during the 1960's through a combination of executive orders and legislation, the most notable of which was Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, which created the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission and gave it the authority to look into complaints of discrimination. The upshot of all this is that now employers across the country are required to provide documentation to the effect that they are not discriminating against women or minorities. Nowhere are there laws that say employers must choose individuals with lesser qualifications in order to avoid hiring white men. Federal guidelines only stipulate that employers must be able to justify their decisions. In the event that a complaint is filed, "the Federal courts have established that a presumption of discrimination arises where the proportion of minorities employed by the defendant employer is less than reasonably could be expected on the basis of the availability of qualified [emphasis mine] minority group members, and the defendant must demonstrate that such underutilization is not the product of discrimination." (U.S. Commission on Civil Rights)

Affirmative action's raison d'être is simply to ensure that discrimination on account of race or sex does not occur.

For example, the percentage of minority college faculty members hired should be roughly equivalent to the percentage of minorities holding Ph.D.s and seeking college employment (although a member of a minority need not be chosen in any particular case). Before the enactment of affirmative action policies, major discrepancies existed between the percentages of female and minority candidates qualified for certain jobs and the percentages actually hired. Note once again, however, that federal guidelines apply only to instances in which overt discrimination against qualified individuals can be proved. The notion that there is some national mandate for throwing well-qualified white men out onto the street is pure myth.

The notion that there is some national mandate for throwing well-qualified white men out onto the street is pure myth.

Mr. Kane blithely dismisses any need for the College to actively recruit minorities and women in order to insure diversity among the faculty and broaden the educational experience of the students. This is very easy (and very common) for white men to do, but would he still feel that way if the college faculty were made up almost entirely of black women and the debate was over whether to try to increase the proportion of white men in the faculty ranks so that it better reflected the proportion of qualified white men available? I wouldn't. Not because I have any doubts concerning the teaching ability of black women, but because in such a situation I would have to wonder if I weren't missing out on something — a perspective, a point of view, a person with common experiences.

If, however, diversity is not necessary to the college experience, then let's just get rid of a few of these extra departments like art, history, and astronomy.

And, hell, who needs philosophy, anyway? We can all grow up to be Marines and investment bankers. While we're at it, let's axe the football team, too. Well — maybe we'd better not go that far (got to keep those alumni donations rolling in), but you get my drift. The college does numerous things to ensure that its students can expose themselves to as wide a variety of opportunities and perspectives as possible, and there is no reason why it should not continue to do so in its selection of faculty by actively recruiting female and minority professors.

Let me make one final comment regarding Mr. Kane's remark that affirmative action might be necessary "to make up for the effects of past discrimination." Past discrimination? Past??? Discrimination is not some relic of ancient history that has already been laid to rest. Maybe the fact that I've lived most of my life in the South brings its continuing existence closer to home, but has no one heard of Forsyth County? Howard Beach? The Citadel? These are but the most violent indications that racism and sexism remain deeply rooted in American society, and affirmative action will remain necessary so long as they persist. The task ahead for each of us is to strive to overcome these evils and so hasten the day when affirmative action guidelines are no longer needed and equal opportunity for all is freely given.

Peck brings surplus equipment to Nicaragua

by Todd Owens

Every year various athletic programs at Williams buy new equipment. That leaves the athletic department with a problem: What to do with old or extra equipment.

That problem was solved, at least last year, by sending the surplus athletic equipment to sports programs in Nicaragua. According to Director of Athletics Robert Peck, programs there received old bats, soccer balls, Williams sweats and some old uniforms.

The opportunity to donate the equipment arose last year, when a group of dance students from Williams organized an exchange with a dance school in Bluefields on the Atlantic coast of Nicaragua, Peck said. The trip, which took place from May 25 to July 3, 1987, was led by Sandra Burton, a dance instructor at Williams. "I went along as the [athletics] department chairman," Peck said.

Peck also went along because his personal experiences in Nicaragua made him a valuable asset to the group, he said. In addition to numerous professional visits, Peck spent time in Costa Rica and Nicaragua while he was on leave in 1980-81. He said he has personal ties with coaches in Managua, one of whom was a coaching intern at Williams several years ago.

Peck said that he thought the trip was a great opportunity to donate athletic equipment to some of the programs in Nicaragua. Accordingly, he sent a letter last spring to 14 or 15 schools in the United States soliciting surplus equipment which he could take with him to Nicaragua, he said. Eight schools, including Amherst College, Colby College, and Vassar College, responded by sending surplus equipment. "Especially Vassar. We really got some terrific stuff from Vassar," Peck said.

Robert Peck

Once in Nicaragua, Peck said he distributed the much needed equipment to several places. Some of it was given directly to coaches in Managua, where the group stayed for the first three days. The Nicaraguan Olympic Committee received some of the equipment. The rest was distributed to sports officials in Bluefields and eventually found its way to high school-age club teams and some schools, Peck said.

Provost of the College Neil Grabols said that the college has a history of donating not only surplus athletic equipment, but also surplus academic supplies. He said that Peck's decision to go with the dance exchange to Nicaragua was a personal one. Peck was not acting on behalf of the college and used his title only for identification purposes, Grabols said.

"If we can do people-to-people sport programs...I think that's good," Peck said. He added that he believes strongly in helping athletics programs in foreign countries.

Peck also said that the donation of surplus gear to Nicaragua is in keeping with college tradition. In the past, Williams has donated athletic gear to Mt. Greylock Regional High School, the Williamstown Youth Center, the Williamstown Community Day Care Center and Waipole State Prison. In the last instance, a psychiatrist at the prison asked if Williams would help out the inmates. "I thought it was a very good effort. He felt that the prisoners needed this kind of outlet," Peck said.

CCRR recommends changing school grievance procedures

by Michael Reisman

The Commission on Campus Race Relations is currently circulating a draft to members of the college administration that recommends major reform in the college grievance procedure. The draft calls for the formation of a standing committee and the shortening of the time period involved in filing a grievance.

The decision to recommend changes in the procedure came after commission hearings on whether or not the existing procedures were adequate. College President Francis Oakley charged the commission with this responsibility when he formed it last May. "There is a concern that the process is cumbersome, slow and something that is unfair to the student," said commission chairperson Timothy Cook, an assistant political science professor.

Cook said that the present grievance procedure has never actually been used, although cases existed which were not pursued. "The fact that the procedure was not being used was not due to the absence of problems," he said.

The commission's recommendations will be examined by members of the administration and faculty, then revised and brought to a faculty vote in April, and possibly implemented before next semester, Cook said.

Time is a problem

The current grievance procedure, as stated in the college handbook, calls for the formation of an ad-hoc grievance committee after a 2-month period in which a student submits both an oral and then a written grievance to the dean. Any student who believes he or she has been treated by a faculty or staff member in a way that violates the college's non-discrimination policies can make a complaint.

Commission member Rodney Cunningham '88 said that the amount of time before a decision is reached gives the impression of a long and arduous process.

Cunningham added that he was optimistic about the administration's response to the proposal. "Dean Fix seemed energetic about [making changes]," he said. Fix has not yet received the written draft and declined to comment on the specifics of the proposal.

College Council President Carter Zinn '88, also a member of the commission, said that speeding up the process would reduce the Council candidates express views on issues

Assistant News Editor Scott J. O'Callaghan interviewed the two teams running for President and Vice-President of College Council. Excerpts follow.

Affirmative Action and Race Relations

Trace Blankenship: "I think one of the excellent things this council has done has been to try to facilitate the deep questioning in students' hearts about what they're feeling, about attitudes that are not respectful of difference...To me, that's at the heart of what we can do. We can lobby for more and more actions that reflect treating the tangible effects of racism. I'd like to see more panels."

John Kelsh: "We have problems with [numbers of] minority professors, but [we can help this by] rotating professors from the Twelve College Exchange."

Ted Hobart: "I definitely feel strongly that the Black Student Union has raised significant issues on recruiting minority faculty...It's a slow process, but that's no excuse to let inaction go."

Marisa Reddy: "There is no council representative to the Campus Commission on Race Relations. The president sits ex-officio. We need a regular representative to voice concerns, not only from minority students but from the entire student body."

Curriculum reform

Hobart: "I think one thing the departments [in Division III] have done is respond to initial concerns...The nature of Division III courses limits the scope of non-major courses...But there should be offerings for non-majors in all departments."

Kelsh: "If we're going to start asking people to take more courses, what we're talking about specifically is Division III. In most cases, we've got to increase the quality of courses offered there. If you have to find three courses and you're not a pre-medical student, it's awful hard...I'm also in favor of increasing support for interdisciplinary studies, such as the new Literary Studies major, any steps that can advance that field."

Campus security

Blankenship: "There are many individual projects that we have to work out with security. One that I've been working on right now is to keep the Meditation Room in the chapel open from 9 a.m. to 11 p.m. without being locked. In that it is currently locked at very inconsistent times in the day...We provide plenty of space for the brain and I think the one place we provide for the soul is extremely important."

Hobart: "One of the things I've been concerned with is the fact that there hasn't been communication between the housing office and house presidents...They [security] can't be everywhere at once and student security can be only so effective. But at parties, you can have house members more aware of what's going on."

Town-gown issues

Hobart: "I'm really in favor of students registering to vote here in Williamstown. Not many students have a vested interest in politics at home, but there are issues that affect students here in Williamstown."

Blankenship: "...We would go before the Board of Selectman and tell them who we are, representing the student body of the college, and we're ready to address any questions [they] have and letting them know the feelings of such a huge part of the population of this town...Hopefully they would take us on our word and address that...One of the projects this year would be organizing the labor that would go [to help at] the town elementary school, the Kidsworld project."

Housing selection process

Kelsh: "We definitely have to work on the transfer system. There's a point system set up, but apparently it's disregarded...We need to clear this up and make it nonarbitrary."

Hobart: "One idea that we had for the affiliation transfer system would be to take into account students' first choice from freshman year...Students should have an advantage if they apply to their first choice group."

Parking Committee Proposal

Blankenship: "I understand completely the need for a parking space for those who do not live on campus, but at the same time, you can't go overboard in limiting the number of student spaces."

Kelsh: "One idea I liked in the report was the taxi to and from the airport. I'm not particularly fond of the taxi around campus because we have the escort service...but the regularly-scheduled stops, I don't know about that."

Reddy: "I think right now what needs to be done is for their proposals to be distributed to the students...Students should be more aware of the decision-making process."

Why should people vote for you?

Kelsh: "We've been with the council now for a year. We know how to get things done. We have some good ideas, some new ideas, and the energy to put them through."

Blankenship: "I hope that experience here would be an issue...I hope that enthusiasm is apparent and is an overwhelming reason why we'd like to run."

Reddy: "We would bring a huge range of views and activities and concerns...I think that we're also not afraid to make mistakes."

Hobart: "We each came in with a list on our cuffs which have been combined...No two issues were the same."

Students find year off beneficial

by Stephanie Jones

Students who feel they are not getting the most out of their time at Williams have an alternative. Many students who have taken a leave of absence found that time off can lead to a great job and a renewed sense of purpose and confidence.

Approximately 86 percent of Williams students who enter as freshmen graduate within four years, according to the Registrar's office. Ninety-two percent of Williams students graduate in five years and 96 percent eventually graduate. The Registrar's office would not release statistics on minority student withdrawal rates.

According to Dean of the College Stephen Fix, "Sometimes students think the college is against students taking a leave of absence, and that's not the case." Fix said that reasons students give for taking time off are interesting: non-academic opportunities, uncertainty about the direction of their academic interests, or a need for a break from the intensity of the academic work. Some students are also asked to take time off because of academic reasons.

Fix said that he believed there has been a slight increase in the number of students taking leaves of absence. "Students seem more receptive to the idea than they were even five years ago," he said.

I would recommend a year off to almost anyone, especially someone having some questions about Williams.

He said that all of the reports he has heard from returning students have been positive. These students seem to have more direction and enjoy college more than they did before. Ann Carson '89, who took time off after her sophomore year, said she learned to prioritize her work better and does not worry about grades as much. "Classes that don't interest me I don't take... College is a one-shot deal," she said.

John McDermott '88 also took a year off after his sophomore year. "I would recommend a year off to almost anyone, especially someone having some questions about Williams," he said.

Elizabeth Bancroft '89 took a year off after her sophomore year and is currently working on a pamphlet for students thinking about doing the same. "When I decided to take time off, I realized I didn't even know which dean to go to," she said.

About her experience, Bancroft said, "I felt like it added so much more to my classes." She said she stopped taking the opportunities to learn at Williams for granted. Bancroft added she had originally planned to take only a semester off but is now grateful that Fix talked her into taking off an entire year.

"A semester would have been like an extended summer vacation," she said. Fix said that the college policy is to allow students to take leaves of absence in intervals of one year for up to three years.

Bancroft mentioned the availability of internships in the fall as another benefit of her year off. She held a internship in Congress and with the National Women's Health Network and traveled to Africa and England. McDermott also said that the year off allowed him to hold some exciting jobs, with a weekly newspaper and a wire service in Chicago, and gave him confidence about his ability to earn money in the future.

McDermott said he had been uncertain about college. "I guess I took the time off because I had some real questions about whether or not I liked Williams and what my reasons for being here were."

Director of Psychological Counseling Service John Howland said that students often take time off because of troubles at home or because they did not feel that they were ready for college. "For some people, their own pattern of how they grow and how they change doesn't happen to fit," he said. Howland also said that sometimes college shakes students' goals and ideas about the world

On stage, off stage: Cap and Bells members run the show

by Mariam Naficy

What campus organization gives students the opportunity to plead for lumber at lumberyards, learn to shop at K-mart, borrow furniture from Dodd, and beg for trays from Food Service?

According to member Doug Hunt '89, putting together theatrical productions with a fixed budget requires members of Cap and Bells, Inc., Williams' student-run theatre organization, to face not only these challenges, but also those of scheduling, casting, directing, choreographing, and designing and making sets, lighting, and costumes for their productions.

their creativity and an opportunity to immerse themselves in and learn the workings of the theatre.

Artistic Director Mike Baratta '89 said that Cap and Bells provides students with an alternative to Williams Theatre Department productions, because a student can actually choose a work and the way to perform it. Proposals for productions are made about a year in advance. The person who makes the proposal often takes charge of directing, casting, and choosing a technical staff for the production. The Cap and Bells members then pick the technically possible proposals

No one has the final word but the students, and that's a good experience... There's no higher authority to turn to.

Although this is a hefty load of work, Cap and Bells members insist that the experience they get from it is invaluable. Megan Ouchterloney '90, co-director of the upcoming Cap and Bells musical "Company," commented that since the shows are completely student-run, "you get more of an overall picture; you're not isolated in any specific aspect of the production...It's great that even though I'm not a theatre major I've had the opportunity to do something on this level."

The principle behind Cap and Bells, founded and incorporated in 1912, is this: with relatively little theatrical experience and/or no intent to make a career out of the theatre, students can still find an outlet for and schedule them. Students said they find several differences between participating in a Cap and Bells production and a Theatre Department production. Baratta, who has acted in both, noted that more responsibility falls on the actor in a Cap and Bells production, because the director is not as experienced as a Theatre Department director. Hunt cited the closer relationship between director, often a peer, and cast in a Cap and Bells production.

Light and fluffy Baratta also said he feels that the Theatre Department tends to do more "classic" material, while Cap and Bells performs more of what he calls "com-

Williams Jazz Ensemble improves with age

by Matt Reed

The Williams College Jazz Ensemble turned in a tight, spirited performance at a Mid-Winter Meltdown Concert on Saturday night at Chapin Hall. The ensemble sported a new staging arrangement, putting the rhythm section in the foreground, with the brass moved back. The new setup allowed for a much better sound mix than was evident at their November concert, particularly in the slower pieces. The band also shifted emphasis, from an

'everyone solos' approach in November, to a consistent focus on a few players, again resulting in a much improved sound.

The soloists, particularly Mike Coyne '89 on tenor saxophone and Paul Passaro '89 on trumpet, were better able to express their complex musical personas, while the ensemble as a whole was noticeably tighter and cleaner.

The concert started with an energetic rendition of "Dizzy Atmosphere," by Dizzy Gillespie, featuring Eric Hanson '88 on trumpet. The next two pieces, "Time Stream," and "Tangerine," both featured Coyne and Passaro, with Passaro revealing an uncommon lyricism in his playing.

"Northridge," a slower concept piece, featured piano by Adam Schlesinger '89 and a skillful bass intro by Rob Pucelli '88. Don Menza's "Groovin' Hard" featured a much-improved horn section, with a show-stealing, bluesy sax solo by Mike Coyne.

The show took a slower turn with "Li'l Darlin'," featuring a gorgeous trumpet solo by freshman John Calkins. "Big Dipper" and "Killer Joe," the last two pieces on the program both featured Passaro solos, with Schlesinger adding a tasteful contribution to the first, and Ben Miller '88 with a particularly daring alto sax solo in the second. The ensemble as a whole played tighter during "Killer Joe" than they had all year.

The show ended with two planned encores, the first featuring Sean Timmons '89 and Caleb Gordon '91 on trombone, and the second with Schlesinger again taking advantage of the new staging to turn in a strong keyboard performance.

The Williams Jazz Ensemble demonstrated a greatly improved sound, especially noticeable in the rhythm section. The new format allowed the audience a chance to sense the band's tight and fast musical personality.

Musical Wind and Thunder shake the Clark

by Eric Hanson

The influences that have shaped jazz music and continue to mold it belong to a multitude of cultures. Wind and Thunder, a septet led by flutist and reed-

The second in the "Cabin Fever Jazz" series sponsored by the Northern Berkshire Council of the Arts, the concert featured instrumentation and musical styles that expanded the generally recognized boundaries of jazz, creating a unique hybrid.

The show began with a free jazz piece called "No one knows the paths of the garden better than the gardener," one of the many proverbs of the Nigerian Yoruba people on which the performance was based.

The tune began with the repetition of a simple five-to-six-note theme that developed into a collective improvisation, reaching an almost frenzied peak before tapering off back into the original theme. Sax man Julius Hemphill seemed especially comfortable in this piece, blurring out notes and screaming into the altissimo range of his alto saxophone. In the style that made him famous for his work with the World Saxophone Quartet.

Throughout the evening, Hemphill's musical explorations were effectively complemented by the tuba and baritone horn playing of Joe Daley, whose solos and background playing showed impressive agility and contributed a fullness to the flavor of the group's overall sound.

The band's second selection was a basic blues composition, named after another Yoruba proverb: "A man sees a snake, a woman kills it; no matter as long as it is dead." Gerald Visteley's driving electric bass anchored the song's traditional blues background, while Cole played a short woodwind instrument resembling an oboe with an attached tin bell that produced a bagpipe-like sound.

College Council Candidates — 1988

President/Vice-President

Blankenship/Kelsh

Hobart/Reddy

Realistically, we can only increase the student body's expectations of the College Council by vigorously and wholeheartedly serving the student body in two ways: by addressing concerns brought to us, and by continually seeking areas where we can initiate action.

In this spirit we'll press to increase respect for difference at Williams, especially in race. We would facilitate dealing with campus perceptions of race, racism, and difference. Another forum/discussion like this past Fall's is essential.

In a community of such uncommon people with an access to each other not found after college, we have amazing opportunities to learn from each other's different experiences and outlooks. If we believe in the need for diversity, we've got to act on that by respecting it and earnestly taking advantage of the opportunities it affords us.

Three ideas:

1. In our exchange program with two black universities, Fisk and Howard, we could exchange senior professors. We can also re-invigorate interaction between our schools. Examples: The world-famous undergraduate Fisk Jubilee Singers could perform here. As well, Fisk has African and Afro-American art collections which they might loan to our Museum.

2. We'll press for stronger departmental commitments to hiring minorities and women to increase the tenure eligibility pool.

3. Graduate school advising should be better, esp. for minority and women students. This year's attempt in the Dean's Office was ineffectual, so we should address this from a student perspective.

Other things:

1. The Bookstore should be College-owned. Spring Street prices are too high, so it should also sell basic school supplies/tolietries. Ideally it wouldn't compete with Spring St. merchants by selling only to students.

2. Williams needs a Lecture Fund, sponsoring lectures by famous, issue-oriented speakers, with house talks following. The Council should sponsor one such talk a year, lecture fund or not.

Further concerns:

1. Housing: Affiliation transfer problems; students not knowing housing arrangements until fall; need for more co-ops.

2. Athletics: PE credit for intramurals, indep. exercise; facility use; fairness in women's sports.

3. College Parking Proposal: Students' realistic parking needs can't be neglected, esp. Berkshire Quad.

This list is incomplete, so please hear the speeches. We're ready to put forth our strongest, most sincere effort if you elect us.

We would like to implement several new ideas and directions for the upcoming council, as well as follow up on some of the hard work of this year's council on several key issues.

We would like to see an expanded role of the department liaison committees in the development and improvement of Division III introductory courses and in the hiring of minority and women faculty—not only in making decisions about applicants already considered by the departments, but also in actively seeking out qualified candidates from graduate schools. In addition, although the results of the Division III survey did not come in time to change next year's offerings, they can be used to suggest changes for the following year. Many positive changes have already been made in the non-major introductory courses in response to student concerns.

The council should work more directly with the CCCR to voice student concerns and wants (in terms of speakers, events), perhaps through a permanent council representative to the CCCR which would more effectively voice student concerns.

One of our biggest new concerns is the state of the bookstore. In light of the recent attention to the apparent inadequacy of the current setup, it seems reasonable that the council should investigate ways to improve it. Examining how other schools service student and faculty needs, the council could work to make our bookstore more effective.

Freshman advising is another problem. Upperclass majors could help freshman advisors during freshman days and second semester registration, especially giving valuable advice about courses in other departments, which a faculty advisor may not be able to give.

Among other major concerns are: lack of student involvement in town politics, revision of the housing-affiliation transfer system, freshman entry affiliation with upper-class houses to encourage social interaction between classes, and improving security in residence halls.

Some of the most effective action of this year's council has been in direct response to student suggestions and concerns, and while we believe that we have raised viable issues, we feel that we must be responsive to ideas from the student body. To this end we believe that the council should have set call-in and walk-in hours, outside of weekly meetings, where students can talk informally about thoughts and problems which the council might be able to solve.

Treasurer - Gendell

I want to dispel the notion that the College Council Treasurer is a static, strictly administrative office. I have specific ideas for directions in which the position of Treasurer can grow.

Financial Reports: At present there is no system of financial reports to the Council. It is a little like having a checking account without knowing the balance.

I propose a monthly report to the Council on the status of the Council's finances and a quarterly report on all Council-funded groups.

Group Coordination: As the only Council officer to have regular contact with every Council-funded group, the Treasurer is uniquely qualified to find common ground for cooperation among groups.

I propose, for example, that the council should use the money spent on typesetting publications (up to $500 per issue) to purchase the hardware and software necessary for desktop publishing. It will save thousands of dollars, and publications will be rewarded with increased control over their appearance and decreased production time.

Funding Guidelines: The newly established guidelines for College Council funding are good, but they are not instructive enough to treasurers of groups asking for money or to the Finance Committee.

I propose the Council pass guidelines for categories of groups (e.g. publications, club sports) that make clear to groups' treasurers how to state goals and to Finance Committee members how to evaluate groups based on those goals. These guidelines will make the process less capricious.

My past experiences in student government helped me conceive these new ideas; that same experience will help me implement them.

Treasurer - Sullivan

This year's committee has enacted a series of reforms aimed at making its funding more clearly reflect the interests of the most students on campus. My main objective as treasurer would be to use these reforms to achieve a distribution that is mutually beneficial to all students. I would support the continued funding of most organizations presently recognized by the Committee, as well as encouraging the growth of new organizations so as not to stifle the initiative and creativity of, you, the student.

The funding of the College Council enables students to engage in their varied interests; it promotes unity while maintaining a healthy degree of diversity. If I am elected Treasurer I can assure you that I will serve with integrity, and be committed to representing your interests as they are made known to me, both as a College Council officer and as director of the Finance Committee. Please vote on March 3rd and 4th. Thank you.

Treasurer - Hugue

Hi, my name is Tahsinul Huque, otherwise known as Zia, and I am running ... In fact, running very hard for Treasurer!

The Treasurer of the College Council, as you undoubtedly know, chairs the Finance Committee and is ultimately responsible for allocating close to $200,000 to various organizations on campus. Given the responsibility, it is imperative for the Treasurer and the Finance Committee to be acutely aware of the needs of these organizations. And I am acute!

My experience with the Finance Committee dictates to me that it is skill in mediation, perception and perseverance that I will find most useful in managing my responsibilities as Treasurer. As Treasurer, I would extend precisely these skills to strengthen the interaction of the Finance Committee members with their respective organizations on campus. As much as I admire the current committee and the outgoing Treasurer for their efforts, I believe a stronger, more personal and informed dialogue is possible between organizations on campus and members of the Finance Committee. Such a dialogue would enable the members to not only decipher the validity of the organizations' funding requests but also to judge the need, enthusiasm and initiative behind these requests.

So ... vote ... particularly for me! Cheers!

ACSR Candidates

Leiter

This position is of special significance and requires a sophisticated understanding of current political and social issues. As the President of the College Democrats and an active member of both the student body and the political scene, I believe that I have the facilities to be part of the ACSR.

Issues which are part of ACSR's agenda have always been marked by controversy. Divestment and its ramifications has been one of the most emotional issues of our time. After spending three weeks in South Africa, I feel that I am slightly more aware of the intricacies of the situation. It is clear that the morally repugnant apartheid regime should not, and cannot continue; however, the question remains, what is the best way to affect a solution? Williams' position of divestment advocacy seems intelligent. Divestment itself is only part of the solution, and a questionable part at that. American companies have played a constructive role in the past, and as a nation entrenched on all sides, Pretoria has learned to fend pretty well for itself. Thus, a situation where there is limited American presence to better conditions and work for a solution is necessary. The fact is that few companies still retain a significant presence within South Africa, but the companies with which Williams does business can be pushed to ensure that their continued presence is not just for profit, but to assist the non-White population.

SDI is another problematic issue. Personally I am against deployment, but believe laboratory research is probably worth trying, at least temporarily. Williams should not boycott a company because it has legal contracts with the American government. If we are against Star Wars, then the government should be told, not the company. ACSR deals with many other topics-luckily, some are far less controversial and more clear-cut. I believe I am qualified to serve as a student representative on this committee, and I hope you will vote for me, Kenneth Leiter.

Owens

EXPERIENCE AND COMMITMENT. Important characteristics for an important position. I'm TODD OWENS, and since the beginning of the school year, I've covered every meeting of the ACSR for the Record. I know how the committee works. I understand its policies and the ramifications of those policies.

Perhaps the most important policy which the ACSR discusses is the college's policy of divestment advocacy. Last year, this was an important issue on campus.

This year, students don't seem to realize that the fight in South Africa is continuing. Part of the reason may be that students feel that our policy of divestment is not working as well as expected — and they would be right. The college needs to do as much as it can to put pressure on the government of South Africa. The policy of divestment advocacy needs to be evaluated and perhaps modified because of the changing political situation in South Africa.

Other positions: Should the college own stock in companies which produce weapons systems, including "Star Wars"? Yes, because national defense is an issue which should be debated by our elected government, not by the business establishment. Should animal testing continue? Except in cases of unnecessary cruelty, such testing is vital for developing medical cures for pressing diseases and disabilities.

As a member of the ACSR, I would work to make sure that the college pursues a policy which effectively pressures the government of South Africa. I would also conscientiously vote on issues like animal testing and defense production.

Putnam

I am running for the ACSR as a candidate who would think through each and every case presented before the committee with moderation, reason, and firm judgement. There are some ACSR issues that are important enough to discuss at this point. I do not believe that we should divest from firms that engage in "Star Wars" research. Attention on this important issue should be focused on Congress, which is the proper body for deliberation on this question and where the debate will have more meaning. I am a firm supporter of a pristine natural environment. Not only is pollution and the destruction of our ecosystem wrong, but can prove to be bad business. Finally, I do not support the dis-investment from firms that do business in South Africa. First, our disinvestment from these firms would do little to stop their conduct of business in South Africa. Second, if disinvestment hurts anybody, it will be those people at the bottom of the socioeconomic scale. Instead of the white regime. Those business-es and markets left behind by American firms would be taken by the whites that already have economic power, and strengthen them. South Africa will become even more insulated from the rest of the world and probably more repressive. Trade is an instrument for peace, and not empty gesturing. I am strongly qualified for the job. I have focused my studies on the environment, economics, the stock market, and moral philosophy. Please vote, and thank you for your time.

Proposed Amendment

In an effort to increase Sophomore representation on the Council, the Council has voted to consider an amendment to its Constitution which will appear on this week's ballot. The amendment will create four Sophomore seats (to be elected by the student body in the all-campus election) by reducing the number of At-Large seats from six to four, and the number of Freshman seats from five to three.

This amendment will also clarify which students vote for each seat. These changes will merely codify what has always been done according to precedent. Section III.A of the Constitution appears below, with the present language in regular typeface and the changes underscored in boldface italics. (Please ask your Council representative for more information.)

The Council voted 30-0 to place the amendment on the upcoming ballot. In order for the amendment to pass, at least half the number of students presently in residence must vote (998 students), and two-thirds of those must support the amendment.

Without an overwhelming turn-out in this week's election, we will have to wait another year to insure greater Sophomore representation on the Council. So vote! PROPOSAL TO AMEND THE CONSTITUTION The amended Constitution would read as follows: III. MEMBERS

Section A. Voting members shall be:

1. One representative from each residential house, elected by residents of that residential house.
2. One representative elected from each residential housing category, namely, Greylock, Mission Park, the Row Houses, the Berkshire Quad, and Dodd-Tyler, by the residents of each housing category.
3. Three (changed from five) representatives elected [at large] from the Freshman Class, by the Freshman Class in October. (words "at large" stricken)
4. One representative elected from the Freshman Council.
5. Four (changed from six) representatives elected at-large.
6. The Vice-President, Secretary, and Treasurer of the Council, none of whom shall hold any other seat on the Council.
7. One student living off-campus, elected in October by the students living off-campus.
8. Two minority students, elected by minority students.
9. Four representatives from the Sophomore Class elected at-large.

Bellwoar - Secretary

The primary function of a College Council secretary is to maintain good communication between the CC and the student body. Steps have been taken this past year to improve this communication. I intend to continue with these ideas and go further in reducing the gap between what CC does and what the student body knows.

The office of secretary has expanded beyond this primary role, however. The secretary now takes an active role as a third officer and administrator. If elected, I look forward to serving in this increased role and representing the student body on the CC. I believe I have the experience necessary for this job; I have served as president and treasurer of Mills house, I am a member of the CUL, and I have been the Community Affairs Director and now the Production Director of WCFM. Since I am unopposed, I firmly believe that I am the best candidate running. Please take time to vote-hopefully for me (and not for "anybody but that guy"). I promise to serve well and spell correctly on all CC documents.

Newsbriefs

CC examines paucity of candidates

Last Thursday, College Council considered two proposals concerning the lack of candidates in the upcoming college council elections. At the time of the meeting, there was only one ticket for president/vice president and one candidate for secretary. "We really don't want to see these seats go uncontested for," President Carter Zinn '88 said.

The first proposal, which was defeated, would have extended the declaration deadline for all officer positions until Saturday, Feb. 27 at 3:00. Although 14 voted in favor and 13 against, the proposal did not have the required two-thirds majority.

The second proposal, which passed unanimously, allowed Ted Hobart '89 until Saturday, Feb. 27, to find a running mate. Hobart had met the original Feb. 20 deadline, but his running mate later withdrew from the race. Hobart has since been joined by Marisa Reddy '89.

In addition to Hobart, Zinn had been approached after the deadline by Julia Beasley '89, who was interested in running for the position of secretary. She was not allowed to enter the race.

During debate on the two proposals, Amy Scott '90 said she was concerned about making exceptions. "I don't think it's really fair to the rest of the college... We really have to consider the candidates' rights." Josh Becker '91 said, "If people want to run, then it's their job to be prepared and to get their ticket ready."

Secretary Trace Blackenship '89, a candidate this year for president, said, "It's really important to have a race."

Matthew Levin '90 said that the vote should not hinge on whether or not there was enough publicity announcing the upcoming race and nomination deadline. Jim Munson '88 added, "I think this year there wasn't enough notice given."

Due to the lack of candidates, self-nominations for housing-category representatives from Greylock and Mission were accepted until Saturday, Feb. 20. There are six at-large seats available.

The council also discussed the recommendations of the Ad Hoc Committee on College Parking Facilities and Policy. Zinn said he intends to write a letter to College Vice President William Reed detailing the council's reaction to the proposals.

In reference to the building of a parking lot off of Park Street on the field below Thompson Infirmary, Levin said, "It seems to be the general opinion of Tyler that it would not be detrimental to the environmental aesthetics."

Munson said that there was a lack of parking spaces for students living in the Berkshire Quad. Later he said, "The [proposed] fines, in my opinion, are extravagant." According to the proposal, each student will be fined $10 for the first five to seven violations and then fined $20 for each additional violation.

Council members also commented that the Mission Park lot was underused. They cited the distance of the lot from campus as being a factor. Suggestions were made to pave the lot or increase lighting.

Duster decries urban education

Employment opportunities in America are now in a race-prioritized, technological age, leaving blacks in the lower class where they have slim chances of advancement, according to Troy Duster, director of the Institute for the Study of Social Change. In his lecture Wednesday night, "Reverberations of Urban Education: When Do We Pay?," Duster discussed the problem of jobs being race-specific in contemporary society.

The national move back to basics is not enough, Duster said. America is undergoing a second transformation, leaving many behind. The inadequate attempt being made to socialize black urban youths is, according to Duster, a major factor in the problem facing America.

Twenty percent of black youths are functionally illiterate, Duster said. He blamed this on the deterioration of the public schools in the cities as whites send their children to private schools in alarming numbers. In most major cities, he said, one in every three whites attends a private school, while 98 percent of blacks attend public school.

Duster said that education is becoming more of a criterion for mobility. Early in the century, a person could work his way from the bottom to the top of a company. Today, according to Duster, this is not likely to happen. "To get into upper management, you need a diploma from a college or a graduate school. It is no longer realistic to think you are going to work your way up from stock room to executive suite," he said. As a solution to this problem, Duster suggested that alternate steps be added into corporate structures that would facilitate the rise of people without a college degree.

Troy Duster's lecture marks the first in a series of lectures honoring Allison Davis '24, a black graduate of Williams. Duster said he was honored to be asked to deliver the address since Davis was a personal hero of his. Every year, the lectures will focus on an aspect of race, class or education, which were areas of concern for Davis.

Pine Cobble meeting date set

A March 15 Town-Gown meeting to be held at the Williams Inn will help determine the fate of the college's proposal to develop a 212-acre plot on Pine Cobble into lots for faculty houses. At the meeting, abutters to the development and other town residents will express concerns they have over the project.

If the Town Planning Board approves the development, building should start two years from June, according to College Vice President for Administration William Reed. A Planning Board hearing on the subject is scheduled for Feb. 8, but the board will probably wait until after the Town-Gown meeting before taking any action, according to Town-Gown Committee chairperson J. O'Brien Locke.

At the Town-Gown meeting, the college will answer questions the Planning Board or any other citizens have. Residents have objected to the effects of the development, which were brought out in an environmental impact statement and subdivision plan submitted on February 17. The report states that the development would cause about 720 additional car trips per day on Pine Cobble Road, add 31,680 gallons of sewage per day to the town, and use 39,600 additional gallons of water per day.

Schlesinger said that although the changes would be gradual, as all the lots are not expected to be built on for 10 to 20 years, there would still be an impact. The project would also necessitate re-routing the Pine Cobble Trail and altering 5,250 square feet of wetlands. A water tower, which some fear would be visible, would be at the highest point of the development.

Schlesinger said that another problem was that the plans revealed that the college had added two lots to the 70 which the planning board had approved. "The planning board set some guidelines and now the college has chosen to change those," he said.

According to Director of the Physical Plant Winthrop Wassenaar, the additional lots were added because more land was available than they had previously believed. He said that although the college had made some concessions at an earlier Planning Board meeting, like agreeing not to build above 1150 feet, it was only a preliminary meeting and the concessions were non-binding.

Reed said that the actual site is not on wetlands, but one of the water run-off pipes would cross wetlands. This meant that the college had to file a long form of the environmental impact statement for state approval. Reed said that it was only procedural and should not present any problems.

He said he did not expect much opposition from the town, except from abutters to the development. Reed has said that the high price and scarcity of land in Williams-town makes it difficult for tenured faculty to buy homes here, and that the Pine Cobble development would ease the problem.

CUL wants a student activities coordinator

The Committee on Undergraduate Life (CUL) considered a proposal to hire an activities coordinator for Williams at their meeting on Tuesday, February 23.

Associate Professor of English Lisa Wright, who serves on the committee, said that the proposed coordinator position would be much like the one suggested in a report on the ideas and activities of the Gaudino Committee and the Gaudino Scholar from 1984 to 1987. An excerpted version of that report was distributed to the student body earlier this year by College Council.

Wright said she will be submitting for discussion a list of suggestions concerning the coordinator position at the next CUL meeting. She said that she envisions a position with two distinct responsibilities: keeping faculty members informed about events sponsored by departments other than their own and increasing student awareness of campus events. She said if professors know about events outside of their departments far enough in advance, they might be able to incorporate them into course syllabuses.

Jon Gray '90, a student member of the committee, suggested at the CUL meeting that the coordinator should also publicize community events and possibly provide transportation to them when they are out of walking distance.

Professor of Mathematics Olga Beaver, who chairs the committee, said the position would serve to coordinate various campus events and warn of potential conflicts.

The salary for the position could run from $14,000 to $18,000, Associate Dean of the College Mary Kenyatta estimated at the meeting. College Council secretary Trace Blankenship '89, who sits on the committee, said that the council may be able to provide some of that money. Beaver said the rest of the funding could come from the President's Discretionary Fund, money from the Gaudino Committee or unused grants.

positions being given to Assefa in the history department and Rafia Zafar in the English department.

"It afforded the time I needed to finish my dissertation in an environment I would be comfortable in," Assefa said of the program. "I think the way it's organized is very humane. It's extremely good that one is not allowed to teach in the first semester." Assefa hopes to defend her dissertation in September, before returning here to teach.

Not an inside line College President Francis Oakley emphasized that the Bolin Fellowship was formed to encourage minority students to complete their graduate work by providing them with funding at the very expensive final stages of gaining a Ph.D. He said the purpose of the fellowship was not to give Williams an inside line on hiring qualified minority candidates, though he termed the appointment of Assefa to be a "happy by-product" of the program.

Thus far, Assefa said she has found her teaching experience to be very rewarding — and completely different from the two years she spent as a graduate lecturer at Princeton. "You are a professor here, not a teaching assistant. The teaching responsibilities are not too heavy, but they are creative and exciting."

Assefa is currently teaching a course on the French Revolution which she will offer again next year, along with a new course on nineteenth-century Europe and a 100 level seminar on the impact of Colonialism on

England and France. She said she is very eager to start teaching full-time, and makes no effort to hide her love for the profession. "I consider myself first and foremost a teacher. This is what I want to do."

Asked why she chose to teach at Williams, Assefa said she liked the college's commitment to interdisciplinary studies, and hinted that she would one day like to work with professors from other departments in preparing new interdisciplinary courses.

Some regret

Assefa expressed some regret over not having the opportunity to teach graduate students here, but she acknowledged the benefits of undergraduate institutions as well. "I think there's more latitude in a small college. There are ways the needs of teachers and students are better met in a small college versus a large research university."

Life at Williams has also been enjoyable for Assefa outside the classroom. "I'm a social person," she said, "and socially, this place has been exciting and good for me, but I don't think this is true for all Bolin Fellows."

Her words served as a reminder of last year's incident when Wahneema Lubiano, a Bolin Fellow, turned down a teaching appointment here because her 11-year-old son, Jefe, had been the subject of racial harassment after school and at the Williamstown Youth Center.

Assefa said she knew of Lubiano's difficulties before she arrived and felt some concern regarding her own son, Felipe, who is 13. "I was aware of the problems of raising a minority child in a community like this."

She added, however, that Felipe's situation was quite different from Jefe's. Felipe is two years older and attends Pine Cobble School, which is private. Lubiano's son attended public school in Williamstown. Also, Felipe lived in Williamstown last year with his father, Assistant Professor of Political Science Samuel Assefa, so he has had a more gradual adjustment to life here, she said.

Addressing the issue of affirmative action and minority hiring here, Assefa said, "Lest we think these are our own problems, these are problems with all private institutions. There seems to be a strong commitment on the part of the college and President Oakley, but I think there are problems, and I want to work on them in any way I can."

2:00, Henderson said that she had not received any responses. According to Henderson, the group that wrote the letter includes blacks, whites, hispanics and asians and claims no group affiliation.

Assistant to the President for Affirmative Action Nancy McIntire, who supplied the statistics, said the writers of the cover letter have confused several ideas. She said that the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission includes in the definition of hispanic not only people of Latin American origin

In terms of actual performance, we see a pattern of departments which have had minority faculty and continue to have them.

but also includes those of other Spanish cultures. Therefore, she said, the inclusion of native-born European professors in the category of hispanic professors is correct.

Regarding the charge that the report is inaccurate because it includes the names of faculty members not on campus, McIntire said, "That's a confusion in the letter between affirmative action and faculty leave patterns." She said that all faculty employed by the college, regardless of where they are, would be named on a list of faculty. She added that the college really has no control over when a professor takes leave but that it is a matter of personal choice.

McIntire said that her statistics were clearly labelled as being as of October 1987. At that time, Knight was still alive, although he was on medical leave. "To ignore that is even insensitive than to delete him," she said.

"As far as I'm concerned, that letter means nothing to me because the person who wrote it didn't have the balls to put his name on it. It could have been written by anyone," Don Scott '90, a WBSU coordinator, said. Scott also stated that the WBSU as an organization had nothing to do with the writing of the letter.

Todd Bunch '88, a coordinator of the WBSU, said that he agreed with the letter's statement on Knight's inclusion. "That request was made after October. If you're going to hand out something, it might as well be accurate and up-to-date," he said.

Henderson said that she had no clear indication as to why the names of the writers were not revealed. She said that she received the impression that there was, in fact, a reason for their anonymity but did not know what it was. She said she thought a follow-up was planned, at which time the writers would reveal their names.

The letter to Oakley said that the college's overall commitment to affirmative action, "appears to flounder against the prerogatives [sic] of departmental autonomy." It requested that two visiting black professors, one in the Psychology department and one in the music department, be offered full-time tenure-track appointments. Neither of the professors are still at the college.

Not intended for release

Oakley said that he had no knowledge that the letter to him would be released. He said, "That was not a letter that was intended for public comment." He said that the letter led to a constructive meeting on affirmative action with the signatories. He also stated that the word "Confidential" which is written across the top of the letter was not written by himself or anyone working for him. "I assumed it came from the signatories," he said.

Both Associate Dean of the College Mary Kenyatta and Associate Professor of English David Smith, who signed the letter to Oakley, said that although they did not recall the letter as having been labelled confidential, they had not planned for the letter to be released. "It looks as though it was something that was printed on there later," Kenyatta said. "Our letter was technically not confidential...You have to understand that this group of people who met with Dean Oakley preferred to discuss things outside of the purview of the entire college."

There are many [minority] scholars who are doing cutting edge research.

Smith said, "It was not our intention to use it [the letter to Oakley] as a public cudgel to beat the administration over the head."

Neither Smith nor Kenyatta authorized release of the letter. None of the other signatories were available for comment.

Erik Triplett '88, a former secretary of the WBSU, said that he never saw the letter to Oakley during his time in office. He said that as secretary, he probably would have seen the letter if it were in the WBSU's possession. He also stated that he did not know the names of the writers of the cover letter.

When asked if he believes what he wrote still holds true today, Smith said, "In terms of actual performance, we see a pattern of departments which have had minority faculty and continue to have them." But, he added, there are other departments which do not.

Kenyatta said that she still believes that the Psychology Department should hire a minority professor. The letter to Oakley said that there were no regular black appointees in Psychology at the time. "There are many [minority] scholars who are doing cutting edge research: development of adolescents, self-perceptions of minorities, research that's being done that shows black folk as other than deviant. One can graduate with a degree in psychology. Question: do they get that perspective? I don't know."

Can get perspective
Acting Dean of the Faculty George Goethals, a professor of psychology, responded, "I think so. It's hard to say that's one perspective...It depends on what courses they take in the major that that kind of issue is covered." Commenting on the lack of minority professors in the department, Goethals said, "The Psychology Department has existed for forty years without one." He was quick to add that although he feels these minority views are being represented, he would like to see a minority professor added to the department.

If you're going to hand out something, it might as well be accurate and up-to-date.

Triplett said that he discussed the issue of affirmative action at Williams at an informal luncheon between the trustees and the WBSU in January. One trustee even went so far as to criticize the college's position. "He said that he agreed that there's a difference between having a deep commitment [and what the college has]...Just to have him say that to me said that yeah, the college has a problem with setting their commitment straight," Triplett said.

The August 1986 edition of the college Faculty Handbook states, "The Williams affirmative action program specifies procedures and objectives designed to increase the proportion of women and members of minority groups within the various categories of employment at the College."

Besides Smith and Kenyatta, only two of the other six signatories to the letter to Oakley are still at the college.

Ephs up pressure

The Ephs stretched their man-to-man pressure from half to full-court in the second half and saw early results as the Jeffs were bothered by the new Williams look.

"We used our more speedy players to open the half in the full court man and it hurt their offensive flow," Roberts said.

The Ephs managed to tie the score with only four minutes gone in the half and started to build a lead of their own.

Roberts said that the Ephs' offensive strategy called for either Chrissy Cadigan or Nancy Hedeman to have the ball in scoring position.

"If Chrissy couldn't take a jumper then she'd dump it down low to Nancy," she said. Cadigan ended up with 27 points, game high for the Ephs. Roberts continues to be impressed by her freshman guard.

"Half of her points were in key situations on moves I had never seen from her all season. Having a freshman who can do that is unbelievable."

The Ephs led by five with four minutes left and made good on enough free throws in the final minutes to close out the contest ahead by seven at 70-63.

Hedeman was second in scoring with 13 points and led the team in rebounds with 15. Missy Crouchley added twelve points of her own, nine of which were on three point shots, and Kim Hatch had eight assists.

Against RPI the Ephs fell behind by a 17-6 score in the first minutes of the game. The Engineers added to their lead in the second half and stretched it to a 21 point deficit with about 13 minutes to play. The Ephs chipped at the margin but were hindered by Hedeman's absence due to foul trouble. Hedeman picked up three early fouls, a questionable touch foul at the start of the second half, and a final fifth with 7:50 remaining and the Ephs trailing 59-42. Cadigan scored 21 for the Ephs in the 76-56 loss.

RPI too physical

Roberts pointed to RPI's physical advantage as the principal cause for the defeat. She said, "They're a bit strong for our division because they are first a state school and then a military school that recruits its students. They are physically much stronger and we were intimidated."

Roberts said she is enthusiastic about the team's surprising season.

"I am pleased because of the hard work of the team. They put in long hours, good practices, and they've done everything I've asked of them. They always stay together as a team. If one kid didn't do it some night, then another one did."

All post-season tournaments start next week.

jazz group, but the instruments used by some of the band members, and their general style of playing shows a debt to a much larger musical community — specifically the musical cultures of many African and Asian nations.

Co-leader Shabazz performed on a variety of African percussion instruments, including the marimba-like ballophone, the conga and the jembe drum. Shabazz, also acting as the band jester, kept up a constant banter with the audience.

Even with Shabazz's antics, the group as a whole did not always maintain the energy and vitality that are necessary in order to do justice to the other half of the African musical "formula."

The group, and particularly drummer Warren Smith, occasionally lacked the rhythmic drive and collective intensity that this style of playing requires, remaining at the same level of energy for an extended period of time. Often, the musical hits and valleys were too few and far between, and the space between them not captivating enough to maintain the listener's attention.

The show was not without exciting moments. The simultaneous improvisations of Cole, Daley, and Hemphill whipped up into a wild frenzy in the show's finale "Borundi 2," while Visley's slap-bass solo in "A scar is never so smooth as natural skin" nearly brought down the house. But such moments were generally the exception and not the rule.

Wind and Thunder is an ambitious group that combines the technical virtuosity of its players with the strong, deeply-rooted foundation of the Yoruba civilization and its cultural heritage. Overall, considering the difficulty of the group's task (of yoking together two or more different musical styles) and the ever-changing nature of the band's personnel — Cole and Shabazz are the only permanent members of the group — the music of Wind and Thunder fits together with a surprising amount of success.

The "Cabin Fever Jazz" series continues March 26 with a performance by the Ahmad Jamal Trio.

Blankenship: "I think the CC has a lot to offer in terms of initiating a lot of ideas...What I really hope to do, if John and I are elected, is to really increase the expectations of the CC for next year."

Reddy: "I think the most effective role this year's CC has played has been in responding to suggestions from on campus...We have to be open and available...I would like to see us continue the idea box in Baxter. The Milham House summit was also effective."

How would you correct some of the weaknesses you saw in last year's CC?

Blankenship: "I think that we need to work on increasing the effectiveness of the house representative."

Hobart: "He [Council President Carter Zinn] was very set and I think that he maybe tried to push too hard at the beginning...I'm afraid I might have that problem, but would rather err on the side of pushing too hard."

Reddy: "This administration tried to get so much done. But major issues were raised at the last minute...We should try to inform more people, to keep students as well as representatives aware."

burden on the student. On the issue of fairness, Zinn said, "The commission was looking out for the rights of those accused of grievances by having the Dean first look into [a] case and then bringing it to the grievance committee if necessary."

Sensitive to community

"We want a process that is sensitive to the needs of the whole community...that is open enough to be effective and that responds in a maximal way to the need to protect the rights of both parties, the person lodging the grievance and the person the grievance is being lodged against," Oakley said.

Oakley added that has not yet received the commission's draft but has discussed the issue with commission members.

Having a standing committee rather than an ad-hoc one would be important in maintaining expertise and making sure the process is fair, Cook said. "By having such a procedure, infractions of the college discrimination policy will be handled more thoroughly than they are now."

Commission member Jo Ann Gray-Murray emphasized the need for students as well as faculty to understand how the grievance procedure works.

Oakley said that he was, "anxious to make sure that there is nothing about the procedure that prohibits the lodging of genuine grievances." Both he and Provost Neil Grabols said the examination of the reasons for the changes would be part of their reviewing process.

Cunningham said the commission is also examining the Junior Advising and Freshman Advising systems, and evaluating the college curriculum. Its goal, through educational programs, "is to move people away from self-centeredness and to have them recognize the need to respect everyone's differences," he said. The commission was scheduled to discuss its work on the grievance procedure and other issues of concern in an open meeting last night.

MILLIONS OF PEOPLE HAVE BEEN CURED OF A DISEASE MOST PEOPLE THINK IS INCURABLE.

We've made significant progress against most forms of cancer. But, as far as many people are concerned, cancer is still a fatal disease.

There are nearly three million people who would disagree. People who have had cancer and are now cured.

For certain forms of cancer, the progress we've made is nothing short of miraculous.

With early detection and prompt treatment, the survival rate for Hodgkin's disease can be as high as 74%. Childhood leukemia: as high as 65%. Colon and rectal cancer: as high as 75%. Breast cancer: as high as 90%.

Todays, one in every two people who get cancer will survive.

As far as we've come, we still have quite a way to go. And for that, we'd like your help.

There's only one place where cancer is a hopeless disease: In your mind.

mercally successful, light, fluffy, fun stuff," including recent works and musicals.

Caroline Boyden '89, technical director of Cap and Bells, explained that in Theatre Department productions, "the classroom is always strongly connected to what goes on on stage." In Cap and Bells productions, on the other hand, "no one has the final word but the students, and that's a good experience...There's no higher authority to turn to."

Cap and Bells far outdates the Williams Theatre Department, which was founded in 1974. It has had to cope with a shift in its role on campus. While Cap and Bells once presented all college productions, it now must work its schedule around the Theatre Department's use of the Downstage Theatre. Although there has been animosity between the two organizations in the past, relations are currently smooth, and Baratta and Boyden have frequent communication with Theatre department chairperson Arden Fingerhut in order to keep them that way.

Not limited to performances at the Downstage Theatre, Cap and Bells is practically a traveling organization. It sponsors productions that are performed in alternative places on campus, ranging in the past from Currier Ballroom, where members organized last fall's "Currier Club" jazz/eating fest, to Jesup Hall.

Point System

Cap and Bells members must accumulate a certain number of points through participation in Theatre department or Cap and Bells productions in order to have voting privileges, run for office, become a design manager or propose to direct a production. Points vary according to level of participation; for example, ushering counts as one point, while playing a lead counts as four.

This year, Cap and Bells is sponsoring seven events: the annual Freshman Revue, David Mamet's "Glengarry Glen Ross," Ross Goldenberg's "Letters Home," a reading of an original play by Robin Neldorf '91, and the Currier Club.

"Company," the musical written by Williams College and Cap and Bells alumnus Stephen Sondheim, will be their next production, to be performed March 10-12. The show will squeeze a 20-piece orchestra into Downstage. Ouchterloney described it as a "fairly large-scale production...It's a good story, good music, good dancing."

Taking time off

and makes them feel out of touch. He said he also saw a few students who took time off because of emotional troubles.

For other students, Williams itself, not personal problems, is the reason for time off. A sophomore minority student currently taking time off said, "I felt I wasn't doing my best at the school, because I wasn't comfortable with the school." She complained about homogeneity, an underlying social and racial tension and the narrow-mindedness of other students. She said, "There's one norm at this school, and all the students as soon as they come are pressured into leaning toward that norm." She said that time off would enable her to get in control of her feelings toward Williams.

Another sophomore, who is also on a leave of absence, said he agrees. He said that the faculty and courses were very good, but the lack of diversity among the student body was a problem, especially for people from large cities. He suggested that an example of Williams' disregard for diversity is that a large majority of the student body did not request financial aid. "Everyone comes from the same background; skiing in the winter, tennis in the summer and Europe in the spring," he said. According to him, students at Williams all hold essentially the same views and are too sheltered or just not interested enough to become involved in the real world.

Rich Williams '90 skies for a rebound last week against Wesleyan at Chandler. R'Mo and his teammates won their last two Little Three games to pull into a tie with both the Cardinals and Amherst for the title.

The brilliant team effort is evidenced by the balanced scoring among the Ephs. Melchionni added 14 with 9 boards, Williams and Masters chipped in 13 a piece, and Healy put in 12 points and had 10 rebounds. Groff led Amherst with a game high 36, while Saft added 24 points. Amherst, however, had only one field goal in the second half from the rest of the team.

Playoffs?
Sheehy and the squad were extremely jubilant after the hard fought victory, for defeating Amherst has a way of atoning for other losses. The win also kept alive the very slim ECAC playoff hopes that the Ephs have carried with them the last three weeks.

"I'm not overly optimistic," Sheehy said, "but we still have a shot. Either way, to end the season this way is great."
Sheehy and his players will have to settle for a "great" ending without a playoff berth. On Monday, the ECAC selection committee did not offer a berth to the defending champions.

The win over the 'Herst gives the graduating seniors an impressive 7-2 record against their archrival, including two Little Three Championships.

SEASON'S SCORECARD

Men's Basketball	13-9	Tied for Little Three title with Amherst & Wesleyan.
Men's Hockey	8-14	5-12 in ECAC Division II Little Three Champions.
Women's Basketball	17-4	Tied for Little Three title with Amherst. Headed for playoffs.
Men's Squash	12-7	Won Little Three for 14th year in a row.
Track		Both men's & women's teams won Little Three crowns and sent many runners to nationals.
Women's Squash	6-8	Won Little Three crown for 2nd straight year.
Wrestling	4-11	1st year coach Roger Caron continues improving trend.
Women's Hockey	6-7-1	Club squad looks forward to varsity status next year.
Skiing		Both men's and women's schuss teams placed 4th at their home carnival.
Swimming		Women's splashers captured the Little Three crown, unlike the men's team.

Overall, the Eph competitors compiled a 66-60-1 record this winter, while taking 6 Little Three titles outright, and tying for two.

SPORTS SHORTS

Sophomore forward Dave Bakken wards off a Salem St. opponent in the Ephs home upset over Salem. The 6-5 win evened the Ephs record against Salem St. to 1-1 on the year.

Wrestling

The Williams Wrestling Team ended its season in a disappointing manner this Saturday as only two of its grapplers placed in their divisions.

First seed Steve Felix '90 took fourth in the 126 pound weight class by winning four matches and losing two at the New England. At 190, co-captain Mark Duff '89, who was seeded third, won five matches and lost two, on his way to taking fifth place. Both gained all New England honors for the second time in their careers.

Although the tournament was disheartening, the future appears much brighter for the team. Next season it will return all of its starters, including Duff who went 23-3 this season, Felix who went 15-4-1, and co-captain Jon Dillon '89 who won eleven matches and lost nine this year. The team, which finished 4-11, only loses one wrestler, senior Dave Rakonitz.

His loss will be a great one, however, The "Rak", was a constant source of inspiration through his hard nosed wrestling and never-say-die attitude. While the season ends on a sour note, the added year of experience for each of its wrestlers promises to make next year's squad a contender.

—Scott Mozarsky

W. Squash

In a tough finish to a tough season, the women's squash team was swatted by Div. I powers Brown and Franklin and Marshall by scores of 7-2 and 8-1 respectively.

Fourth and sixth players Lori Schaan '89 and Susie Piper '90 both swept 3-2 matches from their Brown opponents. Senior captain Jeanne Clappse downed her F and M opponent by an identical score after losing the first two games.

"Nearly all the matches were close," said eighth player Timmie Friend, "They were all coming in at around 15-10, 15-12 or tiebreakers. We all played really well, it was just a matter of their having more experience and slightly better players."

The losses leave the Eph-women with a final slate of 6-8 as they look toward the nationals next weekend at Dartmouth. Clappse will look to post her third straight top twelve finish while second player Allison Buckner '89 looks to improve her last year's performance where she won two matches in the losers bracket before being knocked out in a match which had two games go to tiebreakers. Look for rookie Lisa Brav-

"Jeanne is just an incredible player when she's on" commented Friend, "If her knee doesn't bother her too much, she could do great."

—Marc McDermott

M. Squash

The men's squash team saw its record finalized at 12-7 as it was blanked 9-0 by Princeton. The match was actually closer than expected, as Princeton, one of the top two teams in the country, could sweep only two contests in straight sets and sixth player Doug Gilbert '89 was brought down by only two points in the fifth game.

The top six of Wendell Chestnut '88, Lew Fisher '89, Robert Hailigan '89, Dana Weeder '88, Pier Friend '88 and Doug Gilbert '89 will represent Williams at next weekend's National Intercollegiate Championships at Princeton.

ton to make some noise the third flight as well.

The only thing that could hurt the Ephs appears to be the shaky knees of Clappse. If she can hold out through the long tourney, Williams strong top three could open some eyes.

In The Spotlight...

Junior Missy Crouchley's three three-pointers versus RPI marked the first hoops from behind the bonus stripe for the women's b-ball team this year. Crouchley netted twelve in that loss.

Chrissy Cadigan '91 has Nancy Hedeman '89 (13 points, 15 boards) looking over her shoulder. The rookie tickled the twine for 27 against the Jeffs and dropped in 21 more in the contest against RPI.

Senior goalie Mark Morrison's 7-5 record in the net is the first winning record for a Williams men's hockey goalie in the last three years. Morrison allowed less than 3.5 goals per game.

Mark Duff '89 and Steve Felix '90 may not be satisfied with their showings at the New England Wrestling Championships, but the fifth and fourth they took earned them both All-New England honors for the second straight year.

Kudos to Coach Sheehy's boys, five of whom scored in double digits in the Amherst win: Garcia Major '90, Mike Masters '89, Bill Melchionni '89, Dan Healy '91, and Rich Williams '90.

Six skiers have qualified for the NCAA Division I championships: Mari Omland '89, Amy Sullivan '91, Kathy Wolf '88, Jason Priest '91, J.P. Parlsen '90 and Pat Gilmartin '90. Congrats!

Playoff news: The men's basketball team was not given the chance to defend its 1987 ECAC crown, after its stunning upset win at Amherst. The selection committee did not choose the 13-9 Ephs as one of the eight entrants.

The women's basketball squad will be a playoff entrant, although not in the ECAC's. The lady cagers will be the #1 seed and the host of the NIAC tourney this Saturday and Sunday at Chandler Gymnasium.

As of press time, the women's swim team was engaged in a three way battle with Tufts and Bowdoin for the N.E. championship.

This weekend the men's swim team will enter the same championship as co-favorites with the Jeffs.

From the Locker Room

by Marc McDermott and Scott Mozarsky

As a somewhat inebriated crowd at Gladden 54 spontaneously burst out into a rousing rendition of "MEET THE METS" a mere half hour after Debi Thomas demonstrated her non-invincibility, it occurred to these reporters that the Olympics should be the experimental sport. For as the crack of the bat sounds the coming of spring, a young man's thoughts can turn to only one thing: baseball.

The relationship between the Olympics and baseball was solidified when George Steinbrenner was named the head of the United States Olympic Advisory Committee. Can there be any doubt that in 1992, George will apologize to all America for the U.S.'s poor performance and promise to rectify the situation by hiring Billy Martin to coach the ski team? Hopefully, George will be able to find some starting pitchers among his new Olympic friends in order to bolster the non-existent Yankee pitching staff.

While the Yankee's hurriers appear to be too weak to win a championship, their cross-town rivals seem poised to assert themselves as the dynasty of the '90's. With a healthy staff and the emergence of Darryl Strawberry as the best rightfielder in the National League, the Amazins look like a shoo-in to crush the evil Redbirds into their own fake turf as the hated "White Rat" Herzog mourns the loss of Jack Clark, who unfortunately will not be able to pitch for the Yankees. The Phillies appear to be the Met's lone competition, but then again, Jack Clark can't pitch for them either.

In the West, one must anticipate a wide open race as each team in the division improved in the off season. Since Pete Rose has acknowledged that he can no longer hit the fastball, one must wonder whether he will try to take the mound to bolster the Red's porous staff. If Pete is unable to latch on with the Red's staff, a job opening is likely to exist on the Yankees pitching staff or the Jamaican bobsled team.

In the minor leagues expect the Sox, Jays and Tigers to battle it out in the East while the Orioles and Yankees attempt to stay out of the second division, which brings us to the West. In an effort to make the West competitive, maybe Commissioner Uble could move it to AA. Regardless, a hard-fought battle between 500 teams is expected, as usual. The Twinkles could startle West watchers, there have to be some out there, by winning 85 games. Then again, maybe not. The only sure thing in 1988 is that the New York Mets will win the World Series. Then again, after Witt skated, Debi Thomas was supposedly assured of winning the figure skating competition.

Note — Now that my co-sports Editor and Phillies fan Ted Hobart has left the Record to run for President, you may notice a decided prejudice in this week's quiz.

1. What famed Mets manager said "we're in such a slump, even the guys who are drinking aren't hitting".
2. What Met (whose last name is Vail) hit in 22 straight games his rookie year and was called "The next Mickey Mantle" by Bob Murphy (Hint, he's now pumping gas in Sacramento)?
3. How many pounds overweight did speedy centerfielder Lenny "Nails" Dykstra report to spring training? (Hint - 20)
4. In their quarter century history, the Mets have had a ridiculous number of third basemen. How many third sackers have they had? (Hint - more than 83)
5. How many terms for "three-pointer" Mike Harrington use in his basketball article?

This week's winner, Mike Papsodoro, will receive a $15 Goff's gift certificate. To enter this week's quiz, send your answers to S.U. 2917 or the Record (x2400) by Sunday.

Amherst dealt first home loss; men's b-ball over Jeffs by 11

by Michael K. Harrington

So much for the Lefrak Attack. So much for the Little Three. And so much for Amherst's athletic program.

The Williams Men's Hoop team dismantled the favored Lord Jeffs on their own court Saturday night 92-81, stealing Amherst's Little Three hopes and creating a three-way tie for the mythical championship.

The hungry Ephs overcame loud jeering and petty insults from the large and rowdy Amherst crowd to take an early lead. Williams' tenacious man-to-man defense concentrated its efforts on sharpshooters Yram (that's Mary spelled backwards) Groff and Steve (I've got a rug on my back) Saft, two players who hurt the Ephs in an earlier contest.

Sophomore Garcia Major, Mike Masters '89 and Bill Melchionni '89 hit consecutive hoops to give the Ephmen an early 16-9 advantage. Sophomore Rich Williams then responded to six straight Jeff points with a clean three pointer, and Masters followed with two free throws to extend the Eph lead to 23-15.

Groff led a defector's surge, beginning with a long trifecta, and Saft followed with four points of his own. But a coast-to-coast Major hoop and a pair of chipples by freshman Than Healy held Amherst in check.

Groff connected on another long trey to cut the lead to two, and teammate Dave Wasserman scored five points in the last 1:25 to knot the teams at 41-41 at intermission.

Defense paves way

The keys to the Ephs strong first half were defense and rebounding. Melchionni, giving away four inches and 40 lbs. to the rug man, displayed a defensive intensity in limiting Saft to eight hard-earned points. But it was a team effort, as the whole squad pressured Amherst into repeated turnovers.

Major assumed control of the contest at the outset of the second stanza, hitting a pull-up J and a bonus bomb to give Williams a 46-41 lead. After a brief Lord Jeff rally, Rich Williams swished his second trident and Major's two free throws and patented driving bucket once again increased the Eph lead to five.

With the thrilling end-to-end action continuing, Williams hit another triple, this one from way out, providing the Ephs with a 61-58 lead with 12:00 to play.

Amherst rallies

But the Lord Jeffs showed why they are playoff-bound, running off ten straight points behind who else but Groff and Saft. Coach Harry Sheehy called timeout to calm his men and hush the frenzied crowd. The TO worked, as Melchionni led a spirited 7-0 run that evened the game.

"We got some big hoops, stopped them on defense a couple of times, and didn't foul, and that let us back in the game," Sheehy said.

The two teams traded baskets for the next three minutes, until the red hot Major rifled in six straight points to make the score 82-74 with 3:00 remaining. Two baskets by Groff sandwiched a Saft jumper to cut the lead to 82-80 with 1:35 left.

But Groff's next troika attempt caroomed off the glass and into Melchionni's hands. The junior guard calmly hit two free throws, then hauled down another board which started a fast break layup by Josh Lipski '90, putting the game out of reach.

Garcia Major led the Eph attack at Lefrak with 32 points (18 in the second half), but equally importantly limited Jeff Schnack to zero points.

Freshman Defenseman Rick Laferriere makes his way up ice in last Wednesday's 6-5 home win over Salem St. (Scala)

Conway to Frechette, score! Hockey wins 6-5

by Ted Hobart

"I never thought he [Tim Frechette '89] would be able to stop and get that pass" said Chris Conway '89 of his pass through the Salem State goalcrease with little more than ten seconds remaining in Wednesday's contest in Lansing Chapman Rink.

Frechette was able to snare the pass through the crowd and beat the sprawling Salem goaltender, thus making his fellow assistant captain's pass the game-winning assist in the 6-5 thriller.

Indeed it was a night of beautiful assists and sharp teamwork. In contrast to earlier games this season in which the majority of the squad's goals came from superior individual efforts, this contest featured better forechecking and backchecking, as well as sharp passing in center ice.

After Salem State jumped out to a 1-0 lead, Conway started a personal trend for the night, as his hardnosed forechecking on the shorthanded situation broke the puck free. Conway centered the loose puck to winger Mike Swenson '89, who knotted the game. Conway would finish the night with a goal and three assists.

Early in the second frame, Salem State capitalized on one of several sloppy plays in the Eph defensive zone for a shorthanded goal and a 2-1 lead. On that same power play goal, however, Williams tied the game on a tally by defenseman Jim McNulty '89.

Donato's donation

Fellow defenseman Chris Donato '89 gave the squad its first lead when he poked home a rebound on the power play. Salem State kept the game tight, however, scoring at the 17:18 mark to send a 3-3 deadlock into the second intermission.

As has happened before this season, the Ephs took an early lead in the third period, only to see their opponents tie the game again. Goals by Conway and freshman Chris Headrick, assisted by Walt Hoffman '89 from a beautiful rush up the wing, gave the squad a 5-3 lead halfway through the third stanza.

Salem State fought back, as other opponents have done this season. Two power play goals with under three minutes remaining tied the contest, and had Eph fans biting their nails.

Freshman Sean Seguin forced a Salem state tripping penalty with a beautiful rush in the offensive zone. It was almost wasted, however, as only a great save by goalie Mark Morrison '88 prevented a shorthanded goal with 30 seconds remaining. The squad recovered, and rushed into the Salem State zone to set up the final goal.

The last two games, against North Adams and Salem State, have been strong indications of a turnaround by the squad. Winning two clutch games in the end of the season bodes well for next year's team, particularly with the strength and emerging leadership of the class of '89 (whose members scored five of the six goals and added six of seven assists, against Salem State). The two wins also moved the final record up to 8-14, 5-12 in the ECAC Division II standings and show a continued improvement from two year's ago when the squad was 3-17-2. (Last year's squad captured seven victories)

W. hoops down Jeffs to gain NIAC #1 seed

by Jim McDermott

A few weeks ago, women's basketball coach Nancy Roberts stressed the importance of upcoming games against Smith, Wesleyan, and Amherst. She said that the Ephs had to win all three to stay in the running for an ECAC or NIAC bid. Even one loss would hurt their tournament chances, especially ECAC chances. The Ephs went on to beat Wesleyan and Smith, and entered this past week with only Amherst in a position to stop them.

The Ephs were fully aware of the importance of this contest, but fell behind by 15 in the first ten minutes of the first half. In a stunning comeback effort, the Ephs climbed out of that hole and rallied to beat Amherst 70-63, displaying aggressive full court man-to-man defense and a balanced scoring attack.

The victory gave the Ephs a tie for the Little Three crown with Amherst. The Ephs also played RPI this week in a less important game, and lost against the physical Engineers.

With the Amherst victory placing the squad's record at an impressive 17-4, the Ephs can now only wait for the tournament committees' decision, which will come early this week.

The Ephs faced the Jeffs with half-court man-to-man to start the game and saw their tournament hopes fading quickly as Amherst jumped out to a large early lead. The Jeffs shot a hot 61% from the field, compared to the Ephs' 46%. The halftime score was 55-44.

Men 5th, women 4th at Midd. Six skiers qualify for NCAA's

by James Lee

The Eph skiers travelled north to Middlebury to fight some stiff competition on Friday and Saturday, and returned home with moderate results. With some key skiers not performing up to their potential, the men's team finished in 5th place overall and the women placed 4th.

For the men, the carnival was a close race with 4th-place St. Lawrence. On Saturday morning, the Ephmen beat their St. Lawrence competitors in the cross country relay race to jump to a five point lead. In the afternoon's competition, however, only two Eph skiers managed to finish in the slalom, allowing St. Lawrence to pass Williams.

Despite the less than stellar team showing, some individual Ephmen did perform admirably. Jason Priest '91 had his best finish of the season so far by placing 5th in the slalom. Captain Mac Nash '88 and Bob Fisher '89 both had one of their best races of the season, finishing 12th and 20th respectively in the individual cross country race.

The women's team posted a fair performance, placing 4th in the giant slalom and cross country relay races, tying for third with Middlebury in the individual cross country and for 5th with St. Lawrence in the slalom. There were a few encouraging individual performances: Kirsten Hansen '91 showed no signs of her rib injury, finishing 7th in the individual cross country and teaming up with Kirsten Froburg '90 and Ann Bokman '91 in the relay to finish 4th. Amy Sullivan '91 and Kathy Wolf '88, however, had poor carnivals, with Sullivan disqualifying in slalom and Wolf finishing at a disappointing 10th in individual cross country.

"After the home carnival, there's a tendency to let down.... However, some individuals came through to improve their position for the NCAA national division-I championship qualifications," commented Head Coach Bud Fisher. He said that while some skiers such as Omland, Sullivan, Wolf, Priest, Parisien and Gilmartin have already solidly qualified for the championships next weekend at Middlebury, some such as Amy Belliveau '91 and Froburg need strong performances at this weekend's UNH Eastern championships to qualify.

Dean of Freshmen Joan Edwards is considering drastically reducing the number of single-sex entries next year. These students live in Williams A. (Scala)

Single-sex entries may be phased out

by Ann Mantil

Single-sex freshman entries may be on the way out at Williams, according to Dean of Freshmen Joan Edwards. Edwards said that she is considering a plan to change the majority of single-sex to co-ed entries, effective next year.

There are currently nine single-sex entries on campus, six all-male with 109 students and three all-female with 53 students. Edwards said that in the Class of 1991, only two males and eight females requested to live in single-sex entries on their housing applications as incoming freshmen.

"We're considering reducing the number of single-sex entries primarily because the demand just isn't there," she said. "Practically the whole freshman class requests co-ed entries."

Andrew Selgsohn '88, a Junior Advisor in East 1, said that he had approached Edwards about the lack of demand for single-sex entries. "I couldn't think of a reason for them, especially at an institution that places such an emphasis on residential life and claims to be committed to coeducation ... The assumption was that a lot of people requested them, which was a pretty unexamined assumption."

Currently, single-sex entries are filled largely with freshmen who requested neither a co-ed nor a single-sex living environment, according to Director of Admissions Phillip Smith. He also said that a handful of freshmen who actually specified a co-ed entry ended up in single-sex entries.

More widespread

"At one point co-ed dorms weren't accepted at all, and now they're becoming more and more widespread," Edwards said. "I think the change would make freshman housing more comparable to upperclass housing."

All six entries in East and Fayerweather are single-sex, largely because of the structure of the buildings. Each entry takes up one floor and there is only one bathroom on each floor. But Edwards said she feels the change is possible. "I've talked to the junior advisors there, and they seem to think it's feasible. Students would have to go up and down stairs to use the bathrooms, but students have to do that in the Freshman Quad anyway."

Selgsohn said that none of the freshmen in his entry had requested to live in a single-sex entry. "Most of them were sort of displeased when they discovered that there weren't any women in their main social situation," he said.

Junior advisors are now conducting a survey among themselves as to their opinions on eliminating single-sex entries, according to Edwards. "I think most of them think it's a good idea. I haven't heard anything negative; it seems to be what the students want."

Blankenship & Kelsh ace College Council elections

by Bill Savadove

Trace Blankenship '89 will replace Carter Zinn '88 as president of the College Council after spring break. Blankenship's running mate, John Kelsh '89, will serve as vice president. Their ticket received 863 votes in the College Council elections, which were held last Thursday and Friday. The opposing ticket of Ted Hobart '89 and Marisa Reddy '89 received 255 votes.

In the elections, students approved an amendment to the council's constitution that creates four new sophomore representative seats and clarifies some election rules.

When contacted for comment after the election, Blankenship, who is currently College Council secretary, said, "This year we showed that we would leave no stone unturned in going after solutions. Our next move is to convince every student that there are no limitations to what he or she can ask the council to do." Blankenship said the first thing he plans to do is take care of unfinished business from the previous administration.

The total number of ballots turned in was 1,177. "We're really impressed with the turn out since it's so much more than last year," current Vice President Nicole Melcher said. Melcher and the other officers credited the turnout to holding the elections in Baxter Hall. This is the first year elections have been held in one central location.

Initial concern

Initially, council officers were concerned that the proposed amendment was not voted on by at least 50 percent of students in residence, as required by the constitution. After consultation with the Registrar and the Dean's office, it was determined that 955

Williams will participate in Soviet exchange

by Peter Balaban

Two Soviet college students will arrive at Williams next fall for a year of study as part of the first academic exchange of Soviet and American undergraduates. A formal agreement between the Soviet Ministry of Higher Education and a consortium of 24 liberal arts colleges that establishes the program was signed last week at Middlebury College.

Mikhail Sleptsov, head of the foreign relations department of the Soviet ministry of higher education, came to Williams last Friday to talk about the program at a press conference. Sleptsov met College President

Francis Oakley before the conference, and afterwards took a tour of the campus with several Williams Russian students. Anna Tavis, an assistant professor of Russian, translated for Sleptsov at the press conference.

"I would ... like to hope that you would act as advisors and friends and help our students get to know your college," Sleptsov said in an apparent address to Williams students at the conference. "I can promise that this help will be reciprocated in the Soviet Union," he added.

Fifty-two or more Soviet students will study at prestigious liberal arts colleges in the United States next year, and American students (including two from Williams) will begin study at Soviet universities beginning with the 1989-90 academic year.

First time

This will be the first time undergraduates from either country will be allowed to study for a full academic year for credit at institutions in the other country. Course grades would be transferable.

The exchange will also be the first time Soviet college students will be allowed to attend

American institutions without being accompanied by officials. The students will live on campus with American roommates. Although there will be a Soviet advisor for the program based in Middlebury next year, and probably an American advisor based in Moscow, students will be assigned academic/social advisors at institutions they attend.

"The best way to get to know each other is to understand each other," Sleptsov said. "Getting to know each other at this age will make people take home memories that will never go away ... [We] believe that educational cooperation at this age is very important for international cooperation."

The Soviet students will arrive in the U.S. in August for a month-long orientation period which will include intensive

Take a bite out of crime

If you leave your car unlocked, what are the chances it will be broken into overnight? Was the theft of your roommate's stereo an isolated incident? Does someone not on crutches have any reason to call security for an escort?

These questions point to a larger one: How can members of the Williams community protect themselves and their belongings without knowing how safe or endangered they are?

Attitudes at Williams seem to lie at one extreme, where people accept safety cavalierly, except when an occasional incident shocks people into temporary vigilance. Director of Security Ransom Jenks said that vandalism has increased this year. If people knew the frequency with which vandalism occurs, they could take steps to prevent it. We are lulled into a false sense of security, because crime rates are unknown.

Communities typically publicize reports of vandalism and crime in the form of "police blotters" in local papers. Security should similarly furnish on a weekly or monthly basis a list of incidents of vandalism, theft and assault in order that campus publications—the Record comes to mind—could include this information.

If the college would educate its members on this subject, it would allow them to act in a wiser manner and reduce crime on campus.

The Record is pleased to announce the establishment of its Board of Readers. Board members serve as loyal critics of the paper, meeting periodically to discuss the Record's content, format and editorial decisions. Responsibility for all aspects of the Record still remains, of course, with the editorial board.

Sex claims should be documented

To the Editor:

As you may know, I'm part of a larger neo-conservative movement that delights in pointing out the evident lack of scholarship and common sense associated with liberal causes. As such, I'm pleased that the "Williams Guide to Health and Sex" has finally come under closer scrutiny by the college community. Let me alert you to one little snippet from the section called "Sexuality and Sexual Preference," a section which is offered completely without documentation:

Viewed from the biological stance, exclusive heterosexuality is just as unnatural as exclusive homosexuality. Each of us is born with bisexual preferences. The child sexually responds and is attracted to both sexes equally. As she grows older, she is nudged gently (or not so gently) into the exclusive heterosexual pattern demanded by societal values. To repeat, heterosexuality is learned, not innate.

To repeat, this authoritative, college-funded statement is offered completely without documentation. Speaking before a junior faculty group on February 25, Dean Fix admitted that the Peer Health Guide has been "undersupervised," and consequently, I suspect we shall see positive changes made in future editions. In the meantime, I would like to see a campus commission established to ask whether or not the Peer Health Counselors are the ideal medium for presenting objective information to Williams students.

Deans act sans discretion

To the Editor:

We were recently distressed over the decision rendered by the disciplinary committee concerning the punishment of a student for his role in a minor altercation during Winter Carnival weekend. The student was suspended for the rest of the semester.

The disciplinary committee seemed to show no regard for the mitigating circumstances in this case. The other student involved in the incident did not even pursue the issue with the administration. In fact, both students reconciled their differences the day after the incident.

The dean's office did not let the matter rest. They summoned witnesses as well as the participants throughout the week to gather information surrounding the case. These students were never informed that anything said in the dean's office could later be used as evidence in the hearing. It took five days of this quasi-judicial approach before the suspended student was informed he would have to appear in front of the disciplinary committee.

Although the student recognizes his behavior was out of character and not within the bounds of the college's "good behavior" as outlined in the student handbook, the disciplinary committee and the deans ignored the student's unblemished academic and social record and the fact that he was an overall asset to the college community.

In short, we are distraught with the severity of the punishment and the unprofessionalism of the process; only testimony heard at the opening of the hearing should be used in rendering a decision. Information gathered on the previous days should only be used in deciding whether the case should be heard. If, in fact, this information is admitted, then it should be made known to the defendant so that he can prepare an apt defense. Due to inconsistencies in the system, seemingly worse incidents have been prescribed lesser penalties. Our greatest concern stemming from this event is that justice seems to be applied randomly and without discretion.

Wants to set the Record straight

To the Editor:

In light of how I was quoted in last week's "Quote of the week," I would like to set the record straight (pun intended). The statement in question was taken completely out of context and is in no way representative of the WBSU opinion on minority faculty hiring or my own. As a WBSU coordinator I do not have the right or the authority to speak for the entire union. I have never assumed such a position. As far as minority faculty hiring goes, I will only say that it is imperative

To understand affirmative action examine racism's historical roots

by David L. Smith

Though I usually disagree with David Kane, I have always appreciated his contributions over the past four years to the discussion of serious issues at Williams. His Op-Ed pieces on affirmative action displays his usual virtues of clarity and forthrightness. Nonetheless, I believe that his argument is fundamentally flawed and misleading. Despite his insistence on "facts," Kane relies primarily on abstract definitions and ahistorical generalizations.

"Reverse discrimination" is among the great chimeras of our time. It springs partly from a spurious definition of "racial discrimination" and partly from a misrepresentation of actual decision-making processes. According to Kane, "racial discrimination is treating people differently for the specific (and mostly irrelevant) reason of their race." This is true but grossly inadequate. Racial discrimination is not merely personal, arbitrary and gratuitous sentiment. It is a deeply entrenched, centuries old social tradition based upon assumptions that black people are inferior to and incompatible with white people. (I use the classic black/white dichotomy here for the sake of convenience. "Race" itself is a spurious notion, but I cannot pursue that argument here.) Innumerable social conventions, including many unconscious habits of thought and association, perpetuate discrimination against blacks, and all of these derive ultimately from whites' implicit belief in the inferiority and irreconcilable difference of blacks.

This "racism" expresses not just concepts but real power relationships: the subordination of a small minority by a totally dominant majority. But the basic equation is power, not numbers, as South Africa demonstrates. Individual acts of racial discrimination replicate in microcosm the general dominance of white over black.

Affirmative action does not reverse conventional discrimination. Instead, it creates a new premise based on egalitarian rather [than] exclusionary premises. It is a process for dismantling racist traditions by providing access to representatives of the group which has been previously excluded. Racial discrimination excludes blacks from serious consideration regardless of their qualifications. Affirmative action establishes new criteria which allow blacks to be considered alongside whites. To equate these two concepts trivializes the historical meanings of both.

Furthermore, Kane ignores the existence of basic threshold points in any hiring process and thus attacks a position which virtually no one holds. No sensible person could favor a system which selected incompetent applicants over competent ones. Affirmative action assumes that all candidates for a job meet the basic competency requirements and introduces an additional criterion (racial representation) to be considered in choosing among members of this pool. When he speaks of "refusing jobs to people because of the color of their skin," Kane implies that whites are always hired because of competence, but blacks sometimes only because of their race. This is false and ridiculous.

Kane's use of the Williams faculty as a point of reference is unfortunate, because if we consider the "facts" of the case, Kane's entire discussion appears trivial—which it is not. He devotes much attention to tenure decisions but never considers the very brief history of black faculty at Williams. In fact, only two black professors in the history of Williams have risen through the ranks to receive tenure, both within the past five years. This gives the college an average of roughly one per century.

No sensible person could favor a system which selected incompetent applicants over competent ones.

And overall, the number of black faculty is declining. The Political Science Department, for example, had two black faculty four years ago. Now they have none. Despite conducting several national searches and making offers to some black candidates, they have not been able to hire a black political scientist. The sharply declining number of black Ph.D.'s in all disciplines is a legitimate concern; the threat of blacks taking jobs from "more qualified" whites is not.

In any case, colleges are not charities, and "qualifications" must always be judged within specific contexts of departmental or institutional needs. Any teaching position at Williams will attract numerous "qualified" applicants, but by the time we match the candidates' interests and abilities to the college's specific needs, the list shrinks to just a few, all highly qualified. The purpose in choosing among them is not to so one candidate a special favor or to reward abstract "quality" but to strengthen the college in a particular area. Even if race, gender, ethnicity, etc. are criteria, the real objective is to meet the needs of Williams.

Despite the difficulty of hiring black faculty, a problem in all disciplines, I have never heard any faculty member or administrator at Williams suggest that we should hire incompetents simply to "add color" to the faculty. Williams does, after all, have a reputation to maintain. I find it inconceivable, for instance, that the Political Science Department might hire an unqualified—say, a person with no Ph.D. in political science and no progress toward obtaining one. They, like any other department, will continue their searches until they succeed. This, after all, is the spirit of affirmative action: to broaden, not subvert, the search for excellence.

David Kane performs a valuable service in raising these issues for serious discussion. It would be pernicious, however, to let his questions stand as unchallenged conclusions. He is right that we need to discuss and to understand the conceptual problems involved with affirmative action. Practically speaking, however, our real dilemma is not the policy of affirmative action but rather the difficulties of implementing it.

David L. Smith, on leave this year, is an Associate Professor of English.

The discipline committee's structure lends itself to miscarriages of justice

by Al Mottur '89 and Will Putnam '89

Our roommate has just been suspended for the duration of the semester. Over the past two weeks, we have been involved in and thoroughly examined the school's disciplinary process. While you may think our attitude is biased, we believe our experience has put us in a position to be critical, not of this individual decision, but of the process itself.

When a person is accused of violating a college standard, be it academic or social, he or she is often asked to defend him or herself in front of the campus Honor and Discipline Committee. This committee is composed of eight students and eight adults—generally members of the faculty or administration of the college.

We take issue with the composition of the committee. First off, there should be a majority of students on the panel. It is an inherent personal right to be judged by your peers when accused of committing an offense. Students on this campus are more able than isolated administrators to evaluate incidents in their proper context. The conduct of the student body is most observed and therefore readily understood by its members. Professors, deans, and coaches cannot as effectively grasp the implications of individual student actions.

So: those elected by the student body should be those who render the initial decisions. The college maintains the right to change any decision reached by the committee, if it so pleases.

Furthermore, having administrative and faculty members occupy half of the committee puts undue pressure on students trying to arrive at a decision. Any college student is apt to be intimidated by an authoritative elder. It is our opinion that the authority figures within the committee shape the course of discussion and debate of each case toward their own desired outcome.

There are other problems that need to be addressed as well. In our three years at Williams, there has been no consistency in those disciplinary decisions we have observed. Although it is not possible to cite specific examples due to the code of confidentiality, decisions concerning magnitude of probation, suspension, or expulsion, should be based, to an extent, on precedent. Over the past few years, the committee has not suspended people after incidents that were extremely severe: in their view, altercations in which bodily harm was done and transactions involving drugs did not merit suspension.

We demand consistency in these high impact decisions. It is unfair to punish students in an inequitable fashion who committed relatively similar offenses.

While the composition of the Honor and Discipline Committee must change each year, its underlying purpose and principles must be maintained. To determine what these are, it is necessary to review past cases and rulings. To make an analogy, the Supreme Court in rendering each decision, often relies to a large extent on previous rulings.

Though we feel that each case must be treated individually, in order to possess an underlying framework for decision-making, it is imperative to maintain a continuity case by case, and year by year. Moreover, in order to keep student conduct in check in a consistent fashion, it is necessary for the student body to have a clear understanding of school policy. Sure anyone can read the Student Handbook. But it will not matter if disciplinary decisions are rendered in a capricious manner.

We feel that there are too few students on this campus that understand the workings of the committee. It has not been subject to open criticism, and without review by those it affects, the committee has failed to reach an acceptable level of consistency and fairness. If the members do review previous cases as we suggest, the thoughts and principles that they derive from that study should not only guide their future decisions but should be made public to the Williams community.

These proposals obviously came to mind after seeing the direct effect of the committee's decision as rendered on a close friend. Nonetheless, we find them to be constructive ones that if implemented would provide for a more judicial and congruous process.

It is unfortunate that it takes a decision of this magnitude to bring about debate of the Honor and Discipline Committee's composition and methods.

No further comment will be made on my part because it seems as though any statement made will inevitably become misconstrued and all-encompassing. I would hope that in the future the Record will use a little more tact and discretion in its approach towards individuals, groups and more importantly, the issues at hand. Thank you.

Candle causes Sewall fire

A fire in Sewall House last Tuesday necessitated evacuation of all house residents. Residents were asked to stay with friends overnight. The fire was extinguished by the automatic sprinkler system before it could do damage to other rooms in the building.

Campus Fire Marshal Harold Weyers said that a candle which burned through a cup it had been placed in caused the fire. He said that Thomas Howard '89 left 105 Sewall at 10:00 pm and that the sprinkler system went off at 10:59 pm. "So the candle had an hour to burn and things began to happen," he said.

The dresser top, where the candle was located, was burned, along with areas of the door frame and wall immediately surrounding it, Weyers said. But before the fire spread, the automatic sprinkler system, activated by excessive heat, went off in the room. According to Tom Smith '88, a resident of Sewall, the sprinkler system dumped three inches of water in room 96, which is directly below Howard's room.

Director of Security Ransom Jenks said that a security car was at Sewall within two minutes of the time the sprinklers went off. "We drop everything when a fire alarm goes off," he said. On seeing smoke, the security officers called the Williamstown Fire Department and made sure all students were out of the building. But by the time the officers entered room 105, they found that the fire was already out.

Weyers said that students were told to stay in another house that night for safety reasons. He said this is a usual practice because of the danger of electrical problems caused by water accumulation from sprinklers going off. All power except that for the sprinklers, fire alarms and heating systems was turned off for the night. Students were permitted to return the next day.

Damage to the building was minimal and is largely cleared up now, Director of the Physical Plant Winthrop Wassenaar said. Smoke-damaged walls in room 105 and the room above it were repainted late last week. A section of plaster that fell from the ceiling in room 96 below because of water stress was also replaced late last week after the ceiling was given a chance to dry, Wassenaar said.

Steve Branoff '90, a resident of Sewall, said, "I don't think the fire did really as much damage as the sprinklers." But the damage was contained to just rooms 105 and 96, he said.

"The one message I would get to the students is if you're going to burn a candle, put it into something that won't burn," Weyers said.

Winter Carnival unusually violent

Director of Security Ransom Jenks said Winter Carnival Weekend was more violent than he expected. Three fights were reported to security at parties over the weekend. Jenks said that such weekends are always difficult for security to cover adequately.

He said the amount of violence over Winter Carnival surprised him. "I have no idea why Williams College has suddenly turned into a more animalistic society," he said. "I've always had the impression that when large amounts of bottled liquor, as opposed to beer, is present, we have more problems, though it hasn't usually resulted in physical violence."

The three fights reported to security were passed on to Dean of the College Stephen Fix. One of the fights resulted in the suspension of a student for the remainder of the semester, Honor - Discipline Committee Chairperson Reinhard Wobus confirmed.

Jenks said that security officers at parties are there voluntarily and can't be forced to cover the parties. "We've been lucky so far that all off-duty officers have been willing to volunteer," he said. Such officers are paid time-and-a-half.

Jenks said that there are no plans to increase the number of officers in security for these parties.

Guerrilla Girls are Coming

Two women wearing rubber gorilla masks will speak at Williams tonight at 8:00 in Lawrence Hall. They are members of the Guerrilla Girls, an organization of anonymous female artists centered in New York City that describes itself as the "conscience of the art world."

The group attempts to raise public consciousness about gender and racial politics in the art world. By citing statistics about the number of white male artists whose work is displayed at museums around the country, the group hopes to pressure museum administrators to display more work by women and minority artists.

In November, they posted letters in the Williams College Museum of Art (WCMA) saying that 87 percent of the museum's exhibitions, projects, major purchases and borrowings since 1985 were by white male artists. The Record recently received a notice from the Guerrilla Girls listing the numbers of male, female and black artists featured in the current BIG LITTLE SCULPTURE show at WCMA. Works by fifteen men, two women and no black artists are on display, according to the notice.

Members of the organization wear masks when they lecture to preserve their anonymity. They say that they might have difficulty having their work exhibited were their identities known. The speakers at Williams will show slides, and will respond to audience questions following their talk, which is sponsored by the art department.

Final MoCA approval expected

Last Monday, the State Senate approved a $35 million bond authorization to fund the proposed Massachusetts Museum of Contemporary Art (MassMoCA). The House must now concur by a majority vote on amendments to the bill made in the Senate. If it concurs, a two-thirds vote of enactment in each legislative branch will be required to make the bill law. Berkshire legislators said that enactment could occur by the fourth week of March.

"The only issue now is when we have our next formal session," Representative Sherwood Guernsey (D-Williamstown) said in reference to when the house concurrence vote will take place. He said he expects to see a vote taken tomorrow. He also said that he feels that the bill will have sufficient support to pass with no problems in the House.

According to Senator Peter Webber (R-Pittsfield), the bill was taken up in an informal session of the Senate and was passed on voice vote. "We take up bills in informal session when it's deemed a non-controversial bill," he said. If opponents of the bill had wanted, they could have prevented approval and called for a formal vote, he said.

The House must now vote to concur with three amendments made by the Senate. Webber said that the Senate Ways and Means Committee made one amendment that clarifies the powers of the non-profit corporation that would administer MassMoCA and another that would allow the corporation to deal with state agencies to aid in capital planning. Webber added the third amendment from the floor. It stipulate the transfer of the land to the commonwealth in the case that the project is abandoned.

College Treasurer William Reed said, "We're [the college] continuing to talk at length with Sprague [Technologies Inc.] for the actual terms and conditions of the transfer [of the buildings for MassMoCA]." Sprague entered into an agreement in principle with the college last October, agreeing to donate its abandoned 28-building Marshall Street complex for the museum. The agreement officially ended in January, but Sprague officials have said they are willing to wait a reasonable length of time for the funding legislation to pass, and it seems as if they are not going to sell any of the complex buildings in the meantime.

New nightly events get Log on the roll to revitalization

by Rob Welsberg

While Williams students are well aware of the new Chandler Gymnasium and the efforts to renovate Hopkins Hall and Lasell Gym, few may have noticed a subtler transformation in progress: the beginning of a "new" Log.

Full weeks of nighttime activities at the Log are only the beginning of the change in the once-great student hangout that has been dormant for almost three years, according to Dave Lamarre, manager of the Log. Lamarre said that the Log Committee (a College Council sub-committee) and the Log's employees plan to make it a center of alternative forms of entertainment at Williams.

Bill Hilty '88, a member of the Log Committee, said that entertainment at the new Log will revolve around a new sound system purchased with funds from the College Council.

the tournament] has only some of what the new Log will be about ... the true format won't be in place until after Spring Break," he said. "After break, we'll add some professional musicians, some mellow bands so people can just hang out with friends."

Low-key

A low-key social atmosphere will be the main emphasis of the new Log, Lamarre said.

"We'll always have scheduled events, like the Octet or the Springstreeters, but we won't limit it to that. Those nights are great, but what'll be really great is when the audience isn't captive. People should feel free to move about. Singers and bands used to playing in bars expect people to move around and interact," he said. "Friends sitting around, enjoying each other's company — that's important to campus social life."

The hardest part

Hilty said that the hardest part now is getting people to set aside their natural nighttime aversion to the Log. "The biggest problem is letting people know about the new Log, to take it seriously," he said. He added that getting seniors to come will be especially difficult because they remember when the Log was first changed, effectively killing it as a student center.

And it was seniors who remained the least optimistic about the future of the Log.

Peter English '88, who said he went often to the Log as a freshman before the tightening of the alcohol policy there, said,

The biggest problem is letting people know about the new Log, to take it seriously.

"The sound system will be a lot of it. The system can be used for Open Mike night, for dances, coffeehouses ... it will be useful every night," he said.

Two weeks ago, the new Log's schedule of events began with a "games night" that featured a Pictionary tournament. Lamarre said, "This week [of

Dartmouth

Racial tension has erupted again at Dartmouth College in the past two weeks as a result of a confrontation between black music professor William Cole and four student reporters of the conservative weekly Dartmouth Review. Accounts of the Feb. 25 incident vary. Apparently, the four students confronted Cole as they were leaving his class and assaulted him verbally and possibly physically. Luzmila Johnson '88, acting chairman of the Afro-American Society, said that the reporters "grabbed Cole and held him for a good minute" while John Sutter '88 demanded that Cole apologize for allegedly slanderous remarks about Review reporters. Christopher Baldwin '89, Review editor, said that Sutter touched Cole only in passing and that Cole "jabbed both fingers into my eyes" and called the students "racist dogs." Johnson stated that Sutter said, "We have to purge this campus of incompetent niggers," a term Baldwin denies the students used. Cole and the Review, whose reporters helped destroy a campus anti-apartheid shanty two years ago, have been at odds for years. Cole filed a $2.4 million suit against the publication six years ago. Review reporters claim they have taped Cole using profanity to denigrate whites multiple times. The four reporters have been charged with harassment, disorderly conduct and violation of Cole's privacy. Baldwin said the students will deny the "malicious" charges at the hearing this week.

Haverford

Student dissatisfaction with Haverford College's Honor Code expressed itself loudly last month when, after preliminary ratification, the Honor Code was rejected. Less than the two-thirds of the student body necessary to reaffirm the Code signed cards to ratify it. Although the Code will remain in effect this semester, 1988-89 may become the Year Without an Honor Code. John Markman '89, chairman of the Honor Council, said that student concerns about the Code have been brewing for some time. The social, not academic, part of the Honor Code has been the main target of criticism. Andrew Reisman '88 said, "The social Honor Code is a farce these days — that's what we're hearing from people." Haverfordians are not exactly setting a precedent; the Honor Code was not ratified in the early 1970's, and faculty criticism of the academic Code prompted its restructuring in the early 1980's.

In Other Ivory Towers was compiled by Beth Broadrup from college papers and the Boston Globe.

Students gathered last Thursday night to dance to the music of a campus band as part of efforts to breathe new life into the Log. (Losito)

"They're trying to find a new role for the Log, but all of the roles are already filled. Dances will be better at Dodd, and movies are easier to see at a theater or with a VCR in your room."

English said that the Log which many seniors remember is gone. "Before, the Log was the place to go; there was always something to do. Everyone just would go down and hang out after studying. Now, I would just as much see them get a Laser Writer for the library [with the money used to keep the Log open]."

Katie Gerber '88 agreed that the Log of old may never come back. "[The new format] will help, but the Log certainly won't be the way it was before," she said. However, she added, "It was encouraging to see people going down to the Log; it could become an alternative place for events again. Still, I wish they'd bring back pitchers."

Lamarre said that the success of the entire project depends on the student body. "The new Log will only work if students want it to happen," he said. "We have to get people into the mindset that the Log is a place to go, so that they'll start to ask, 'What's going on at the Log?' again."

Ledoux's business is Williamstown

by Marilyn Germano

The Williamstown Municipal Building, located across Route 7 from the Greylock quad, exemplifies the close mix of town with gown here in the Village Beautiful. Once a college fraternity house that many alumni still show off to their wives on football weekends, the building now houses municipal offices, including that of Steven Ledoux, town manager.

Like many small New England towns, Williamstown does not have a mayor as the head of its government. Instead, a five-person Board of Selectmen, elected by residents, meets twice monthly to formulate the town budget, review the various town committees and attend to other business of Williamstown. Ledoux takes care of the day-to-day affairs.

"Of the five selectmen," he said, "all but one of them have full-time jobs. It's easier for them if there is a manager to take care of daily matters and keep them updated." Ledoux said the role of town manager is similar to that of mayor, with an important distinction; a town manager must be professionally trained. Ledoux himself holds a Master's degree in public administration.

Ledoux said that the municipal government of Williamstown resembles the structure of a corporation. The Board of Selectmen, he explained, is like a company's Board of Directors, the town manager is like a chief executive officer, and the members of the town are like the stockholders. Under this format, the municipal government handles the concerns of Williamstown.

As far as relations between Williamstown and Williams College, Ledoux said he feels that keeping channels of dialogue open between the two is vital.

"Basic communication is always important," said Ledoux, "because in a college town there will be tensions between the college and the town."

More than a crossroads

Progress has been made in bringing the two sides closer together. The Town-Gown Committee, for example, was specifically set up to respond to neighborhood issues like student noise on Hoxsey Street.

"People need to realize that Williams College has had a profound influence on the town," Ledoux said. "There wouldn't be much more than a crossroads here without it."

In spite of some of the complaints that have arisen because of the students living in residential areas, Ledoux said he does

Environmental issues

One of the biggest concerns facing the people of Williamstown, Ledoux said, is water storage. Williamstown now receives its water supply from a reservoir.

"However," Ledoux said, "if, by 1990, you have a surface water supply like a reservoir, you will have to treat that surface water, and the treatment is costly. We may move to water-tank storage as a means of saving some money." A possible $4 million will be spent to update the water situation in Williamstown.

Landfill and solid-waste disposal also present a problem. "We have three or four years of capacity left in our landfill," said Ledoux. "Then where do we go?" He said that the town is considering creating some sort of regional landfill, an expensive prospect, and incineration, which involves transportation and disposal problems, as two possible solutions.

Williamstown has created a growth management task force in order to determine what parts of the town would benefit the most if the town were to grow. It consists of 15 people from 6 or 7 affinity groups, representing the college, businessmen and residents.

Ledoux said that, even though the population of Williamstown has not changed, there are many more secondary homeowners in the area. "There is a real potential for growth," said Ledoux, "because people are attracted to the area. Williamstown is a nice place to be." The task force will report its recommendations for the town at an upcoming town meeting. "Hopefully," he said, "the members of the task force will have found common ground and common recommendations that will cut across all grains, that will benefit as many people as possible."

not believe that there is a need to ban off-campus housing. "Maybe what we need," he said, "is a zone specifically for off-campus housing." If student houses were confined to a certain area, Ledoux said he would be alleviated.

Spring Street is the area of Williamstown where interaction between the college and the town seems most evident. According to Ledoux, traffic on Spring Street, including numerous student cars, does present a problem. Merchants have suggested making it one-way in order to reduce the traffic flow. Before formal plans to make changes get underway, the situation will be examined carefully. Ledoux said he fears that students were required to vote. In all, 971 students voted on the amendment. It passed 857-114.

In other officer races, John Bellwoar '89 ran unopposed for the position of secretary. A run-off race will be held for the position of treasurer between Mary Ellen Sullivan, who received 430 votes, and Brad Gendell '90, who received 392 votes.

Run-off elections will be held this Thursday and Friday from 9:00 to 7:00 in Baxter Hall.

Nancy Hedeman '89, Sherwood Smith '89 and Mitch Wong '89 all won at-large seats. A run-off election for the remaining three seats will be held between Josh Becker '91, Jon Gray '90, Will Morris '89, Cathy Paper '89, Amy Scott '90, and Raj Venkatesan '91.

A run-off election will also be held to determine who will hold a two-year position as a student member of the Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibility. The run-off will be between Todd Owens '90 and John Putnam '90.

Minority run-off

Another run-off election will be held for a minority representative seat. Monique Waddell '90 won one of the seats; John Chan '91 and Keko Torres '91 will compete for the other.

For Berkshire Quad representative, there will be a run-off race between Sanand Raghunandan '90 and Ed Wiggers '90.

In other housing category races, Beth Levine '89, Dave Shatto '89, Seth Rabinowitz '89 and David Niles '89 won seats for Dodd Tyler, Greylock, Mission Park, and Row Houses, respectively. Levine, Shatto, and Rabinowitz all ran unopposed.

Run-off elections will be held for all classes to determine who will get seats left-over seats for Honor and Discipline Committee. Robert Illig '91, David Bank '90, and Blair Newton '89 won or retained seats. John Chan and Deirdre Pappalardo, from the Class of '91, will compete for a seat in a run-off. The Class of '90 seat will be filled by either Walter Hayne or Amy Steele, and Evan Davis and Marcia Toll will compete for the remaining junior class seat.

Juniors Doug Gilbert and Hal Hermanson both won seats on the Honorary Degrees Committee. Tom Bottern '89 and Leslie Jeffs '89 will participate in a run-off election for a remaining seat.

Tutorials will vary in format

by Stephanie Jones

The form of tutorials to be offered next year may turn out a bit differently than the Committee on Educational Policy (CEP) had originally expected. In examining the course package, the CEP found that some of the planned tutorials seemed to differ from what they expected. Some did not require frequent short papers, and some included midterms, final exams, or final seminar-type papers.

Professor of Economics Henry Bruton, the director of the tutorial program, attended the CEP meeting on Feb. 29 to answer questions about the form of tutorials for next year. Bruton said that the tutorials may not exactly follow the Oxford model.

A tutorial group, made up of the approximately 30 faculty members scheduled to teach tutorials next year, was formed in October and has met three times so far. According to Bruton, only two of the group members had any experience with tutorials. "We were all novices. In how to proceed, we'd have to feel our own way," he said.

The group has discussed "what is the real essence of the tutorial without which it's not a tutorial," Bruton said. They determined that it was the frequent oral presentation by a student with questioning and probing by the professor and the second student. Bruton said that the presentations did not necessarily have to be based on a paper by the student.

What about grades?

Another problem the group faced was how to grade the students. They decided that each meeting should not be graded, but agreed to allow tutors to require a final exercise. According to Bruton, the argument for some type of final exercise is that students will have prepared five to 10 presentations and should have a chance to reflect on the experience. "It does seem important, I think, to ask ourselves, 'what have we learned?'" he said. Bruton said that he did not see the same value in midterm exams and hopes to convince professors who planned them to take them out.

Professor of German Bruce

Structure and chaos

Bruton said that because he also saw danger in the absence of structure, the challenge was to find a medium between structure and chaos. He said that another problem was that the professor might monopolize the meetings. "Tutors have to listen; it's awfully hard for faculty to listen," he said.

The most serious problem, according to the CEP, is that the music department simply submitted three existing courses as tutorials, claiming that they had always been taught in that form. Professor of History John Hyde, the chairman of the CEP, said that the CEP did not consider them tutorials and would not include them in the course

New Grass Revival creates an energetic musical hybrid

by Tim Farnham

If you didn't bother to attend the hard-driving, foot-tapping, high energy show put on by the New Grass Revival last Saturday, March 5 in Chapin Hall, you missed out on a unique musical experience that does not come to the Berkshires too often.

The four-man band, consisting of a traditional Bluegrass instrumentation with banjo, mandolin, guitar and bass, plays a special brand of music that seems to elude all attempts at categorization. Their newest album release, Hold to a Dream is filled under country music, but while their roots are most definitely in bluegrass, their song selection and stylistic adaptations of everything from reggae to R & B allows them to successfully cross the boundaries of any musical level.

They kicked into the concert with several tunes well known to their fans, including their latest single "Can't Stop Now," a song that races along at about 110 miles per hour. As mandolinist Sam Bush commented, it's a song that "gives the guys in the group a chance to warm up."

It was really a chance for the medium-sized but enthusiastic audience to hear all of New Grass' greatest strengths: tight, powerful harmonies, the exciting lead vocals of bassist John Cowan, the snappy, hard-as-nails lead playing of Pat Flynn's acoustic guitar, the rhythmic, lightning-fast licks burning off of Bush's mandolin, and the ripping, musically intellectual banjo playing of Bela Fleck.

Spectrum of styles After Bush took out his fiddle for the title track to Hold to a Dream, he and Fleck ripped into "Roanoke," an old fiddle and banjo tune that moved so fast that it seemed like it might self-destruct. The two kept it together with amazing ease, however, and when Bush stepped back to allow Fleck his solo, Bela took the traditional tune into a totally different musical world. By the time Flynn and Cowan joined in, the song had woven itself into the typical New Grass sound: traditional sound wonderfully spiced with innovative influences from a spectrum of styles including jazz, blues, rock, and reggae.

The one criticism that could be levelled on the show was the disjointed quality of the set. The space in between the songs was sometimes stagnant, although Flynn's wry humor and Bush's energetic spaciness gave a pleasant, loose atmosphere to the stage.

The songs perhaps could have been more effectively ordered, taking better advantage of the group's use of a wide variety of styles. But when a group can bounce from Bob Marley's "One Love" into the decidedly bluegrass "Get in the Wind," these complaints become trivial.

Whether it was Flynn's Van Halen-esque guitar playing, or Bush's slide mandolin, or Bela's precise triplets and his ability to create sounds never before heard on a banjo, the genius of the New Grass Revival left the audience with the feeling that these musicians were taking their talents to and beyond limits never explored.

Contemporary Theatre has successful week

by Erik T. Burns and Travis Pierson

For a second year the Williams department of theatre presented a week of contemporary theatre, spotlighting both new and unusual works as well as the talents of numerous students. This year's pieces consisted of four short plays by various playwrights and four monologues by Barney Simon and different collaborators. The performances were done in repertory, with two plays and two monologues being performed each night in both the Adams Memorial MainStage and DownStage.

With many contemporary works, one is faced with the difficulty of distilling meaning from the potentially bizarre mechanics involved. The stripped-down productions consisted of often bare stages, emphasis instead being placed on characterization, physicality and complex modern themes. When successful, this theatrical minimalism can be quite compelling, but, if mishandled, it can alienate the viewer, deadening the play's impact; this year's selections fell on both sides of the minimalist fence.

First Group

The series opened on February 29, with Samuel Beckett's Quad, Friedrich Durrenmatt's The Doppelgänger, and two pieces by Simon, Men Should Cry More Often and Miss South Africa (6).

Quad, which was performed on the MainStage, is described by Beckett as "a piece for four players, light, and percussion." More closely resembling a ritualistic dance than traditional theatre, it consists of four hooded figures, who appear and disappear one-by-one at certain intervals, and walk in a square pattern, each diagonally crossing the square after completing one side. A video monitor placed in front of the audience provides an overhead view of the performers, creating a geometric abstraction of the stage's plane; the only sounds created during the piece were the shuffling of the performers' feet and a systematic wooden percussion and bell ringing from offstage. Quad resembles a Giacometti sculpture come to life, with the hooded figures deliberately walking forward and nearly hitting each other, while being totally unaware of anyone else's presence. The repetition and rhythm of the piece (designed by Carolyn Boyden), which consists of four cycles of performers entering and exiting, takes the viewer through several stages of reactions, beginning with curiosity and interest, and eventually purposely taking one through boredom to a new state of psychic interaction with it.

The second piece, The Doppelgänger, a radio play translated, adapted for the stage and directed by James Rosenberg, manages to interweave several levels of reality and theatrical process. A director (Paul McGreal) and a playwright (Richard T. Harrington) discuss a play being written, while, in back of them, the play itself, a developing meta-physical account of a man destined to commit murder (Jon Gray) and his doppelgänger (Michael Baratta) is being played out.

Mark J. Solan's excellent scenic and costume design contrasts the dream-like black and white world of the developing play with the earthy office setting of the men creating it and the flutist (Sarah Peterson) spotlighted at the side of the stage who creates the sound effects (designed by Douglas B. Hunt). The interaction between the creators and the created, especially when the director actually leaves his office and talks to the man in the play, creates a startling ambiguity between the two worlds.

The two following monologues were written by South African playwright Barney Simon, who is also the founder and Artistic Director of the Market Theatre Company in Johannesburg, as well as members of the company. Judging by the March 4 performances, Men Should Cry More Often, written by Simon and Paul Siabolepby, was probably the least successful due to its subject: a man's description of a girl being attacked by a group of dogs. Director David Eppel said, "The political implications of these works are profound because they're not on a political platform." Instead, they are "faithful reproductions of events." Unfortunately, the severe emotionalism applied to the event seemed excessive, causing it to fall flat and bathetic.

The second Simon piece (this one in collaboration with Vanessa Cooke), Miss South Africa (6), was much more affecting in its portrayal of a would-be beauty queen on the edge of sanity, reliving the glories and the horrors of her past. Central to its success was Molly Luetkemeyer's stunning performance: shifting between throwing tantrums and showing a neurotic charm, she created a multi-layered character that haunted the viewer more than any other in the plays performed.

Second group

The other set of plays, which were performed on March 1, 3 & 5 consisted of Maria Irene Fornes' The Danube, Megan Terry's Calm Down Mother, and two monologues by Simon and others, Joburg, Sis! and Monologue for Vanessa.

The Danube, a play about, as one cast member put it, "living life in forms," dealt with the rigidity and stasis of modern life by depicting characters trapped by a semantic framework, that of a structured language lesson. Under the aegis of a lush, live Hungarian overture (voice by Blake Robison) the characters, denizens of the river-split Budapest, try to achieve interpersonal intimacy and bring meaning to their lives. Ben Voorhies' direction added physical humor to the drab and restricted world, and the set, a table framed by a cold metal square strip, conceived and designed by Timothy Moore, mirrors the static nature of the Danube's environment. The play attacks the apathy of U.S. tourists (and the country as a whole) through a violent and lyrical aside delivered by Kovacs (Jason Guili), and explores love in a cage through the disrupted interaction of Paul (Howard Patlis) and Eve (Melissa Levine). James Elliot added his own special brand of physical humor as the father figure, the lovebust Mr. Sandor.

Calm Down Mother, subtitled "a transformation for three women," also deals with structure, in this instance the restrictive and deadening stereotypes placed on women by society. The play is a sort of stream-of-consciousness treatment of the female psyche, jumping from character to character and from age to age. Women are depicted as reproduction devices, as whores, as worthless old biddies, and as neurotic housewives. The three women (Guilomar Garcia, Flona Smythe, and Jennifer Whichard) move ballet-like around the performance arena (on the MainStage, surrounded by the audience) and bring their message of dehumanization and defeminization directly to the audience. Directed by Kristin Szarto, Calm Down Mother gracefully harnesses the power of confrontational theater, and through this reining-in of tension and subliminal hate, drove home the message to create an affecting and disturbing piece of theatre.

The two monologues were the weaker aspect of the night, primarily because of their content. Both Stephanie Mary Bond and George Prescott were compelling as lower-class South Africans, but the speeches themselves seemed oddly impersonal and strange, not exhibiting the universal quality that made a play like Mbongeni Ngema's Asinimali! (performed at Williams last year) so striking. A Week of Contemporary Theatre II, while consisting of a few weak moments, provided a superb, intimate showcase for Williams students and faculty and exposure for largely unknown one-act plays.

package in their present form. Bruton said, "It's not as clear what constitutes a tutorial in music as it is for English literature or philosophy." He said that he hoped to convince the music department to rethink as well as rewrite their tutorials.

Professor of English Stephen Tiff, a CEP member, said that he especially objected to the weekly lecture class meeting which was included in the music courses. He said that these would not allow the students to choose the structure of the course but would impose a structure upon them.

language practice and the formulation of a course of study in consultation with their advisors, Sleptsov said.

Middlebury professor Raymond Benson, who will direct the program, explained its development at the press conference. "The Soviets said 'make us an offer, the time may indeed have come,' and, to make a long story short ... it came to pass," Benson said.

He said the speed with which the agreement was worked out was remarkable especially because the Soviets were not that interested in exchange programs a few years ago. "Many things are changing in both countries. This was a happy coincidence of interests," he said.

The Soviets were not initially ready to allow both men and women to come to the U.S. as part of the exchange, according to Benson, but he said they eventually accepted the idea.

Most of the Soviet students in the program will have a liberal arts or social science background, although some will be engineering or medical students, Sleptsov said.

Soviet students with the best academic records and fluency in English will be chosen, he said.

Benson said the American students will be selected by the individual institutions participating in the program and must be able to speak fluent Russian and be "well-put together psychologically."

"We really want this to be for Americans who are not majoring in Russian but who speak Russian," he added. These students, he said, would hopefully go on to graduate work and a career in areas like business administration, international law, banking or diplomatic service.

Sleptsov said after the conference that there are a great many changes taking place now in the management of the Soviet economy that involve a shift from planning from above to decisions based on economic stimuli, and that the Soviet students involved in the exchange will possibly be the ones making those decisions in a few years.

Both American and Soviet participants in the program will be their third year of undergraduate study. In the Soviet system, college lasts for five years, with students specializing beginning in their fourth year. Sleptsov said Soviet students will have some catching up to do when they return to their own country because certain courses required for their diploma will not be available at institutions here.

Assistant to the President Nancy McIntire, who was also at the conference, said that Williams would expect that students spend no more than half their time working in their major field while studying in the U.S.S.R.

Off-campus housing irks Town-Gown

by Dan Skwire

In its meeting last Tuesday night, the Town-Gown Committee expressed support for college proposals on parking policy and facilities, heard concerns about off-campus housing and opened debate on a possible by-law limiting noise levels in the town.

The committee agreed with the college's suggestions to prohibit freshmen from having cars, construct new parking lots and create a shuttle service to offer students local transportation. Committee member Dagmar Bubrski, a resident of Williamstown, felt additional measures could be taken, however. Complaining of mid-day congestion from student parking on Spring Street, Bubrski said, "I don't see any reason for any student to have a car on the Williams campus. I think we can ban cars for more than just freshmen."

Associate Professor of Mathematics Olga Beaver, a member of the college's parking committee, defended the college's decisions by pointing out that many students need cars to travel to and from the campus at breaks. "This campus is very isolated," she said. "Besides, I don't think students use their cars as much as we think they do."

Let 'em walk

Bubrski proposed eliminating the parking problem on Spring Street by prohibiting students from parking there at all. Director of Security Ransom Jenks, who was present to report on student parking problems, objected, saying, "I don't think we can treat [students] any different from other people." Bubrski replied, "They can walk."

The committee had no quarrel with the school's proposal to establish a shuttle service around campus and into North Adams, but they did suggest that the college might contact one of the local bus lines to suggest providing some regular transportation to Albany.

The issue of off-campus housing had been referred back to the Town-Gown Committee after brief review by the Town Planning Board. Committee member James Kolesar, Williams director of public information, began the debate by asserting that the committee's function was not to initiate town policy, but merely to serve as a forum for communication between the college and the community.

"It is inappropriate for policy affecting all townspeople to be initiated by an appointed rather than an elected body," Kolesar claimed. Bubrski disagreed, accusing him of "throwing up roadblocks" in the committee's proceedings.

Compromise reached

Selectman J. O'Brien Locke, who chairs the committee, offered a compromise by saying that he could report the details of the discussion to the Board of Selectmen at their March 14 meeting without making any concrete proposals. Both Kolesar and Bubrski agreed with the suggestion.

Several townspeople expressed concerns about students living off-campus. Gene Barry of 36 Thomas St. complained about changes on his street, presumably caused by a group of students who are renting a house at 23 Thomas St.

"We used to have a nice, quiet neighborhood," he said. "All of a sudden, Williams College students move in and it's all over. Isn't there any defense to letting a business move into a residential community?"

Town Planner Donna Wied pointed out that according to town by-laws, the use of property for student homes is considered residential and not business activity.

In an interview later in the week, Kolesar mentioned the college's plan to build another upper-class dormitory in the near future. "Most probably, there will be on-campus, apartment-type housing for students in upcoming years." He was unwilling, however, to speculate on the effect such a building would have on the number of students living off-campus.

In other business, the committee agreed to submit a copy of a Normal, Illinois law restricting local noise levels to the Board of Selectmen for consideration as a Williamstown by-law.

However, several students and junior advisors currently living in single-sex entries voiced opposition to making more entries co-ed. "That [the bathroom situation] would just annoy me," said Cinnamon Stephens '91, who lives in Fayerweather 3. "I don't really think of us as a single-sex entry. The guys below us are always coming up and hanging out ... we're far from cloistered."

Anthony Fuller '89, a junior advisor in Sage A, said, "I think a lot of camaraderie comes out of it [a single-sex entry]. Guys have a good time together ... In the early part of the year, the guys were a lot more open. It was easier for me as a JA to get to know them."

"At first I didn't like it with all girls," said Heidi Zimmerman '91, who lives in Sage F. "But now I feel really close to the girls in my entry. I think a lot of co-ed entries aren't as close as we are."

"Freshmen should be afforded the opportunity to live in single-sex entries if they choose," said Jeff Miller '91, who lives in Sage A. "The people who do go through the experience consider it a valuable one."

Whatever plan is decided upon, at least two single-sex entries, one male and one female, will remain next year, Edwards said.

CC acts as rubber stamp

by Bill Savadove

President Carter Zinn '88 agreed to adjourn last Thursday's College Council meeting after it reached the hour and a half time mark. During that meeting, the council discussed criticism about "rubber stamping," funding for The Record and budget guidelines. The one vote that was taken, concerning Record funding, will have to be voted on again because a quorum was not present.

This is the second time within a month that the council has lacked a quorum for a vote. In an interview, Zinn said he was frustrated by the lack of attendance. There are 38 voting members on the council.

Twenty-six members, or two thirds, are needed for a quorum. Zinn cited other commitments by council members and the fact that his administration is winding down as reasons for the problem. He added that the solution lies in making council members realize their commitment, and getting them excited about what the council is doing as a body.

Rubber stamp?

Zinn began the meeting by addressing recent criticism from members that the council has become a rubber stamp in the last two months. Zinn said the criticism was accurate, but "the rubber stamp approach is the only way we could have gotten things done." He added that the council had passed several pieces of new legislation including budget guidelines, an amendment for sophomore representation, new rules governing elections, funding for the Log, and funding for The Issue. "I think we can look back and see that we actually got something done in the last two months."

The council moved on to discuss the amount of money that should be paid to The Record for an election advertisement that ran on pages seven and eight in the March 1 issue. The advertisement contained candidates' platforms and the text of an amendment to the council constitution.

The council also debated proposed standing rules on budget allocations. Until now there have been no standing rules concerning how funds will be requested and allocated. Debate centered on who should work with an organization in the case of a supplementary budget request, the council as a whole or the Finance Committee. When the meeting ended, the problem was still unresolved. This Thursday, discussion will continue and the rest of the proposed budget guidelines will be presented. The council will also discuss election committee guidelines, parking, and the Division III survey. It will be the last College Council meeting in Zinn's administration.

and Junior Mike Masters each chipped in 10.6 per outing, giving the Ephs four starters in the double digit range. The squad's balanced scoring is further evidenced by Mike Butler '90, Dave Morrison '90, and Than Healy '91, who all averaged over seven points per game.

Press prevails

That the Ephs outscored their opponents by almost five points a game can be attributed to several factors. Obviously, the Ephs were a good team, but what made them even better was their pressing defense.

"We are not a great offensive team, so we wanted to pick up the tempo," Sheehy said. "The press allowed us to get some easy points."

The strong defense also contributed to the Ephmen's solid rebounding, a category in which the team also outperformed their opponents. Melchionni, at only 6'2", led the team with 10 rebounds per game. Healy was second with 7 rpg, and Major hauled down 6.4 boards a game from his point guard position.

The squad fared well from the field, shooting 61 percent for the season, 40 percent from behind the 19'9" stripe. Sheehy credited good execution for this success, especially considering the team's inexperience. "We executed well enough to get good leads in most of our games." But the inexperience and youth led to "poor execution at crunch time" and a couple of losses.

All-Stars

One high note for the season was the inclusion of both Major and Melchionni on post season All-Star lists. Major was selected to the second team All New England and first team All NESAC, as well as being placed on ECAC Honor Roll three times this season. To go along with his player of the week award, Melchionni was named to the second team All NESAC squad.

Defectors downed

The team enjoyed special gratification when it resuracted itself from the dead and clawed back into Little Three contention by defeating both rivals, thereby avenging earlier season defeats. The Ephs were impressive in both victories, especially in the Amherst game, when they convincingly subdued the Jeffs in their own gym.

It's tempting to assume that next year's team will enjoy huge success, as the whole starting five and top eight return. But the coach is only "guardedly optimistic" about next season. Leaving it up for grabs, Sheehy said, "We don't even know how good we can be." The bet here is that when they find out, look out Amherst.

In The Spotlight...

The women's squash team suffered through a disappointing national championship tourney at Dartmouth last weekend. Senior captain Jeanne Clappse made it to the round of 16 in the consolation bracket before exiting. Second player Allison Buckner '89 could reach only the second round, while number three Lisa Brayton '91 and fourth stroker Lorri Schaeen were both eliminated after two matches.

Clappse's finish marks the end of her Williams career where she twice finished in the top twelve squash players in the nation, receiving All-American honors in her sophomore and junior years. Next year's team should be able to improve on this year's 6-8 finish as only Clappse, sixth player Sopit Poosanakhom and ninth player Christine Boddicker will be lost to graduation.

Jim Duquette's team came back from a 33-26 halftime deficit to win the first game of the best-of-three Sunday Night Basketball League finals, 59-53 over the Gladden Garys.

The Garys came out surprisingly strong in the first half, staking a seven point halftime lead despite missing key players. They were unable to hold off the hard-charging troops of Duquette in the second stanza. Basketball coach Harry Sheehy paced the winning squad, scoring 19 points, followed by 12 each from Duquette and assistant football coach Gary Pfaff.

The second game of the series, a new playoff format this year, is tonight in Chandler Gymnasium.

Bill Melchionni '89 successfully defended his slam dunk crown with several spectacular, rim-rattling stuffs. Holding off challengers (and teammates) Dave Morrison '90, Than Healy '91, and Jeff Miller '91, Melchionni opened with a "monkey" jam, in which he grabbed the rim as he flew by and stuffed the ball in the other side.

On the dunk which won the contest for the high-flying junior, he bounced the ball high and grabbed it as it sailed toward the hoop and slammed it through. Melchionni impressed the crowd with flashier dunks than his competitors, but shoddy judging kept the contest close.

Hockey—

Both the 5-3 win over North Adams and the 6-5 decision over Salem State featured the Ephs bringing a lead into the closing minutes only to have their opponents mount a comeback. Both times, however, the Ephs tightened up and closed the door on any comeback hopes.

Strong nucleus

Looking to next year, Coach Bill McCormick can count on a strong nucleus of returning players to build around. The top scorers all return again: Ron Van Belle '90 (21 goals, 18 assists), Sean Seguin '91 (8g, 17a), Frechette (9g, 13a). One can only guess how far the newly formed line of Putnam, Seguin, and Van Belle can go. Formed halfway through the season, the trio immediately caught fire, far outpacing any other line. Playing a full season together, this line could really be something to watch.

The biggest question mark for next year will be in goal. Senior Mark Morrison came up big for the squad this year, winning seven games against five losses with less than 3.5 goals against average. Sophomore Sean Ford and freshman Matt Zolin both showed promise this year, but it remains to be seen whether either of them can do the goal-tending chores effectively next season.

Work ethic

"We had a work ethic like I've never seen. Our practices before the last games were very intense," commented veteran coach McCormick. He was equally excited about next year's prospects.

In addition to his strong crop of returning players, McCormick said he has his eye on some bright recruits. "We're not losing a lot of seniors (captain Dave Caswell, Morrison, Chris Pachus, and Tim Yarter), but we still (hope to get some strong recruits). We want to have people looking over their shoulders."

Eleven skiers make NCAA's

by James Lee

In a shower of excellent individual performances, five Eph skiers qualified for the NCAA national Division I championships, and both the men's and women's teams finished fourth at the Eastern Intercollegiate Ski Championships hosted by the University of New Hampshire last weekend.

With the six skiers who already qualified, Williams now has an 11-member ski team to represent her at the national championships.

For the Ephwomen, it was down to the wire with Middlebury and Dartmouth for second place. After Saturday morning's races, the Ephs stood points ahead of both of their competitors. The lead failed to stand, however, as the Ephwomen could produce only two finishers in the slalom event on Saturday afternoon.

For the Ephmen's cross country team, however, the weekend was a triumphant one. The Eph team captured second place in both the individual and the relay races and witnessed outstanding performances by its individual members. Both Kirsten Hansen '91 and Ann Bokman '91 raced well, capturing 6th (NCAA qualifying) and 12th place respectively.

Led by Freshman Amy Beliveau's NCAA qualifying 7th, the Ephwomen's alpine team captured a 4th place in the giant slalom. In Saturday's slalom, however, the team did not fare well, as only Omiand (9th) and Monika Kopp '89 (18th).

"I am really pleased with the men," said Head Coach Bud Fisher of his Ephmen, who produced three more qualifiers for the NCAA championships.

Both Pete Milliken '90 and Mac Nash '88 qualified for the championships, finishing 5th and 12th in the individual races while Charles Kaplan '89 took eighth in the slalom to qualify. Fisher praised Milliken's performance as "one of the best finishes by any Ephman in cross country [in recent years]."

"I complement everyone on a great season. We now hope to finish within the top 10 teams in the championships," said Fisher, noting that the top 20 teams from the nation will be competing at Middlebury this week.

Chestnut leads squash to 10th

"The most amazing tournament of my life" was the way number one squash player and recently named All-American Wendell Chestnut '88 described this weekend's Intercollegiate national squash tournament at Princeton.

Chestnut had the most successful tournament of the six Ephs, making it to the quarterfinals of the consolation bracket before bowing out. En route to the round of eight, Chestnut beat the recent Canadian national champion in a five game thriller decided in the fifth game, 19-17 (5-4 in the tiebreaker). His final match was also a five game affair, with Chestnut's opponent mounting an stunning comeback to take the match 3-2.

Robby Hallagan '89, Dana Weeder '88, Pier Friend '88 and Doug Gilbert '89 all made it to the round of 32 in the consolation. The squad finished tenth at the tournament, which was won by host Princeton.

Frosh lead women swimmers

In the early 1980's Williams dominated the meet behind All-Americans Liz Jex '83 and Kim Ekrich '85, but disappointing recruiting and production from the present junior and senior classes combined with construction of new facilities by rivals Bowdoin and Amherst (fourth place) have levelled the balance of power. Still, Williams' new pool and the squad's heavily underclass composition bode well for the future.

Freemer, Lebeau, MacEachern, Schroeder, and Vandevenne should improve on last year's unusually low finish at nationals when competing at Emory University in Atlanta this weekend. Whitaker, Davis, Broudy, and Allison Furniss '91, hundredths off the national standard in the 400 IM, form a second tier of women nearing national caliber.

Graduating captain Suz MacCormack, who has seen the New England meet improve markedly in her four years, hopes for a class of '92 equal to the previous two years, which should make Williams a good bet to retain its Little Three championship and regain the New England crown when the meet makes its debut at Williams' Chandler AC pool next year.

Men's basketball denied a chance to defend title

by Michael K. Harrington

"I think the whole team feels that we could have done a little more, but we all appreciate what we accomplished," Coach Harry Sheehy said, reflecting on his squad's up and down 13-9 season.

The Ephmen surprised many by notching thirteen wins, but youth and untimely inexperience led to six losses by a margin of 5 points or less, including two double OT thrillers. The team was also deprived the chance to defend their ECAC title, barely missing a bid to the eight team tourney. The Ephs, however, did manage to revive themselves in time to gain a three-way tie for the Little Three.

Offensively, the Ephs were led all year by the guard tandem of Garcia Major '90 and Bill Melchionni '89. Major started slowly, but a 47 point performance versus North Adams paved the way for a spectacular season, as he averaged 21 per contest. Melchionni finished the season in fine fashion, scoring 130 points in a four game stretch that earned him ECAC player of the week honors. The junior wound up the season with a 17 ppg. clip.

New attitude fosters optimism for hockey

by Ted Hobart

"Those last two games showed that we're a playoff caliber team," claimed junior Will Putnam in assessing the late season resurgence of the pucksters. Putnam was one of a number of members of the class of 1989 who have re-emerged as the scoring and motivational leaders of this team, which should promise a bright future.

At 18-14, the squad did improve on last year's seven win mark but still did not live up to its potential. "It was a disappointing season," said junior assistant captain Chris Conway, adding, though, "A lot of positive things happened as well."

Bright spots

Among the things that Conway mentioned as positive were that the team's attitude and morale improved toward the season's end, improved defensive play, and the improved play of the freshmen, particularly the defensemen.

The Ephs did play tough

Women's hoops fall to Jeffs in NIAC's

by Jim McDermott

The women's basketball team found their first NIAC tournament appearance since 1981 bittersweet. The Ephs, who hosted the tournament and entered it as the first seed, looked impressive in defeating Wheaton by 28 on Saturday night but fell to Amherst in Sunday's championship game, 61-50.

Wheaton grabbed an early lead against the Ephs' 2-1-2 defense, but soon faded. Missy Crouchley '89, who led the Ephs in the first half with 10 points, tied the score at 19 apiece on a lay-up follow and stretched the lead to 23-19 on a fast break lay-up and two free throws. Rebecca Borden '91 chipped in eight first half points and Chrissy Cadigan '91 had six on the way to a halftime lead of 36-26.

Cadigan scored seven straight points to open the half and lift the Ephs to a 43-28 lead. Crouchley and Nancy Hedeman '89 teamed for five more quick points to put the game out of Wheaton's reach with only five minutes gone in the half. Wheaton threw in a full court man-to-man with ten minutes left but the Ephs' 64-44 lead proved insurmountable.

Fall behind Jeffs

The Ephs fell behind Amherst early also, and trailed by 13 points with 4:51 left in the first half. Amherst's aggressive, denying man-to-man defense kept the Ephs' offense in disarray and gave the Jeffs control of the boards. Williams rallied near the end of half to pull to within three points.

The Ephs stormed out to a brief one point lead on two foul shots by Hedeman at the opening of the second half, but Amherst quickly knotted the score at 39 all and Williams started to fade. The Jeffs jumped out to an eight point lead by picking up the intensity on defense and trying to deny Cadigan and Hedeman the ball while hitting the boards on offense.

The Ephs, down 51-44, switched to a man-to-man with about four minutes left. The

Ephwoman Rebecca Borden '91 and Amherst's star junior Liz Garner battle it out under the boards in last Sunday's NIAC championship game, which the Jeffs won, 61-50. (Scala)

Jeffs made good on six straight free throws in the final minutes to widen the final margin to 61-50.

Hedeman closed out her record breaking season with 14 points and twelve rebounds. Crouchley had 13 points and four steals and Cadigan contributed 10 points. Meg Brown had twelve rebounds and Kim Hatch '88 led the Ephs in assists with three. Borden rejected three Amherst players to lead the team in blocks.

Tie record

The Ephs' 18 season wins tie a school record for women's basketball victories that was set in 1978. Beside the second place in the NIAC tournament, the Ephs also shared Little Three title honors with Amherst.

Hedeman closed out the season averaging 17.5 points and 13.1

rebounds per game to lead the Ephs in both categories. Her rebounding total ranks tenth in the nation. Cadigan was second in both scoring and rebounding with 13.9 points and 6.8 rebounds per game. Crouchley was third in scoring with 12.9 points per game and ranks second in the nation in free throw percentage with 83.3 percent. Hatch led the team in assists with 3.7 ppg.

Chances are good that the Eph's most successful season in recent memory will be improved upon next year. Hatch and Joyce Rogers, the team's point guard tandem, will be lost to graduation, as will Abby Burbank, but the Ephs are basically a young team. Hedeman, Crouchley, and Julia Beasley will return for senior seasons. Borden, Cadigan, and Brown, all freshmen, will return to play an even greater role next year.

Women swimmers place third at New England Championship

by Kurt Oeler

Freshman Dore Lebeau led Williams to a third place finish at the Division III Women's New England Swimming Championships held February 26-28. Injuries and inexperience held the Eph's total to 994 points, short of host Bowdoin's 1182 and Tuft's 1048.

Filling the role of graduated All-American backstroke Joan Horgan, Lebeau emerged from the wide open field to win the 50 and 100 back and finish second in the 200. Her times in the latter two events earned her a trip to the national championships.

Classmate Lee Schroeder, slowed by a preliminary swim injury, still managed to finish second in the 50 and sixth in the 100.

Michelle Freemer, who like Schroeder was insured a trip to the nationals before the meet, entered the grueling "Iron Cross" events (500, 1650 and 400 IM) and emerged with two thirds and a sixth. Caron Whitaker '91, nursing an injured shoulder which hindered her throughout the meet, finished fourth in the 1650, narrowly missing nationals, despite suffering a dislocation during the race.

Anne MacEachern '90 earned her first trip to the nationals with strong swims in the 100 (fifth) and 200 breaststroke (eighth) and also scored in the 50 breast (fourth) and 100 IM (fifth). Diver Kathia Vandevenne '91 added two second place finishes in the one and three meter competition, narrowly missing a low board win due to a failed dive.

Relays romp

Heavy relay scoring kept Williams in the hunt until the final day. Lebeau, in a national qualifying leadoff split, Connie Davis '90, MacEachern, and Schroeder won the 200 free relay, setting a New England record with their finals win (1:39.81), while the 400 free relay, with Lebeau, Davis, Freemer, and Schroeder finished second. The foursome of Lebeau, MacEachern, Berne Broudy '90 and Schroeder added two more seconds in the 200 and 400 medley relays.

Coach Samuelson, pleased with the women's gritty performance, noted, "The meet this year was the fastest it's ever been," implying the small Williams contingent surprised many with their performance.

Oakley pledges to improve hiring

by Scott J. O'Callaghan

In a written response to demands from a group of 24 minority students, College President Francis Oakley said last week that the college will take a number of steps to improve the college's affirmative action program.

Oakley said the college will establish a committee to search for minority faculty in the sciences, start a program to help the psychology department recruit minority faculty, try to establish a post-baccalaureate internship at Williams for a minority student and work with the Black Student Union to create a memorial for the late Professor Michael Knight '77 in Adams Memorial Theatre.

Oakley also said the college will maintain its support of two Bolin Fellows per year and refer curricular changes suggested by the group to the Campus Commission on Race Relations and the Afro-American Studies Committee.

Germaine Belle '89, a member of the group, said that demands included the appointment of a minority person to the office of assistant to the president for affirmative action and requiring students to take one course in minority history and/or culture for graduation.

Could include any course

Belle said that the course in minority history or culture could include any course currently offered which would focus on that issue.

The list of demands, delivered to Oakley and Dean of the College Stephen Fix on March 4, is the most recent in a series of private letters and all-campus mailings issued within the past several weeks on affirmative action.

Members of the group met briefly with the president last Monday, March 7. At that point, Oakley gave his written response to the group and asked several questions to clarify the group's intentions. According to Director of Public Information James Kolesar, the meeting lasted several minutes. He said that it was more of a presentation than a discussion.

Negotiations between the administration and the group are still underway regarding the matter of the assistant to the president. Because of this, members of the group refused further comment, saying that they would be afraid to jeopardize their efforts.

Since Oakley's response, four representatives of the group,

Sean McPherson '88, Farhan Haq '89, Kevin Hinton '89 and Ajit Menon '88 issued an all-campus mailing last Friday that questioned the college's commitment to minority issues and described what the group they represent is doing to clarify that commitment.

The mailing called the college's commitment "vague at best" and "transparent" because of the fact that discussion only occurs after student pressure or a crisis occurs and cannot effectively deal with root issues. It states that the group will continue to inform the students of the progress they make.

McPherson said that the group decided it needed to address the issue starting with the top of the administration. As far as existing mechanisms for change on campus go, he said, "We really don't think these things have been doing an adequate job." He called the committees which review such concerns "clogged."

Dissatisfied with status

"As a group, we're dissatisfied with the status of minority recruitment and minority hiring here," McPherson said. He

Brzezinski sees no end to Mid-East conflict

by Debbie Snyder

Zbigniew Brzezinski served as the National Security Advisor to President Carter from 1977-81. In this capacity he was involved with the Camp David agreements between Egypt and Israel. He recently visited Jerusalem to attend a conference and to talk to Israeli political leaders, including Foreign Minister Shimon Peres. Before lecturing to a Williams audience on Monday, March 7 (see article on page 4), Brzezinski spoke with the Record about the current conflict in the West Bank.

Record: What is the likelihood of the current conflict in the West Bank escalating into a full-fledged war?

Brzezinski: The chances in the near future are very limited. None of the Arab parties have the capacity to wage a full-fledged war. This does not mean that the conflict will fade away.

Record: If the conflict worsened, would Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir reverse or at least soften his resistance to negotiating a peace plan?

Brzezinski: His attitude toward the peace plan doesn't depend on riots. It depends very much on the Arab reaction and how the U.S. expresses itself. If the Arabs reject the peace plan, Shamir will be off the hook, and he can make some noises about how he supports the peace plan. If the Palestinians were to be persistent, he'd have to make a choice. He does not wish to trade land. His party believes that eretz yisrael is an historical part of Palestine. It's an integral part, a fundamental part.

Record: How willing are the Egyptian and Jordanian governments to enter into negotiations with Israel?

Brzezinski: The Egyptians are inclined to be accommodating but their involvement is not too great. They are not an affected party as far as the West Bank is concerned, and they have made it very clear that they have no particular desire to be saddled with the problem of Gaza. Their attitude is benign, but not central. The Jordanian attitude is much more central and much more ambivalent. They'd like some progress on the issue to be made, but they are afraid of being saddled. The Palestinians want nothing short of independent statehood. The Syrians are interested in the recovery of the Golan Heights, but they ought to realize that the Israelis are not ready to deal on the subject of the Golan Heights, and that gives the Syrians an immediate reason for objecting and obstructing.

Record: How willing are the PLO and the Israeli government to negotiate with each other?

Brzezinski: It's unclear with the extent of the Israeli objection to negotiating with the PLO if that objection is derived from a genuine objection or from a desire not to negotiate at all. The fact is that some Israelis at least feel that if they refuse to negotiate with the PLO they are able to say "We would like to negotiate, but not with the PLO."

Local teen succeeds in big-time politics

by Gillian Lippert

It may be hard to imagine a city councilman who is also a freshman at North Adams State, a soon-to-be T.V. show host and a county commissioner candidate. This person actually exists, and his name is Paul Babeu.

Babeu first became involved in city politics as a high school senior, when he challenged the North Adams City Council's proposed pay raises for the councilmen. He passed a petition of protest among the citizens of North Adams and received 1200 signatures in four days.

"The people really rallied behind me," Babeu said. He said he thinks that the people of the town were struck by his youth and his interest in politics. His involvement in the protest received coverage from local media. The press followed Babeu's political career closely, covering his nomination announcement, the progress of his campaign and now his actions as a councilman.

Babeu decided to run for the city council in the middle of his senior year at high school. He announced his decision in front of tape recorders and television cameras. He campaigned actively, distributing bumper stickers and literature in door-to-door visits to the voters. He won the election by a decisive margin.

"I couldn't believe it for weeks after," Babeu said. "I'm still trying."

Despite his election, Babeu is still on the campaign trail. He has just announced his candidacy for a seat on the Berkshire

Counsel for the Council

It provides four of the best resume-pads the college has to offer. It makes a good beat for Record cub reporters. And it functions as the most effective medium through which students can examine and change major processes at Williams. If College Council doesn't immediately come to mind, it's because the last description, unfortunately, doesn't fit.

Ideally, the council should serve as a place where student concerns with respect to the widest range of issues could be discussed and methods for action decided. The previous administration certainly addressed a variety of issues, from women's sports to Division III course requirements. But the choice and treatment of those issues were frequently superficial.

A council investigation into minority hiring resulted in a mailing explaining how students could place more pressure on academic departments through students liaison committees. Compare that to the actions of 24 students this week demanding concrete action on the part of the administration for affirmative action. Those 24 students caused more change in one week than the council caused in a year.

The council's lack of imagination stifles a potentially influential student voice in the major decisions at Williams. Instead of focusing on ways to pressure the administration on hiring issues, it devoted energy to incremental change and acceptance of bureaucratic limitations.

One obvious counter-argument is that students who want to influence decisions that affect the institution as a whole can serve on student-faculty committees such as the CEP or Committee on Priorities and Resources. Students who sit on these committees, however, tend to state agreement with faculty members, and their input usually consists of minor exchanges with faculty like, "What is the student view of all this?"

The College Council, which consists solely of students, can function as a forum for student concerns, not only about student life but also concerns about the nature of college policies and the role of the college in the surrounding community. But most of all, the council can work outside of the bureaucratic constraints that the administration and faculty contend are the main hindrances to serious change at the college.

The College Council possesses tremendous potential to serve as a body that could coalesce student interest independent of the concerns that face the administration. The new council can fulfill this potential not only by selecting important issues but also by trying to make fundamental changes in relation to those issues.

WHERE THE PURPLE COWS ROAM

The Record will suspend publication for three weeks because of spring break. The next issue will be April 12.

Letters

Peck should keep donations in U.S.

To the Editor:

The article, "Peck Brings Surplus Equipment to Nicaragua," that appeared in the Record two weeks ago brought to light a disturbing problem. Namely, that while public schools throughout American cities are struggling to field athletic teams and programs, we are sending useful equipment to other nations.

Sure, the materials sent are being put to good use, but shouldn't we, America's institutions of higher learning, first take care of America's less advantaged?

New York City schools, still reeling from the budget cuts of the 1970's, cannot afford j.v. or intramural teams. There is also a correlation between the public school dropout rate and the lack of quality athletic activities offered. New York's dropout rate is close to 45%.

While the possibilities for public school students to find recreational activities vanishes, drugs and other forms of self-destruction multiply.

No, it doesn't bother me to imagine Nicaraguans juggling soccer balls while wearing Ephraim Swim Team sweat-suits. But yes, it does bother me to see young kids with nothing to do standing on the street corner at three in the afternoon, simply because their high school could not afford a soccer ball.

Maybe our priorities need re-examining.

What is the role of the Chaplain?

To the Editor:

While on my way out of Baxter the other day, I decided to stop by the bulletin board outside of the Chaplain's office to see in what way I might be spiritually enriched. "Central American Awareness Month" blared forth from the board. Being interested in such issues along with religion, I decided to take a closer look. Clearly, the Chaplain opposes the Reagan policy of U.S. involvement in the region. It was made quite obvious from the buttons dotting the bulletin board. One reads, "Don't blame me, I'm from Minnesota." Clever.

After pondering the contents of the board for some time, a question crept up on me. Who cares? Who cares if the Chaplain of Williams College does not like Ronald Reagan or his policy in Central America? As an American, she certainly has a right to her opinion. But, as Chaplain of Williams College, does she have the right to impose her political beliefs on us, the students, as views in some way more morally lofty than others?

The display implies support for the Contras is immoral and that the President's support for them is the same. Indeed, let us stand behind a regime that has killed thousands of Mesquito Indians and suppresses the God-given rights of the people. Oh, if I could be so moral! This political issue is, by no means, morally black and white. In fact, the moral leader of Nicaragua, Cardinal Obando y Bravo, is a key sympathizer to the Contra cause.

The implications of this display are far-reaching. Imagine, if you will, a conservative chaplain plastering his or her office door with posters calling for prayer in public schools or decrying Peer Health's distribution of condoms to the school community. A shout of anger and dismay would arise from the common rooms and bedrooms of the Williams community nearly reaching the Kingdom of the Lord.

Let us hope that, in the future, the Chaplain would remember the words of Jesus Christ, "Render unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's, and to God the things that are God's." As Chaplain, this is her job. It's time to stop using the Chaplain's office as a platform for the political views of its occupant. Let's stop it now.

The sexism of single-sex entries is an irony at a coed Williams

by Andrew Seligsohn '89

As the Williams Record reported in its March 8 issue, 162 members of the class of 1991 currently live in single sex entries, while only 10 members of the class requested single-sex housing. Clearly, we have more single-sex entries on this campus than we need. But, more disturbingly, I believe that we have more single-sex entries than we can tolerate. The existence of single-sex entries at a college with a stated commitment to coeducation is both ironic and harmful.

The irony of single-sex entries becomes particularly striking when one considers the rationale behind their continued presence at Williams. They are perpetuated in order to provide a choice for students coming to Williams. No freshmen, the argument goes, should be forced to live in coeducational housing. This position is, at best, quite odd. To begin with, as an unsophisticated statistical analysis shows, there are not very many people who want to live in single-sex entries. While the idea of maximizing choice has a certain amount of credibility, the practice of housing more than thirty percent of each freshman class in single-sex entries has none. Moreover, as Director of Admissions Philip Smith pointed out, many freshmen who requested coed housing are currently living in single-sex entries.

The current housing policy, then, hardly seems to be giving freshmen the type of housing they really want. I believe that this is only the beginning of the problem. For two reasons, I believe that it is essential that single-sex entries be eliminated. The first reason is that they run contrary to the spirit of coeducation. The administration of Williams College has long recognized the critical role which freshmen entries play in the education of students. For better or worse, many of the attitudes, perceptions, beliefs and habits of Williams students are shaped during their freshman year in the context of their entry. That is one of the reasons why Williams students take such pride in this "diversity." Students learn from other students, especially those with whom they must live. The most important reason for coeducation is that men and women can and should learn from each other. Freshmen who live in single-sex entries are denied the opportunity and the challenge of learning to understand and accept the views of people of a different gender.

The second reason for the elimination of single-sex entries is that all-male entries often develop the characteristics of miniature fraternities in which sexism and homophobia are rife. The objectifying terms in which women are usually discussed is similar to those used in many other all-male situations. But most men usually have to answer for these views at some time. Residents of all-male entries often spend much of their time in all-male situations where misogynistic statements normally go unchallenged and often meet with approval and concurrence. Whereas male residents of coed entries usually undergo a process of enlightenment during freshman year, the sexist views of residents of single-sex entries often become more entrenched. And these views translate into action. On Halloween, for example, residents of one all-male entry dressed as "anarchists." Many of them had slogans advocating violence against women painted on their clothing. I realize that they intended this as some sort of a joke, but I suspect that the humor was lost on women who live in fear of the reality of rape and domestic violence. In a coed entry, these men would have met with opposition if they tried to make an entry activity out of organized misogyny.

But it is still the case that eliminating single-sex entries altogether would prevent some freshmen, even if only very few, from living in the kind of housing they desire. How, then, should the wishes of these students figure in housing policy? There are certain kinds of requests that the college refuses to grant. For example, if a white student who wanted to avoid close interaction with people of other races requested to be in a single-race entry, this request would be denied, and would probably be regarded as offensive by most Williams College students. Why, then, do we view the desire to avoid close interaction with people of a different gender as acceptable? The reasons given are usually vague and often rely on unrealistic fears about bathroom encounters and towel-clad walks to the shower. Sometimes, they invoke heterosexual arguments justifying the desire to avoid the tension of living with potential sexual partners. But, when compared with the dangers of single-sex housing, these arguments are not particularly compelling.

One JA in an all-male entry said that he enjoyed the "camaraderie" that had developed in his entry. I sympathize with his love of friendship. But, as this college recognized more than 25 years ago, when camaraderie turns into fraternity, it is time to make a change.

Andrew Seligsohn is a JA in East 1.

Banning single-sex entries would end experience many value highly

by Tony Fuller '89
and John Servin '89

It is 1988, and Williams has been a coeducational school for almost 20 years, so why are there still single-sex entries at this college? What is the point if in their sophomore year every Williams student will be in a coed dorm anyway? It also seems that virtually all of the incoming freshmen don't request single-sex entries. Wouldn't it be the simplest and most beneficial course of action to abolish those antiquated capsules of the past? As past freshmen and current JA's in an all-male entry we recognize the necessity of maintaining the present system and appreciate the benefits of single sex living.

Freshmen year we were initially disappointed to have been placed in an all-male entry having both requested coed living. We anticipated an unnatural living environment, isolation from the mainstream freshman social scene and alienation from developing close female relationships. Our experience, however, proved quite the opposite. Solid friendships immediately formed and close accessibility to coed entries provided strong ties to men and women outside of the entry. We found the experience so worthwhile that we chose an all-male entry over coed living. The freshman entry and the junior advisor system is a unique and efficient one in introducing and integrating the incoming freshman class into the Williams community, and single-sex entries play an important role in that process.

Everyone knows what a big deal it is making the transition to college dorm life from high school home life. This transition can be made more easily and comfortably in the environment of a singlesex entry. As JA's in an all-male entry this year (obviously we can only comment from the all-male perspective), we recognized this immediately. The men seemed down to earth and relaxed around each other right away. In our first meeting they were all up front about their wishes to be in a coed entry; and we emphasized that our situation was not an isolated one, that there were women living next door, down the hall and across the quad. We made it clear that living in an all-male entry would not hinder their accessibility to socialize with freshmen women.

It has been our experience that single-sex entries can become a closer and more tight knit group than some coed entries simply because people share a similar perspective; male/female barriers are eliminated thereby allowing entrymates to be candid and open with one another. Potential problems are eliminated such as JA-freshman relationships within the entry which could alienate some members.

While we support the current system of coed entries intermixed with single-sex entries, we do recognize the need for some change. First of all we found that many incoming freshmen had little understanding of the freshmen entry system. In fact, a number of the freshmen in our entry had no knowledge of the JA system and the concept of "entry" not only as living quarters, but as a personal, academic and social base. While they may have been disappointed at first, we believe that they now appreciate the value of single-sex living. There is a need to inform incoming freshmen about the different living experiences at Williams. Secondly, we feel that the freshman quad is the best environment for single sex entries simply because of building structure. In all the entries, whether coed or single-sex, each is immediately accessible to the others. In Sage A, although it is all-male, female suites immediately adjoin many of the rooms. When entries are organized by floor, however, male-female interaction may be inhibited.

In closing we consider Williams to provide varied and enriching experiences. Single-sex as well as coed living are very much a part of the Williams tradition. To remove the establishment of single-sex living is to sacrifice an experience that we and others value highly. To quote an unknown scholar, "If it ain't broke, don't fix it."

Tony Fuller and John Servin are JA's in Sage A.

Decries WCFM's sexist coverage

To the Editor:

As a member of the Williams College community, supporter of the women's basketball team and a regular listener of WCFM, I was disappointed by WCFM's broadcast of the women's basketball NIAC playoff game last Sunday. The two commentators, allegedly assigned to provide coverage of the game as an athletic contest, provided, in addition to a running description of the play, an irrelevant, insulting and sexist commentary on the physiques of the members of Williams' opponents and their coach.

While WCFM does have the right to free speech, it does, in turn, as a public voice of Williams College, have the responsibility to represent the values and goals that the college professes to support: among these, a stand against sexism. While I was delighted to hear the rare airing of a women's athletic event, I was most disturbed by the tone in which the game was covered, and would urge WCFM's management to make a deliberate and careful evaluation of its live programming.

Brzezinski addresses foreign policy

Foreign policy is "a topic which Democrats have not been giving sufficient attention to," former National Security Advisor Zbigniew Brzezinski announced to an audience which packed Chapin Hall on March 7. Brzezinski said that he would not address foreign policy as a Democrat because the nature of the issue precludes thinking about it in partisan terms.

Brzezinski served as President Carter's National Security Advisor from 1977-81. He is known chiefly for his role in the normalization of U.S.-Chinese relations. In 1981, he was awarded the Presidential Medal of Freedom.

In his talk, "Emerging Dilemmas of American Foreign Policy," Brzezinski addressed the issues of U.S. strategic doctrine, national geopolitical imperatives and the global role of the United States.

He began his talk by briefly outlining the history of U.S. involvement in international affairs, starting with World War II.

At the time, American planners felt that the most likely threats to the U.S. were either a massive nuclear war or a conventional war in Western Europe, Brzezinski said. However, the U.S. has since begun to recognize that these are not the most probable threats to American security. Part of the reason for this is that nuclear weapons are now refined enough to be used tactically.

Brzezinski said that another reason is that the age of offensive warfare is ending and that defensive weaponry will begin to be developed, including defenses against nuclear attacks.

The geopolitical imperatives of the United States have begun to shift away from Western Europe and East Asia, Brzezinski said. America should be worried about areas like Eastern Europe, which he said is in a pre-revolutionary condition, the Middle East and Central America.

On the changing role of the United States in the world, Brzezinski said there should be "a measured degree of optimism in the future role of the United States." He said he did not believe that the U.S. was declining as a world power because, with the Soviet Union fading as a rival for power, there is no one country which could assume our position. Therefore, Brzezinski said, the world still has a vested interest in maintaining the United States as the world power in order to retain financial, political and economic stability.

Recount necessary in CC run-off

Mary Ellen Sullivan '89 defeated Brad Gendell '90 by eighteen votes for the position of College Council Treasurer in the most hotly contested race in last week's council run-off elections.

Gendell had called for a recount of the votes because he felt that the election was so close that a counting error could have made a difference. He turned out to be right that an error had been made, but wrong about it making a difference.

The original tally was 452 for Sullivan and 443 for Gendell. After the recount, which Council President Carter Zinn '88 said was triple-checked, it was determined that Gendell had actually received nine less votes than originally calculated.

Zinn said that after the counting error had been discovered, all run-off races were recounted. He said all the other original results were exactly right or off by two votes, and the recounts did not reverse any final outcomes.

"That's not a bad margin of error when you're talking [about] three people working on a volunteer basis," he said.

When reached for comment after the election, Sullivan said, "Obviously I'm very happy. Brad ran an incredibly good race."

Vice President Nicole Melcher said that she was satisfied with the election turnout of 939 students, especially considering that it was not a presidential race.

In other races, Jon Gray '90, Cathy Paper '89 and Amy Scott '90 all won at-large seats. Keko Torres '91 won the remaining minority representative seat on the council.

In committee races, Todd Owens '90 won a seat on the Advisory Committee On Shareholder Responsibility. Honor and Discipline Committee seats will go to Deldre Pappalardo '91, Amy Steele '90 and Marcia Toll '89.

Leslie Jeffs '89 won the remaining seat on the Honary Degrees Committee.

Student food service workers to get raise

The Student Employment Review Committee, at its final meeting last week, voted to propose a raise for second year Food Service employees. They also suggested an incentive program which would add $.50/hour to the payroll of Food Service employees who qualified, Driscoll Hall Manager Rob Parkinson-Shutt said.

The committee, which is chaired by Director of Financial Aid Philip Wick, met for a final time last Thursday to draft a proposal aimed principally at helping Food Service recruit student employees. According to Student Employment Coordinator Delores Garnish, the financial aid office will be responsible for writing the final proposal, which will be released after spring break and go into effect next fall.

The committee, which includes four students, began meeting last November to look into the difficulties Food Service was having finding enough students to work for them. They have also considered similar problems in Security and Sawyer Library.

Parkinson-Shutt said the committee approved an incentive program which would award an additional $.50/hour to student employees in Food Service who met certain requirements. These requirements include working an average of six hours per week, working during finals and having no more than one unexcused absence from work during the entire academic year, Parkinson-Shutt said. The bonus would be awarded at the end of the academic year. He said that the current 'Star Performer Program' which awards employees with gift certificates is a similar idea on a smaller scale.

The committee also gave its tentative approval to a plan to start second year Food Service employees at the C, rather than B, pay level, Parkinson-Shutt said. This is equivalent to a $.15 raise, he added.

Parkinson-Shutt said that retention of employees was a big problem for Food Service. Of 120 freshmen who began in Food Service this year, he said that 64 have quit already, a 53 percent attrition rate.

The committee suggested that all campus jobs be posted on a central job board, he said. They also approved of an idea for all student employee supervisors to form an ongoing committee to discuss problems with student motivation, and to nominate a student employee of the week. "We're trying to get across how vital a role the student employee plays on campus," Parkinson-Shutt said.

Chem prof. gets grant

Assistant Professor of Chemistry Susan Kegley has received a $24,726 grant for research from the National Science Foundation (NSF). The award, which supplements an earlier $20,000 NSF grant, will support Kegley's project entitled "Chiral Transition Metal-Olefin Complexes: Applications to Organic Synthesis," through August 1989.

Kegley's research involves using a transition metal, such as molybdenum, to facilitate the synthesis of certain biologically useful compounds which are difficult to make normally, and which, as a result, are either very expensive or hard to obtain. By using transition metals as reagents for synthesizing these kinds of molecules, Kegley hopes to make the process easier and less expensive.

Gaudino Fellowship proposed

The Gaudino Committee is circulating a proposal for a new fellowship that would encourage students to reflect on their position in society by stressing learning outside of Williams.

The goal of the proposed fellowship is to challenge students to question themselves in an effort to better understand more fully the world outside of Williams, according to Professor of Political Science Kurt Tauber, the Gaudino Scholar. It would provide two selected students with stipends for a summer in which they would partake in an unusual kind of learning experience.

"Imagine living with a Tennessee mining family," Tauber said. "You would have to adjust to a new set of values. You would have to adopt a new perspective... You would be more than an observer; you would have to react."

In the first year, the Gaudino Committee would design one fellowship for two students, Tauber said. In following years, students would be encouraged to develop their own projects.

Selected students would be responsible for keeping a journal that would be submitted in installments during the summer. At the end of the summer, they would write a short paper and attend various meetings to inform others about the value of their learning experience.

Tauber said he believes that forcing students to deal with culturally different, and possibly awkward, situations would make them very self-reflective. "Being in a position to be an outsider serves as an enormous clarifying role in the way you look at yourself," he said. The project would be designed to provide confrontation with "otherness," a major vein in the Gaudino philosophy, Tauber said.

The proposal would not go into effect until approved by the college's board of trustees. "The whole thing rests on student input," Tauber said. "If students think it's an interesting proposal, they (the trustees) will look into it." According to Tauber, it is ultimately up to College President Francis Oakley to bring the proposal to the trustees.

Students would be selected to participate in the project based on applications made available to the general student body. Participants would be provided with stipends to cover the basic living and travel expenses of their project. Funding would also have to cover operating expenses for the program. Tauber said that as more funds become available, more fellowships could be awarded.

Grant will help sciences

According to the report of the Gaudino Committee, Williams sends fewer students to graduate schools than Amherst or eight other similar liberal arts colleges do. Perhaps a new grant by the Ford Foundation will help change that, at least in the sciences.

Williams has been awarded a grant from the Ford Foundation to cover the costs of new lower-level science courses. According to Geology professor William Fox, the purpose of these courses is to interest more students in scientific research and to increase the number of science students going to graduate school and eventually teaching.

Fox said the grant of nearly $270,000 will pay the salaries of professors over a one-month summer session on how to teach the classes. It will also pay for lab equipment. The new classes are designed to give students early involvement in scientific research. Fox taught the pilot course, Geology Outdoors, last fall. "The classes are based on the old idea that you learn science by doing science rather than just learning about it," he said.

Seven departments; astronomy, biology, chemistry, computer science, geology, physics and psychology plan to offer a Ford Foundation course. The classes will be small, usually consisting of 12 to 14 students, and primarily devoted to lab work. Students will have to apply for them. If more apply than can be accepted, decisions will be made on the basis of students' interest and academic record, Fox said.

Williams applied for the grant last summer. In the fall, Geology Outdoors was offered. According to the description of the course by the geology department, "Based on the student response in the course questionnaire, and on the high quality of the papers and independent projects, we consider the course a great success."

Most of the classes would meet for three hours two days per week and be open only to freshman and sophomores, Fox said. They are aimed at potential majors, and some are alternatives to a regular introductory course.

Fox said that a speakers program is also included in the grant. This would pay for people to come and speak at a level introductory-level students can understand. According to Fox, most other speakers talk at the level of senior majors.

County Commission. "I'd like to pull the people of Berkshire County together," he said. "I don't see boundaries between communities. I see people striving for the same goal."

The County Commission is in charge of the county courts, jails, roads, lakes and other common domains. While Babeu said he thinks that the Commission's role has decreased over the years, he still feels that it can and should have a significant impact on the county, which reaches down to the Connecticut border and contains about 150,000 people. Babeu said he believes his role as North Adams city councilman will complement the office of county commissioner.

T.V. show

One of Babeu's interests lies in creating a greater understanding of community events among the citizens; to this end, he has instituted a new weekly T.V. show entitled "Politics in the Berkshires." The show will consist of interviews with mayors, selectmen, and councilmen from various communities in the area.

The local North Adams T.V. station offers public access space to the community in order to make the television media available to those who would ordinarily be unable to afford it. Babeu gathered his family and friends to help film and edit, under the tutelage of a station employee, and the first show, an interview with North Adams' mayor John Barrett, will air March 17.

Babeu is a member of the subcommittee that deals with the Massachusetts Museum of Contemporary Art (MassMoCA) proposal, which is awaiting enactment by the state legislature before going to Governor Dukakis' desk. "The council as a whole is supporting MassMoCA, and my role and the council's is planning for a great reformation of the city of North Adams... It's unbelievable what's going on here — people are having faith in North Adams again."

Housing effects

Housing in North Adams will feel some of the strongest effects of MassMoCA. Real estate in the area may double in value, and Babeu said the council is concerned that the current residents may be forced out of their homes.

"I have no plans to control the housing in North Adams. I'm a conservative at heart, and this nation is founded on capitalism... The city doesn't have the role to control — just the role to provide reasonable housing."

Babeu is also a member of the Water Study Commission, which is in charge of analyzing the current clean water supply situation in order to evaluate possible renovations. A new filtration plant alone is not sufficient to solve the problem. The water pipes in North Adams, some of which are over 100 years old, must be checked and replaced if necessary. Many of the water meters are also decrepit, causing the city to lose revenue.

For Babeu, political involvement was the easiest way to accomplish what he saw as vital changes for his hometown. To the 19-year-old city councilman and aspiring county commissioner, his age is hardly an obstacle. "The youth have a lot to offer in many ways," he said.

Clayton wrestles with religion, science

by Michael Reisman

"You don't have to be an atheist to be a scientist," insists Assistant Professor of Philosophy Philip Clayton. His new book, Explanation from Physics to Theology: An Essay in Rationality and Religion, explores the differences between the natural sciences and the study of religion.

Clayton explained his ambitious reasons for writing the book: "I want to see a radical humbling of science that is an awareness of its own limitations and the role of human subjectivity in science... Conversely, I want to see how far religion can go in critically defending the explanations it puts forward."

Clayton's interest in the parallels between scientific and religious explanations originates in his upbringing. Despite his atheistic upbringing, Clayton said he was so torn between the claims of philosophy and religion that, after graduating from Westmont College in 1978, he enrolled in a seminary.

Science is becoming more and more aware of so much that we don't know and the tenuous status of what we do know.

After graduating, Clayton travelled to Germany to study at the University of Munich with Wolfhart Pannenberg, a major contemporary thinker in the philosophy of religion. Pannenberg's acclaimed work Theology and the Philosophy of Science inspired Clayton to pursue graduate work at Yale University and, eventually, to write his own book.

"Pannenberg was a major influence on my life," Clayton said. "Studying with him gave Philip Clayton contends in his new book Explanation from Physics to Theology: An Essay in Rationality and Religion that science and religion are not necessarily incompatible.

(Steinman) me a personal vision, a way of formulating Christianity that is compatible with science and the rest of Western thought."

Making sense

In Explanation Clayton posits that there are similarities in the formulation, evaluation and use of explanations in science and in religion. He writes that just as in science, religious explanations of events represent the believer's attempt to "make sense" of his or her experience in light of a given religious tradition.

Clayton argues that the subjective component in science is much greater than it was years ago. "Science is becoming more and more aware of so much that we don't know and the tenuous status of what we do know," he said.

"Doubt is intrinsic to religious belief," quoted Clayton of the leading 20th century theologian Paul Tillich.

Clayton said that he thinks that the arguments in the book will be taken by many as radical, and he expects to see his work severely attacked by theologians and scientists alike.

Professor of Physics William Wothers, who has discussed the book with Clayton, said he holds similar views about the reconciliation of science with religion.

"I don't think there's any inconsistency between being reli-

Hypnotic and luminous 'Gates of Light' opens at WCMA

by Travis Pierson

Crowd-pleasing exhibits sometimes suffer from a lack of artistic integrity, choosing instead to pander to more thrill-seeking urges. Anders Knutsson's The Gates of Light, which opened this past weekend at the Williams College Museum of Art, satisfies those in search of color and excitement, but it also realizes more important goals, reaching a happy medium between accessibility and aesthetic worth. The Gates of Light consists of works constructed from phosphorous and color pigments in wax oil and magna. The phosphorous takes energy from light in the room, and, when the light are turned off, reflects it back, creating a glowing canvas of color. Knutsson uses pastel pinks, greens, yellow, and blues in the paintings — colors of the spring and daytime, and, when viewed in the light, the depthless paintings are unthreatening and relatively unchallenging. Many of the works resemble Mark Rothko's color field paintings, but the brushstrokes are built up like stucco, resulting in a more expressive and feathery mood, contributing to their sense of pastel airiness when viewed in the light.

In the dark, however, the other, more mysterious side of these paintings comes alive, pulling the viewer in with their illusionistic three-dimensionality.

The exterior area of the exhibit, consisting of the Gates of Light series, smaller works on handmade paper, is the least satisfying part of the exhibit, because the corridor where they are placed always has light entering from various sources, and one feels cheated by not being able to experience the full extent of the works' luminosity.

Luminous intensity
But the interior room is magical, and it is here that the duality of the works can be fully explored. In Field of Faith (1987), pink and powder-blue clouds hover in a white sky above yellow land, but, when the lights are turned off, it turns into a huge blue sky flecked with black looming over the land at the bottom.

In this way, the title of the painting takes on two entirely different connotations: first, when viewed in the light, faith exists as an object, floating in a heavenly way above mankind, but, in the darkness, faith turns inward and abstracted, and the viewer is the one who must create his own faith in the unknown which fills the universe.

Another work, Wu-Wei (1987), is made up of an unthreatening, bright scene of the daytime, but when the lights are turned off, the glowing blues and oranges and greens create a magical world of fairies and other worldly creatures.

A large scale work, The Face of Light (1982-87) is a horizontal canvas depicting what looks like an abstracted rainbow landscape sits prominently in the light in a pattern of orange-yellow-white-green, but in the dark turns to a curvilinear plane of yellow-blues-reds and greens which, like many of the paintings seem to beckon the viewer closer as if they possess some magical healing.

When viewed in the dark, Knutsson's brushstrokes come alive, and, weaving in and out of one another, gain a three-dimensionality. Also heightening the experience is the darkened space of the interior room, which creates an anonymous intimacy, allowing people to speak louder and more freely in a mood of mutual experience and communality.

Hypnotic images

is a shared experience, the most successful works are the more private ones. Through the Looking Glass (1986) is probably the most subtle work in the exhibit, successfully realizing the meditative potential which these works possess.

Seeming to be no more than an off-white expanse when viewed in the light, it turns to a blue field in darkness, which, when examined, has glowing green curves growing out from it, as if they are slowly leaking into one's subconscious.

Knutsson's works spring from a somewhat kitschy idea, but they go beyond mere trickery, and the paintings, like those of Rothko, allow the viewer to enter into a hypnotic state, but, even more successfully than Rothko, they imitate the process of entering into sleep and dream states.

When the lights are first turned off, the paintings are very bright and the colors are vivid, but as time passes, the colors slowly begin the fade as the phosphorous' energy dies. The lines of the paintings become less clear, and the colors blur into one another. Similarly, as one drifts off into sleep, one dwindles from feeling at odds with the darkness to reaching a semi-conscious equilibrium.

The Gates of Light make a strong public impression, but realize their greatest value when the viewer approaches them open to their potential for psychic solitude. The exhibit will be on display until April 24.

ing, "What's going on up there? Who is it (MassMoCA) is going to benefit?"

Widespread discrimination
"I had absolutely no idea I was going to run into the prejudices and discrimination I did in New York," one of the Guerrilla Girls said. According to them, over 50 percent of the graduates of the finest art schools are women, but these women receive a fraction of the recognition that white males get. When they asked why so few women have works displayed in the Williams College art museum, Deborah Menaker, Anders Knutsson's Wu-Wei (1987) is part of The Gates of Light, a collection of paintings made from both phosphorous and traditional pigments made to be viewed in the dark as well as the light.

The Guerrilla Girls speak out against discrimination in art

by Stephanie Jones

According to two members of the Guerrilla Girls, an activist group based in New York City that attempts to combat sexism and racism in the art world, the proposed Massachusetts Museum of Contemporary Art

Girls, who wore gorilla masks at their lecture, said that one of the reasons they chose to talk at Williams was the recent actions taken by members of the Williams art community that seemed to share their tactics and goals.

Mysterious posters

Last October, posters were distributed in the community, allegedly by the Guerrilla Girls, with statistics indicating that the great majority of artists whose work is displayed in the Williams College Museum of Art are white males.

According to Associate Professor of Art Edward Epping, it is not completely clear that the Guerrilla Girls were responsible for the posters. He said that since their group was anonymous, others could easily imitate them.

"It's a guerrilla theatre group," Epping said, "And guerrilla theatre has no rules and regulations."

According to Epping, some xeroxed pieces of paper comparing the number of white male, woman and minority artists in shows by the art has a chance to change the direction of the art world. "You guys in Massachusetts have a chance to act now to change history... You have a right to demand that this non-profit organization...[does not] discriminate... I want to see it show the wonderful diversity there is in our country," one of the Girls said at a lecture last Tuesday, March 8.

This was one of the notions put forward by the two Guerrilla Girls who gave a slide lecture and forum for discussion about discrimination in museums and galleries. The two Guerrilla

A need to escape Reagan's legacy GOP offers growth and new ideas

by Karl Galle '91

It's that time of year again. As inevitable as the visit by those unwanted in-laws and as welcome as the aroma of those socks you haven't washed since Winter Study, it's upon us once again. Yes, spring is in the air, and it's time for another Presidential primary season.

At least I know I'm all set — my membership cards for both the Democratic and Republican National Committees arrived in the mail just last week. But the season is not without its share of sadness, too, for ahead lie the vast uncharted waters of the future and the conclusion of all the fun times that Reagan has bestowed upon us. So before we move ahead, let's take one last nostalgic look back on the golden years — a tribute to the Reagan era.

Remember the first inaugural address, when Reagan promised he would get rid of deficits by 1984? Hmmm.... No wonder people cringed when he said in his second inaugural address that he was turning his attention to nuclear weapons. And then there was his "economic miracle." Reagan has presided over the worst economic growth rate since FDR, and the gap between the richest and poorest segments of the population is now the largest it's been since the Great Depression, but conservative pundits kept pointing to the stock market and telling us how well the economy was doing.

It was also an era for George Orwell, when Newspeak came into its own. Intercontinental ballistic missiles packing three megatons of destructive power became "Peacekeepers," Third World mercenaries became "freedom fighters," and Judge Bork became a "moderate." Nebulous terms with little or no meaning such as "supply-side economics," the "window of vulnerability," and "constructive engagement" were banded about, and let's not forget the bee feces that became "Soviet chemical warfare." All the while, the press corps debated whether it was really fair to apply the term "lies" to the stories the President routinely told; after all, he apparently believed them.

But throughout the Reagan Revolution it was not just the rhetoric, not just the stories that kept us going. No, more importantly it was that special breed of people who graced every aspect of national policy-making. Let's have one more toast for all the ones who made their own unique contributions to the era: James Watt, Al Haig, Anne Burford, Mike Deaver, Jeanne Kirkpatrick, Ed Meese, Don Regan, Ollie North and the Company, the whole gang at the FEMA, the more than 1000 federal officials indicted or convicted of crimes in 1985 alone, and all those Iranian moderates out there. Ah, those were indeed the good old days....

You've got to hand it to the Republicans, though. Just when you thought things couldn't get any better, they go and line up another batch of sure-fire winners. Bush, Dole, Robertson. Take your pick; you can't go wrong. Thought you were going to have to settle for less than what you've gotten for the last eight years? Not a chance. These guys can cut taxes, raise military spending, and then blame the resulting deficit on the Democrats with the best of them.

The one man among them who has really added that extra sparkle to the Republican primaries is Pat Robertson.

The one man among them who has really added that extra sparkle to the Republican primaries is Pat Robertson. First he says God told him not to run. Then he says God told him to run. Now it appears that God has told him there are Soviet missiles in Cuba. He wants to get rid of Halloween to keep kids from "acting out satanic rituals," and he has said that "Margaret Sanger, the founder of Planned Parenthood ... wanted to sterilize blacks, Jews, mental defectives and fundamentalist Christians.... [Her literature] undergirded the genetic experiments of Adolf Hitler."

What makes him so fun is that he draws away votes from the extreme Right that people like Bush and Dole would have normally been able to count on. Now it looks as though they may have to go out of their way to foam at the mouth a little extra in order to curry favor with the Robertson crowd.

In all likelihood, however, Robertson will not get the Republican nomination. (Maybe his experience with hurricanes will at least earn him a spot with the American Meteorological Service.) With Robert Dole's withdrawal appearing imminent, George Bush appears poised to take the laurels, a fact that is hard for many right-wingers to stomach. Jack Kemp, for instance, said of Bush, "That is embarrassing, to have a Republican talking about 'give peace a chance.' " Amen. What's the party coming to?

Don't get the wrong impression,

by Michael Barbera '89

One of the greatest attributes the Republican Party can claim in the upcoming Presidential election is that it is running against the Democratic Party.

Rarely has a party of such great size and constituency as the Democrats put forth such a sorry batch of candidates to face the American electorate. Each time a Democratic candidate makes a statement regarding defense or national security issues, or reveals something resembling a plan to deal with the national budget deficit, Republicans everywhere can be forgiven for breaking into a wide grin. It is indeed difficult not to.

What is the Democrats' position of defense? One candidate, Rep. Richard Gephardt (obviously due to a seizure of correct thinking) once voted for the MX missile — and has spent the year apologizing for it. Sen. Al Gore supported the Grenada liberation of 1983, and we remember how he was attacked by his fellow candidates in the early debate of the Democratic candidates (and former candidates) do not think that enabling a nation to go from a communist dictatorship to a self-governing democracy is a good thing. Are the citizens of the U.S. going to entrust the leadership of the free world to this party?

So much for defense. What about domestic policy? The Democrats are fond of citing the budget deficit as a major failing of the Reagan administration, and they have a point. However, they only tell part of the story. They do not tell us that, for the last three years, the deficit has gone down — the projected 1988 deficit is $138 billion, the lowest since 1983. They also do not tell us that the deficit would be even lower if during the past two years, the Democratic-led Congress had not exceeded the limits it set for itself in the 1985 Gramm-Rudman-Hollings deficit reduction plan. President Reagan has proposed budgets within the spending limits, but the Democrats have exceeded them consistently with pork-filled spending bills.

And what of specifics for deficit reduction? The Republican candidates have specific plans dealing with the economy which included deficit reduction measures. These range from temporary budget freezes to selected spending cuts. What do the Democrats offer? Has anyone heard a specific deficit-reducing blueprint from any of the Democrats since former Gov. Bruce Babbitt took his tax increases back home to Arizona? (Gov. Dukakis isn't really serious about hiring more IRS workers to balance the budget, is he? Surely, he's kidding.)

If we move on to discussion of other sectors of the economy, the Democrats suddenly become extremely quiet. After all, how does one argue against 3% inflation? Or 5.8% unemployment, the lowest in over twenty years? Remember when the Democrats used to argue that the new jobs created under President Reagan were low-paying manual labor jobs? Well, they've been rather silent on that score lately, also. As it turns out, over 70% of the new jobs created since 1981 are middle-level or higher. This is due to the economic expansion that has occurred in that time. 1987 marked the sixth consecutive year that our economy has grown, the largest peacetime expansion in our nation's history. The stock market fall of last October was supposed to signal the end of Reaganomics, as the critics like to call it. However, in the last quarter of 1987, the economy grew by nearly 3%, and the stock market today has recovered to nearly its pre-October heights.

Now that we have spoken about some of the major issues in the upcoming campaign, let us turn to programs for the future. Which of our parties has given us forward-looking programs to move the nation into the 1990's and beyond? We know that the Republicans gave us the tax-simplification plan in 1986, which modernized an aging tax system. This new code removed millions of poor from the nation's tax rolls and closed the loopholes for big business. President Reagan proposed it and pushed it through Congress.

It is the Republicans that pursue forward-looking programs such as the Strategic Defense Initiative, which President Reagan proposed in 1983. This program of research for a space-based laser defense system has yielded tremendous results in four short years. Significant progress has been made in the so-called "phase one" technology of missile identification. Furthermore, research for this program has yielded breakthroughs that are now being used in our space program and in the medical fields. And all this has cost us only 1.5% of our defense budget. The Democrats want to cut even that small amount of funding. They say S.D.I. can never work, that it is President Reagan's pipe dream. Perhaps they should remember that when President Kennedy said in 1962 that the U.S. would put a man on the moon before 1970, people at that time also thought it was a pipe dream; yet Neil though. Bush is no rampaging moderate. As understudy of the President for the last eight years, he shares the same wholly dichotomous view of the world that has boosted military spending to grotesque heights and gotten the U.S. seeing red in virtually every conflict anywhere in the world. I realize that most of us grew up with gremlins under our bed and beasts in our closets, but how is it that the Republican Party collectively never grew up?

And the Democrats? Well, it's my personal belief that the cumulative integrity of the candidates dropped by about half when Bruce Babbitt withdrew from the race, but no one ever said honesty would get you elected. To quote Molly Ivins, one of my favorite political columnists, "Put a surtax on bullshit, make it retroactive to the day this campaign began, and it'll pay off the national debt." With Gephardt virtually out of the race, though, the remaining Democrats aren't a bad lot. Jackson is the conscience of the party, Dukakis seems straightforward and honest enough, and Gore at least has brains even if he has been trying to don hawk's clothing of late.

Whoever eventually takes up residence at Pennsylvania Avenue next January, it will be a time for starting out on a new era and closing the door on the old one. Tears may be shed, but they won't be mine.

forums. Former Sen. Gary Hart spoke of enlightened engagement." Yet he wants to abandon the aircraft carrier-based navy and move to a small-ship naval force, which would effectively put the U.S. on par with second rate powers. If you were to ask Mr. Hart exactly what constitutes "enlightened engagement," you are likely to receive a simple answer (crouched, of course, in the usual liberal rhetoric): enlightened engagement means no engagement, anywhere at any time. Gov. Mike Dukakis also believes in isolationism, but he chooses to call it "multilateralism." The United States, the multilateralists claim, will not act unless everyone else says its okay. And thus we would have American foreign policy decided by the most hesitant of our allies, as the U.S. would be powerless to act without consensus.

When it comes to defense and foreign policy issues, the Democratic candidates are great at telling us what they don't approve of. They want to protect the West's oil supply, but don't approve of a successful U.S. policy in the Persian Gulf. They want to bulk up America's conventional forces, but they do not approve of increased defense spending. They want to contain Soviet expansionism, but they do not approve of aid to the Nicaraguan contras. And, except for Sen. Gore, they do not approve of the 1983 liberation of Grenada. Apparently, five glous and being a scientist," he said.

Wooters said he agrees with Clayton that the developments of modern physics have made it easier for one to hold religious beliefs, based not merely on faith but on rational, objective standards.

"In classical physics, the model of the world that physics provided was that of an entirely closed, self-contained world. That is not the case in modern physics. Quantum mechanics does not provide us with a clear and closed picture of the world and suggests that such a picture might be impossible to obtain. The change from closure to lack of closure in the physical description of the world makes physics more compatible with religious beliefs," he said.

However, Wooters said he rejects Clayton's attempt to classify modern physics as subjective. "It would be quite untrue to say that science is moving toward a more subjective mode of description. Modern physics ... still insists on objectivity."

York as their successes. But, they said, "As soon as we stop, it will stop."

All-woman or all-minority shows are not necessarily a good solution, they said, because the shows can be used as a ploy to smooth over the issue.

"We've just heard that the Williams College Museum of Art is planning a show next February which is going to shut everybody up; it's going to take care of the women and minorities," one of them said.

The show referred to is set for the spring of 1989, and is, according to W. Rod Faulds, Assistant Director of WCMA, actually a series of exhibits "celebrating and examining aesthetic achievements by Black American artists," motivated by a college-wide celebration of the centennial of the first Black Williams graduate.

"It is certainly not motivated by or a reaction to the Guerrilla Girls," said Faulds.

Ski teams finish 10th at national meet

James Lee

The eleven Eph skiers who represented their school at the Division I NCAA national championships at Middlebury this past week fought tough competition with some of the nation's best skiers and came home with the best Williams finish in years. In a competition that included former World Cup and Olympic athletes from such ski powerhouses as the Universities of Utah, Vermont, Colorado, and Wyoming, the Ephs accomplished their objective of placing in the top 10 teams, finishing 10th out of the 15 teams.

Williams' standing at the end of the third day of the four-day championship was a stellar eighth, ahead of rivals St. Lawrence and University of Alaska, Anchorage. The Ephs' ranking, however, dropped to 10th as no Williams team competed in Saturday's relay cross country races. Head Coach Bud Fisher explained that Williams was not allowed to send its women's relay cross country team, which is ranked third in eastern United States this year, to the championship because of its membership in the New England Small College Athletic Conference. Both St. Lawrence and U. Alaska competed in the relay races, earning team points to finish ahead of Williams at the end of Saturday.

Milliken 6th American
Despite the absence of the women's cross country relay team, several Eph skiers posted some outstanding individual results. Peter Milliken '90 and Mac Nash '88 of the men's cross country team had outstanding races, finishing at 20th and 21st in Thursday's individual races. Milliken was the 6th American finisher in a race that included many European skiers recruited by and studying on full scholarship at western universities.

Mari Omland '89 and Amy Sullivan '91 also had great results, finishing 13th and 15th in Friday's slalom races. Omland and Sullivan skied well in Wednesday's giant slalom races as well, finishing 17th and 22nd. Amy Belliveau '91, however, didn't ski up to her potential, falling on the second run in both the slalom and giant slalom races.

The women's individual cross country races also went well, as Williams managed to capture, with only two racers, a surprising 7th place ahead of teams that had four racers. Kirsten Hansen '91 and Kathy Wolf '88 captured 13th and 15th places for their team in the race in which teams from the East skied well.

Men's Alpine
The men's alpine team muddled through to some unexpected outcomes in the end, as some skiers fell victim to the slopes and others performed personal bests. In Wednesday's giant slalom races, the team did reasonably well, with J.P. Parisien '90, Pat Gilmartin '90, Jason Priest '91 and Charles Kaplan '89 finishing 26th, 32nd, 33rd and 35th, respectively. Parisien's 26th place finish, according to Coach Fisher, was disappointing since he finished 11th in the same race last year.

two individual events on the same day. Williams chose the more traditional one event per day option, and sent six swimmers into the nighttime finals heats, while Amherst only managed two.

Champion Dan Snyder '90, who won in meet record time, Michael O'Malley '89 (3rd) and Paul Dehmel '91 (4th) dominated the top eight spots, while three more Ephs and two Jeffs split the next spots. Benson (3rd) and Chris Giglio '89 (6th) led another group of six in the next event, the 200 IM.

Benson, pitted head-to-head against Amherst's best swimmer in his best event in the 400 IM, successfully defended his NE championship in the same event a year ago with a team and meet record 4:02.35. Freshman Dehmel earned his second fourth-place finish, and Captain Giglio earned his first trip to nationals in the same event, turning it into a Williams' scoring gain.

In the 100 back Amherst grabbed the top three spots, but Cleurzo (6th) and Kurt Oeler '88 (7th) held their rivals to a lower point gain than expected. O'Malley (2nd), Snyder (4th) and surprising Jim Curry (11th) swam similarly in checking the expected blitz in the 200 free.

Williams led 883 to 601 after the 400 medley relay closed the second day (2nd-Cleurzo, Davis, Benson, O'Malley). Sensing victory, Giglio became the last of the Ephs to shave his head.

Benson, needing only a runner-up finish in the 200 fly to cop the meet high point award, left no doubts with a strong, NE record championship swim.

Before the last event, the 400 free relay (5th-Oeler, Sigal, Brown, O'Malley), the outcome was clear, and after the award ceremony coach Carl Samuelson happily accepted the traditional victory dunk.

A revised version of council Election Committee by-laws passed. The Election Committee selects students for various campus committees. According to Vice President Nicole Melcher, the vote effectively created an Athletics Committee and updated rules governing the composition of the Junior Advisor Selection Committee. The Athletics Committee will be a student committee which would serve as a liaison with the athletics department.

Debate on the by-laws centered on the rules concerning the Junior Advisor Selection Committee, which the council passed in 1986. Since that time, the committee has been composed of 12 former Junior Advisors, four current Junior Advisors, and nine other students.

Rob Mecarini '88 said that when he was on the committee two years ago, there was a tendency to pick the same type of people for the committee. He called for more specific guidelines concerning how members should be selected.

Others disagree
But other council members disagreed. "The complexion of the committee has changed completely," said Tom Higgins '88. Catherine Dissly '90 said, "The JA's don't vote as a block."

A motion was made by Ellen Lee '88 to omit the section concerning the committee from the final vote. The motion did not pass.

Residents remain unconvinced about Pine Cobble

by Michael Reisman

Despite reassurances by college officials and project engineers, Williamstown residents and town officials are still concerned about the potential effects of the college's proposed $3 million, 70-lot faculty housing subdivision on Pine Cobble mountain.

The final number of lots to be built, the possibility of blasting on the mountain and the environmental effects of the development were among the issues discussed at a Williamstown Planning Board hearing last week.

College attorney Bruce Grinnell stressed at the meeting that the college had "taken to heart" concerns about the project that had been raised in the past. However, several abutters to the proposed development stated that they would prefer that the college not follow through with the project.

The board must take action on the proposal by May 16. Grinnell said that "assuming the process goes without any glitches, construction may start as soon as a year from now."

The Pine Cobble project will also be the subject of a special Town-Gown liaison committee open hearing at the Williams Inn tonight at 7:30. The Planning Board decided to continue its hearing on April 12.

Pine Cobble is a 1,894-foot peak that rises from North Hosac Road near the end of Cole Avenue. The college proposal would construct lots up to 1,150 feet elevation on the peak's south slope and would entail the rerouting of the mountain's hiking trail and the construction of a 30-foot tall water tower. The lots will be sold exclusively to Williams College faculty.

Assuming the process goes without any glitches, construction may start as soon as a year from now.

During the hearing, college project engineer Michael Kilsh disclosed that ledges may have to be blasted into the mountain in order to build roads for the development. Kilsh said that a study is currently being done to determine if the blasting is needed. "We don't know... We'll know in a week," he said.

Grinnell said that the proposal submitted in February, which called for the construction of 72 lots, would be revised to include 70 lots. He said that the two additional lots that appeared on the site plan were the result of an engineering mistake.

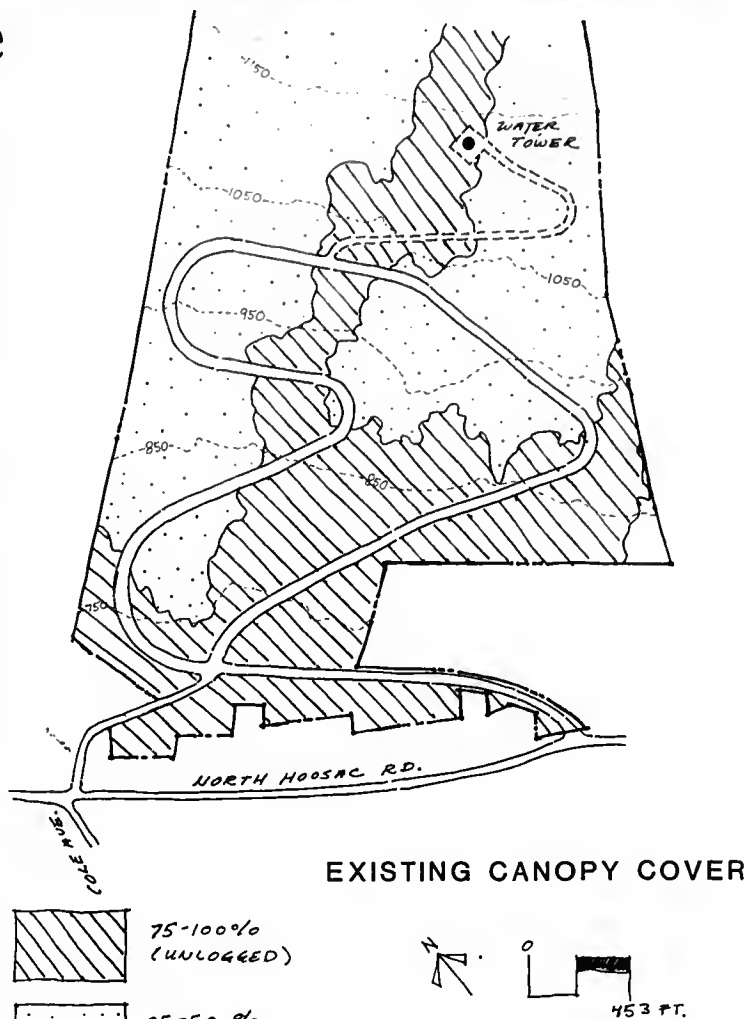

The Williamstown Conservation Commission has been to the project site and has identified wetlands along the intersection of North Hoosac Road and Locke Avenue, according to Grinnell. In compliance with the Wetlands Protection Act, the college will soon file a notice of intent with the commission, he added. The commission is requiring a notice of intent because the wetland will be the major drainage area for the college land, according to commission chairperson Harvey Goodell.

Memos from the Water Department and Town Engineer William Riley asked the college for more specific information on plans for water and sewer systems and storm drainage. Goodell said the town should seek a consultant on the effect the subdivision may have on the town's aquifers. Part of proposed development is located on the sight of one of the town's water-recharge areas.

After concerns about traffic patterns were raised at the meeting both by residents and by Police Chief Joseph Zolito, Jr., Schlesinger said that a more detailed traffic study of the area will have to be conducted.

Grinnell said the college will relocate the Pine Cobble trail away from the development so that the natural beauty of the trail can be maintained, he said. A parking lot that will service Pine Cobble residents and hikers will be located away from the trail, he added.

A rough sketch of the college's proposed development on Pine Cobble was provided by college attorney Bruce Grinnell at last week's Planning Board meeting.

CC discusses composition of JA selection committee

by Bill Savadove

Last Thursday's College Council meeting marked the end of President Carter Zinn's administration. Five votes were taken at the meeting, to make up for several recent meetings where votes had to be discounted because of insufficient attendance by council members.

A revised version of council Election Committee by-laws passed. The Election Committee selects students for various campus committees. According to Vice President Nicole Melcher, the vote effectively created an Athletics Committee and updated rules governing the composition of the Junior Advisor Selection Committee. The Athletics Committee will be a student committee which would serve as a liaison with the athletics department.

Debate on the by-laws centered on the rules concerning the Junior Advisor Selection Committee, which the council passed in 1986. Since that time, the committee has been composed of 12 former Junior Advisors, four current Junior Advisors, and nine other students.

Rob Mecarini '88 said that when he was on the committee two years ago, there was a tendency to pick the same type of people for the committee. He called for more specific guidelines concerning how members should be selected.

Others disagree
But other council members disagreed. "The complexion of the committee has changed completely," said Tom Higgins '88. Catherine Dissly '90 said, "The JA's don't vote as a block."

A motion was made by Ellen Lee '88 to omit the section concerning the committee from the final vote. The motion did not pass.

In a separate vote, the council decided that supplementary budget requests to the ecouncil from campus organizations will be reviewed by a finance committee member, and not the council officers. The finance committee member will be responsible for working with officers from various organizations to trim their budget requests before they come before the council.

Members of the Log Committee were present at the meeting to announce the hiring of Jane Penner '90 as the new Log student activities coordinator, which is a salaried position. The council approved the choice 26-0-1. Penner will be responsible for working with Manager David Lamarre to schedule events at the Log.

The complexion of the committee has changed completely

Zinn also announced the contents of a letter that he planned to write to College Treasurer William Reed in response to a request for input on the college's parking proposal. Zinn said the letter will express strong support for the idea of chartering buses to the Albany airport and register complaints about the current parking situation in the Berkshire Quad and the Mission Park parking lot.

Hopkins renovations in full swing

by Michael Reisman

Renovations on Hopkins Hall are proceeding on schedule and should be completed by next January 1, according to college officials.

A modern, enlarged administrative and classroom building will fill the nearly hollow facade that now comprises Hopkins.

The $7.2 million reconstruction of the building, which will enter its second century in 1990, was in part caused by a need to increase the number of classroom exits required by law, according to Assistant Director for Construction Services Antonio Janairo. The project includes a 27,000-square-foot renovation and a 16,750-square-foot addition to the building.

Williamstown residents have until March 21 to send comments regarding the project to the state Executive Office of Environmental Affairs. As part of its application for a $16.5 million loan from the state, the college was required to file an environmental notification form in February, in which it indicated that the Hopkins Hall project did not require an environmental impact report.

On March 30 the Massachusetts Environmental Policy Act unit will determine whether the college must submit the more detailed EIR for the project.

According to Town Planner Barbara Bashevkin, the planning board and the town Conservation Commission by law must receive copies of any ENF filed. If either body feels that a full EIR is required, it must give reasons and state what the report should cover. At a Williamstown Planning Board meeting last week, members of the board expressed their displeasure at the lateness of their notification by the MEPA unit of the filing of the Hopkins Hall ENF.

College seeking loans
The college is seeking the loans because their tax-free status makes them more attractive to investors and because the loan will allow the college to replenish capital assets expended on construction projects already completed, ENF.

Brzezinski-

and therefore there are no negotiations. The fact of the matter is that in any conflict of this sort it has to be resolved by negotiations, resolved by negotiations among the acute protagonists. We negotiated with the FLN in Algeria, even though the FLN did engage in terrorist tactics. We were willing to negotiate with the Viet Cong and the North Vietnamese in Vietnam. There ought to be negotiations between the Israelis and the Palestinians, negotiations between the leaderships that actually command the loyalty of the followers. Palestinians who are not associated with the PLO probably, by and large, do not speak for the Palestinians. If there are to be negotiations with the Palestinians, some people who are associated closely with the PLO have to be involved. It is not right for the Israelis to dictate with what kind of Palestinians they will negotiate any more than it would be appropriate for the Palestinians to dictate with what Israelis they will negotiate.

Record: U.S. Secretary of State George Schultz has presented a peace plan calling for a timetable of interlocking negotiations. In your book Game Plan, you said the U.S. should hasten the Arab-Israeli peace process in order to prevent Soviet "leapfrogging" into the Middle East. How large a role do you think that type of concern is playing in the U.S.' encouraging negotiations?

Brzezinski: A very considerable extent. The United States is aware that intensified strife will create greater openings for Soviet influence.

Record: What do you foresee as the most likely outcome of the conflict on the West Bank.

Do you expect that the West Bank will become a demilitarized Palestinian state?

Brzezinski: In the short run, it is my feeling that there will be more violence, more suppression, more brutality. This will only benefit radicals, extremists and the Soviet Union. The Arabs are leaderless, and the Israelis are divided and driven by the feeling that they can have their cake and eat it too. The conflict can continue for a long time, to the detriment of all parties. There is no doubt that the Israelis have the military power to sustain it, and they can also follow the advice that apparently, allegedly was given them by the U.S. The outcome will be more Arab hostility, resentment, bitterness and destructions in the future negative impact that is probably the more likely. The real transfer of territory is an act of statesmanship that requires a high degree of diplomacy and sustained negotiations.

according to Janalro. Among other projects for which bond financing is being sought are the construction of Thompson Infirmary, renovation of Thompson Physics Laboratory and the modernization of six dormitories.

Janalro said that the earliest time that Hopkins could be occupied would be in January 1989. There will be 8 classrooms in Hopkins, ranging in size from small seminar rooms to larger lecture halls. He added that the college is making sure to maintain the "tradition" of Hopkins, but that the addition, which will enlarge all four floors, will contain such new features as a patio on the fourth floor, adjacent to one of the classrooms.

Hopkins will house most of the college administrative offices, including the financial aid office, and the central telephone, security and fire-alarm systems for the campus.

added that the group does not claim to speak as the voice of minority students on campus.

In summarizing what she thinks should come out of this discussion, Belle said, "People need to take some time and reexamine the type of education they're getting and become more concerned and conscious about racial issues instead of trying to avoid them."

The Psychology Department has come under scrutiny because it lacks any minority faculty.

Professor Andrew Crider, chairperson of the Psychology Department, said that his department will be inviting two minority psychology professors, from Princeton and University of Michigan, to Williams to act as consultants to help facilitate the search for minority professors in psychology.

But Crider said, "[Oakley's statement] makes us look like we're merely reacting to the demands of the letter." He said that the idea to get outside consulting help for minority recruitment was developed last fall and put into place this past January with the help of the dean of the faculty.

Rob Benson '90 was the high scorer at the New England championships as...

The Men's Swim Team drowned their opponents by over 300 points to take the New England championships. Forty-nine of 50 Ephmen reached the nighttime heats in their events, 44 made it to the final sixteen, and five Ephmen were in the top 11 individual scorers.

Sophomore Peter Milken was the sixth American finisher in the individual cross country races while the Ski Team finished 10th in the National championships held in Middlebury.

Sophomores Carey Simon and Susan Gray were the only members of the track team to race in the Nationals. Both fell about a half second off their qualifying time and failed to reach the finals.

as starting goalie and will be joined by senior Dana Weeder, who has missed most of the early practices because of squash.

Little Three Champs? Williams seems poised to recapture the little three title from Amherst. Last year the Ephs sprinted to a 5-4 halftime lead on Cole field before faltering in a 6-5 thriller. While Williams must face the Jeffs in Amherst this year, it seems doubtful that the Jeffs will be as dominant this year.

"Amherst lost a tremendous group of seniors last year," said Lamb, "They've got some excellent kids coming back, but I think we have an excellent shot at the Little Three Title this year."

In Friday's slalom race, the Ephmen had some difficulty negotiating their turns as both Parisien and Gilmartin were disqualified and Priest fell on his first run. Priest, however, skied well enough on his second run to place 28th, and Gilmartin, though disqualified on the second run, had a good first run with a 22nd place finish. Kaplan was the sole racer who performed up to his best, finishing 20th.

"I am very pleased with the team, with the championship and with the whole season in which it consistently placed within the top four at the carnivals. The fact that we qualified so many skiers for the championship and finished within the top 10, our best result in years, is outstanding. The quality of competition at this championship was outstanding. It is difficult to get past those scholarship schools which bring 25-year old former World Cup skiers, you know," said Fisher, summing up his feelings for the season.

Spikers fall to Bates in tourney semi-final

by Ted Hobart

Continuing its wildly erratic play this season, the men's volleyball team fell to eventual champion Bates in the semi-finals of the first annual Williams Invitational tournament.

The powerful Bates team, whose female counterparts won the women's Invitational in the fall, used a strong net game and tenacious floor play to down the Ephs in two games, 15-8 and 15-13. The Maine men then went on to sweep the University of Connecticut at Bridgeport in two games in the finals to take the crown.

In pool play, the Williams six managed to plow through their first three matches without dropping a single game. In their final pool match, Williams fought Bridgeport, also undefeated, in a battle for the first pool seed in the playoffs, thus avoiding Bates until the finals.

The first game was knotted at 13 a piece when the Ephs made clutch errors on the final points to squander the game 15-13. Similarly in the second game, the game was tight until the very end when Bridgeport pulled it out 15-12.

In the semi-final matchup, the Ephs came out flat, unable to pass the ball effectively and thus unable to run any type of potent offense. Scrappy floor

Texas-San Antonio? What are they doing in the NCAA's? Probably only boring ESPN watchers. However, their presence on TV must mean March Madness, the time when the Big Ten (except for Indiana) folds and the Big East and ACC rise to the top.

In the East Region, look for Temple to continue its history of NCAA failures and fall to Georgetown in the 2nd round. The 2nd seeded Blue Devils will fly all the way to Kansas City, screaming past last year's runner-up Syracuse and edging the defending champion Hoosiers into the round of eight. Too bad for Temple, though, that Syracuse is on course to another Final Four, rolling over Duke and edging the Owls.

In the tightly matched East, Bobby's Knights won't be able to match the Owls from Philly, as their backcourt will hurl them past the Hoyas and Hoosiers into the round of eight. Too bad for Temple, though, that Syracuse is on course to another Final Four, rolling over Duke and edging the Owls.

Down in Dixie, the Southeastern champion BYU Cougars will edge Oklahoma and surprising Villanova, who Rolfe will have tournament tough again — defeating Illinois and Maryland before failing to Kentucky.

In the Midwest, watch for Pittsburgh to reassert themselves after a dismal Big East tourney showing and roll past everyone including the #1 Purdue Boilermakers. The best front line in the nation should dominate the paint on the way to Kemper Arena.

Out West, anything could happen in this weakest of regions. Arizona (seeded 1st) should down upstart Seton Hall but will be stunned by UNLV's runnin' three-point gunners. UNC will finally make it to the Final Four after not winning an ACC tourney. The 'Dean' of college coaching will lead Lebo, Reid et al past Wyoming, Michigan, and the Runnin' Rebels to between UNC and Oklahoma in K.C.

In the Final Four, the Tarheels will lose as Reid's boards and Lebo's bombs won't match the Sooner fast break. Coach 'K' will lead the Blue Devils past Evan's Panthers. Look for a slow paced final as the Duke 'D' should dismantle the Oklahoma 'O'. Ferry will swish from three point land at the buzzer and Duke will win by one.

Although listening to Brent Musberger drone on endlessly will again detract from enjoying this year's NCAA tournament, it will prove to be the most enjoyable playoff of any sport on any level. The Big East will prove itself, and the Big Ten will again suffer from not having a conference tournament by more early exits.

In the heartland, the Midwest region leaves little question that Pitt will roll to the final four. Jimmy V's Wolfpack can't match up with Evans' Panthers, and needless to say, Keady has Purdue's bags packed, ready for another flight home.

The West is anything but wild, where the only thing that will happen between yawns is that Michigan will buck its post-season trend and carry the Big Ten banner into the Final Four.

Michigan's good luck will continue in Kansas City as they will down the Cougars in OT. In the rubber match, Pitt will eliminate Syracuse as the Panther front court will prove too much for Selkaly and Coleman under the glass. In the Big East-Big Ten final, Smith and Lane will dominate Grant, Rumeal and company as Bill Frieder's boys will go out in a rout. Pitt will win by 15.

The Panther victory will prove once again that the Big East is the best basketball conference in the land.

Armstrong landed on the moon in the summer of 1969.

And what about the Democratic Party? What new initiative have the Democrats presented to the American people? It has been fully twenty years since the Great Society programs of President Johnson. What programs have the Democrats shown us? The last time the American people entrusted the Democratic Party with the workings of the federal government was 1977-80. President Carter was in the White House, and the Democrats controlled both the House and Senate. What did that leave us with? The list is long: double-digit inflation, interest rates in the middle teens, high unemployment, a watered down energy bill, an unrattified arms control treaty and communist takeovers in Afghanistan and Nicaragua. Are we ready to elect a party that left such a record as its legacy to the American people?

The choice is clear in 1988. Let us choose the party of economic growth and individual opportunity. Let us choose the party with forward-looking ideas and programs. Let us choose the party with a realistic outlook on foreign affairs and national security, a party that will protect and not imperil American interests. Let us choose a Republican in the upcoming election.

Long season will test Eph hurlers

by Michael K. Harrington

As the Williams College Baseball squad waves goodbye to Towne Field House and hello to Florida, there is widespread optimism about the team's future. Returning this year are a handful of healthy contributors from last year's team, headed by the leadership of senior tri-captains Lewis Collins, Jim Duquette and Chris Pacchus. This trio, along with the remainder of the Eph lineup, should produce some serious firepower. The question, however, will be whether or not the squad's arms can survive the 30 game schedule.

The infield is well set with sure hands and lots of lumber. Pacchus will handle the hot corner and most likely bat number 5. Collins is a given at short, and will probably turn plenty of tricks this season with returning senior Steve Holsten. At first, Freshmen Rick Bates and John Whalen will work to replace the bat of graduated All-New Englander Rick Hedeman.

The outfield is fast and experienced, with Duquette, an All-New Englander himself, and Sean Logan '88 playing center and left respectively. The speedy duo will likely bat 1-2, creating havoc for opposing pitchers. Junior Scott Kennedy is slated to play rightfield while not pitching, and could be the number three batter.

This year's squad has excellent depth at both infield and outfield positions. Rob Gotti '89 and freshman Scott Shean, Bob Verhey, Chris Perry and Mike Demarco all provide valuable support in the infield. For the outfield, Todd Strleer '90, Mike Hyde '91 and Chris Hevesy '91 look to contribute to the team.

The pitching staff is also deep and experienced, but needs one pitcher to emerge as a stopper. Look for senior Scott Garfield and juniors Kennedy and Chris Conway to maintain their position in the starting rotation. Coming out of the bullpen will be relievers Billy Ryan '88, Rob Blanck '89 and lefty Mike Barbera '89. The other half of the all important battery will be anchored by two very good catchers in junior Chris Donato and sophomore Bryan Harwell.

The Ephs, however, have a difficult schedule ahead of them in their quest for a Little Three Title. After a tiresome spring fling in Florida, the Williams Nine returns North and play 6 games in 8 days, four of which are on the road. In any case, it should be interesting to see how the squad performs on its new diamond at Weston Field.

Barring a rash of injuries, Williams should go into the post season NESCAC championships as a favorite, especially since the Ephs will be the hosts.

Women's track takes 6th in Div. III New Englands

by Mariam Naficy

The best of the New England college track scene gathered at Bates two weekends ago for the Division III New England meet, a steppingstone to the Nationals. Competitors had to meet qualifying standards in their events, with preliminaries held Saturday, March 2, and finals held the next day. By the time the last finish line had been crossed, the women's track team had raced to sixth place in the 18 team tournament, the best finish ever for Williams women.

Standout performances were turned in by several Ephs, most notably Susan Gray '90 whose 2:19 800m took third but more importantly qualified her for the nationals. Also impressive was Dawn Macauley's '89 first place in the 600m, where she caught up from a lagging position to pass two runners in the final stretch.

Anne Platt '91, meanwhile, broke a Williams record with a third place time of 1:45. Platt, too, was behind several runners until she took a risk, according to assistant coach Larry Bell, and ran a very fast third lap.

"I felt real strong," commented Platt, "The girl who came in first was a senior from Fitchburg who has won the event three years straight. I was in second, but by the girl from Bowdoin caught me with about 150 yards left, and I just couldn't catch her, she beat me by about a second."

Joan Davis '88 ran a strong 400m, placing fourth, as well as competing in the third place mile relay team with Macauley, Kim Barndollar '91, and Gray '90.

Other competing Ephwomen included: Nicole Jefferson '90, high jump and 4x200; co-captain Sarah Pierce '88, 4000m; Kira Shields '91, hurdles; Jen Morris '89, 1000m; and the two-mile relay team of Mary Moule '91, Christle Dempsey '89, Kate Holliday '91, and co-captain Sarah St. Antoine '88.

Gray at nationals

At Smith last Saturday, Gray was Williams' sole woman representative, and she ran well, nearly matching her stellar qualifying time. Nevertheless, the competition was a step above what Gray had been racing against and she placed only tenth in the twelve woman field.

Women's lax shoots for playoffs

by Ted Hobart

"We feel like we should make the playoffs. If we play well, we can do it," said head coach Chris Mason of her squad's playoff chances in the upcoming season. Although losing seven seniors from last year's team, including goalie Martha Hoopes, Mason can look to the experience of this year's seven seniors and the talent of her six sophomores to lead this group to success.

Among the returning seniors are co-captains Mara Burnett, the high scoring attack who will lead the offense, and Chris Boddicker, who will anchor the defense. Fellow seniors include attacks Lisa Tenerowicz and Abby Burbank, midfielder Beth Bernheimer, and defender Lisa Phillips.

Another key senior is Jeanne Cloppse, who with Tracy Davis '91 should share the goaltending duties this year.

"They both have good athletic sense. They're both very quick and move out and get involved in the defense," commented Mason. Goaltending will be a concern this year, as steady play in the net gives a team added confidence, especially with many new players seeing time this year.

Host of middies lead laxmen in 1988

by Marc McDermott

When asked about the prospects for this year's men's team, Coach Renzie Lamb's enthusiasm is obvious. "We should be just as good as last year's [6-6, ECAC semifinalist] team," said Lamb "but we'll be a lot different."

Indeed, this year's squad will play with a different style than last's. Lost to graduation are the 50 points accumulated by Steve Patterson, Jim Sperry and tri-captain Mike O'Connell and with them their conservative, ball control offense.

This year Bobby Santry '90 (team leading 30 points), Lew Fisher '89 (seven goals) and senior Stu Staley will return to lead a more open, faster breaking attack. Freshmen Ian Smith and Brent Powell will also be counted on to make the offense run.

"We're young on the attack," Lamb said, "We'll have more fast breaks and use a quicker passing attack as opposed to last year's dodges."

Midfield Madness

Williams will also look to dominate the midfield.

"We've got tons of potential; we really feel we can come through with a great season. Renzie has got to be psyched, I don't think he's ever been able to look in the fieldhouse and see eighteen middies," said junior defensive midfielder Tony Fuller about the midfield.

Last year's MVP and high scoring middle (20 points) Doug Gilbert '89 will lead the bumper crop from the offensive side while Kaveh Khosrowshahi '89, Jimmy Walker '88 and Steve Linen will alternate between close defense and defensive middle. Fuller will play defensive middle with a short stick.

Freshmen Matt Zolln and Dan Newhall should also see time on one of Lamb's three middies.

Defense

The defense may be the only suspect segment of the Ephs' game. Last year's captains Taylor Watts '87 and Jamie Gallup '87 as well as Dan McCarthy '87 will be hard to replace. Nevertheless, if senior captain Dave Crompton can shake off his ankle injuries to last the season, he should team with captain Eric Churchill '88 and Jeff Stripp '90 to mount a formidable defense. Lamb can also shore up his defense by converting some of his midfielders to close defense to get some extra quickness around the goal.

The goal itself, however, is one area where the Ephs have no worries. Sophomore Rob Lambert will begin the season

Swimmers take N.E. meet; swamp foes by 317 points

by Kurt Oeler

A phenomenally powerful team effort carried the men's swimming team to a crushing victory at the New England Division III Championships held March 4-6 at Bowdoin College. Williams tallied 1290 points, easily surpassing runnerup Amherst (973) and third-place Coast Guard (810).

Both Amherst and Williams resorted to "shaving down" to increase their chances for success against the competition. Many Williams swimmers, following a time-honored tradition, shaved their hair close to their heads.

Rob Benson '90, the meet's high point scorer, captured the symbolism of the shave for Williams.

"This ain't no beauty contest, it's a swim meet. And we're here to win it!"

This became evident in the meet's first event, the 500 free. Amherst adopted a gambling strategy which rested on five or six swimmers scoring highly in

ACSR inches away from disinvestment advocacy

by Peter Balaban

The Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibility voted against two shareholder resolutions calling on pharmaceutical companies that it holds stock in to withdraw from South Africa at its last two meetings.

The votes came at the height of the proxy season, during which the ACSR advises the Board of Trustees on shareholder balloting. The ACSR has voted on over 20 proxies at its past two meetings.

The votes on the two pharmaceutical companies, Abbott Laboratories and Warner Lambert, seemed to contradict the college's stated policy of disinvestment advocacy, or urging companies whose stock it holds to withdraw from South Africa.

But according to College Treasurer William Reed, who sits on the committee, the ACSR felt that the good done by the companies for black South Africans outweighs the negative effects of their continued presence in the country.

"With Warner Lambert I really think there's a good chance for junking our disinvestment advocacy policy," said senior John Canty, a student member of the ACSR.

Members said that the committee had voted against a similar proxy for the Merck pharmaceutical company last year.

Mass MoCA is supposed to bring 600 jobs to North Adams and draw contemporary art enthusiasts from around the world to the area.

MoCA gets state funds; may open by '91

by Scott J. O'Callaghan

Using a 29-cent Papermate pen, Governor Michael Dukakis signed into law a bill which would give $35 million to the Massachusetts Museum of Contemporary Art.

The museum, which backers say will be the largest of its kind in the world, would be accompanied by a convention center and commercial space. Its opening date is expected to be fall 1991.

The state has given the proposed museum an overwhelming vote of support, allocating $35 million for studies and construction of the proposed museum. The legislature enacted the bill on March 14, and Dukakis signed it into law on March 22.

Supporters of Mass MoCA celebrated later that day. The Williams College Museum of Art held a champagne party hours after the bill was signed in Boston.

Support for the project was not always certain. On January 5, a bill which would have funded the museum died at the end of the legislative session. The college, which has been involved with the planning of the project since WCMA director Thomas Krens came up with the idea, seemed ready to drop it.

Dukakis intervened

But Dukakis intervened and introduced a separate Mass MoCA bill several days later.

In the legislature last month, the state House gave its approval of the bill by a margin of 109-42, while the Senate voted 33-5 in favor of the measure. The bill had been in the legislature, in one form or another, since May 5, 1987.

Joseph Thompson, director of special projects at the WCMA and one of the members of the unofficial Mass MoCA planning team, said that despite the excitement involved with the bill's passage, "It's hard to get involved in a complete sense of exuberance because frankly, there's still a lot to be done."

Thompson said that a feasibility study will need to be conducted before funds for actual construction can begin flowing from the state's Administration and Finance Office. According to Thompson, the feasibility study should take about one year. He said that it will include an environmental survey for toxic chemicals, a study of traffic coming to the museum site in

by Todd Owens

What appeared to be Steven Winger's good fortune turned out not to be so good after all.

Sometime last fall Winger, a sophomore, lost his wallet. Last Tuesday, someone turned it in to the Williamstown Police. According to Winger, the police called him last Thursday and asked him to come to the station to identify and claim the wallet. When he arrived, he said, the police asked him to identify his wallet and sign for receipt of it, which he did. Immediately after, Winger said, the police arrested him and read him his rights.

The police are charging Winger with possession of a forged driver's license and two counts of possession of a forged official document. Police said they found a forged Mississippi driver's license, a forged Illinois identification card and a forged personal identification card in the wallet.

Police said Winger will be arraigned on Wednesday in North-ern Berkshire District Court in North Adams. Winger said that he could conceivably be charged with a felony.

James F. Skinner, Halford R. Clark Prof. of Sciences and popular teacher, dies at 47

by Beth Broadrup

Professor James Skinner's touch is evident throughout the chemistry building. It is in the molecular model of Nutrasweet hanging in the entrance hall, connecting a visitor's everyday world to the chemical world. It is also there in a gently shaped glassblown deer, which is housed in a commemorative display case, recalling the commitment, humor and enthusiasm that colleagues said characterized his teaching career. Skinner committed suicide on March 19.

Since joining the faculty in 1966, Skinner, the Halford R. Clark Professor of Natural Sciences, was known among chemistry students and colleagues for his passionate dedication to teaching.

Professor of Chemistry J. Hodge Markgraf who taught Skinner when he was an undergraduate at Williams and worked with him as a colleague said, "The student was center focus of his priorities."

Skinner regularly accompanied his lectures with theatrical displays of the workings of chemistry, demonstrations he often invented himself. At the annual chemistry department picnic he would cause a garbage can to jump about 30 feet in the air because of a gaseous reaction, an experiment he performed on a smaller scale in his classroom.

"He was a showman," Markgraf said. "Chemistry 101-102

The Williams Record

An independent newspaper, published by students of Williams College

Let's be sure about Mass MoCA

With Governor Michael Dukakis' signing last month of the Mass MoCA bill, the largest museum of contemporary art took one step closer to becoming a reality. Ideally, this enormous reservoir of art would not only house some of the world's greatest contemporary art but would also dramatically increase tourism for the northern Berkshire area and revive a sagging North Adams economy.

North Adams politicians most certainly hope that the museum will be to the area what Tanglewood is to the western Massachusetts region in terms of revenue and prestige. If these hopes come to fruition, the museum, which is projected to be completed and ready for opening in the fall of 1991, will serve as an incredible boon to the area.

However, if the $35 million to be sunk into Mass MoCA by the State Legislature do not match themselves in economic tourist returns, North Adams might have the distinction of housing the least visited but most enormous contemporary art museum in the world.

Before that money becomes authorized for spending on Mass MoCA, the people responsible for the project should explain how the large number of art enthusiasts that will want to visit Mass MoCA are going to get here, where they are going to stay and where they are going to eat. Can an area that is accessible by a one-lane, winding road and is booked to capacity for commencement or parents' weekend sustain the kind of tourism appropriate to the largest museum of contemporary art in the world?

In addition to preliminary studies, the State Office of Administration and Finance plans to conduct a massive operation to determine the feasibility of the museum's financial existence. Estimates have the museum creating 600 new jobs and drawing 20 million tourist dollars annually. If so great; if not, what a waste. It is possible to envision a scenario in which museum visitors stay in the southern half of Berkshire County and just drive up to see the museum without investing money in the area. This situation would rob North Adams of the economic benefits it needs to derive from this project.

The college and the state legislature should have as close to total assurance as possible that the museum will economically succeed and cause an economic revival in North Adams. Only then should the appropriated $35 million be authorized.

Time for a change

When your life at Williams encompasses only four years, when you can still see Philip Smith's trademark smiling at you on your acceptance letter as you walk down the path to OCC, all problems at Williams acquire a sense of urgency; all changes need to be made, now.

The recent demands made of College President Francis Oakley by a group of students regarding the college's affirmative action program reflect the immediacy with which students often want to see situations at the college altered. Although some of the demands require time, ways to improve minority hiring exist now.

The faculty will vote tomorrow for a new Division II representative to the Committee on Appointments and Promotions. Every prospective faculty member must interview with the CAP, a committee whose membership has always consisted of white males. Regardless of the intentions of CAP members, the homogeneity of the committee's membership must surely reconfirm any apprehensions a prospective minority and/or female candidate may have about living and working in a community traditionally run and governed almost exclusively by white males.

Faculty members have a chance tomorrow to alter somewhat the image that Williams projects to prospective faculty members. History Professor Dennis Dickerson is eligible to be elected to the CAP. We urge the faculty to consider the importance of taking advantage of one means of broadening its composition now.

WHERE THE PURPLE COWS ROAM

by Rich Gardella

Letters

Are the school's activists chic?

To the Editor:

While visiting my sister, a 1987 graduate, last spring, I read through some old copies of the Record and came across the vehement confrontations on the editorial pages between those students who supported the crosses on Baxter lawn and those who opposed, occasionally maliciously, their presence. At that time, the issue of South African divestment and apartheid was the chic issue among those who perennially protest; and it was fashionable on all campuses across the country to be associated with a divestment or rally or a vigil to pay homage to those who had been killed in conflict with the racist government of South Africa.

In light of the crosses on Baxter lawn, I have a question to ask those at Williams who exercised their right to the freedom of expression: where are the protests for those who die daily in the West Bank, protesting for freedom and a homeland for themselves? They too are mercilessly quashed by a strong-armed regime, yet no one seems to take much note of the deaths of these Palestinians. It appears that those who call themselves the guardians of personal and ethnic freedoms throughout the world serve only those causes which are popular and non-debatable, and not those where they can truly make a difference.

Hufford family sends its thanks

To the Editor:

We thank the College Council for its generous contribution to the fund at Williams established in memory of our son, Charlie Hufford. Williams College was one of the most important parts of Charlie's life, and we are grateful to you for having remembered him in that way.

In these four months following Charlie's death it has become clear to us why Williams was so beloved by Charlie: it is a community of caring people. So many of you have been kind to us. You honored Charlie at the memorial services for him; we were most grateful to see you there, to hear your words, and to feel your support as you shared our grief. And we thank you for all the notes and letters you have written to us, telling us how Charlie touched your lives in large and small ways in the classroom, in the dorm or on the playing fields. Knowing that his life had some meaning for you and that you will remember him as a part of your lives at Williams is to us a confirmation of his life.

We still grieve deeply for Charlie, but we also celebrate the goodness of his life there with you. To his many friends, teachers, students and staff we send our thanks.

The Huffords

Chaplain should express herself

To the Editor:

Does the chaplain have the right to express her views publicly? Russell Day argues in the March 15 Record that she does not, that religion and politics must be forever separated in order to protect the young, impressionable minds of our campus from moral intimidation. This argument is remarkably condescending; furthermore, it lies fundamentally in conflict with the First Amendment.

Day is concerned that Rev. Pepper's personal position over the Nicaraguan war amounts to ethical coercion. As I understand our admissions policy, however, one must be at least reasonably intelligent to be admitted to Williams. I am willing to bet the average Eph, when walking by the Chaplain's office, is capable of recognizing that the view expressed there is only one opinion, not the absolute truth. I don't feel intimidated by Rev. Pepper, and I don't think I'm alone.

Day then argues that Rev. Pepper is tacitly supporting the immoral regime of the Sandinistas. The fact that the Sandinistas have committed atrocities is, in my view, indisputable. However, opposition to the Sandinistas is not equivalent to support for the contras, who have been at least equally negligent of human rights as the Sandinistas have. Replacing one murderer with another would not exactly meet Christian doctrine; "turn the other cheek," Christ argued, not "kill your enemy by any means." The Catholic Church has chosen to remain officially neutral over the conflict; Cardinal Obando y Bravo's support of the contras is strictly his own opinion. If Day is so concerned about religious figures misusing their offices, why doesn't he protest Obando's political statements.

Day's next argument in support of systematic censorship brings forth the specter of a conservative chaplain using his office to protect condoms. Goodness,

Cultural differences can help explain a pinch in the behind

by Diana Holtzman '89

Many misunderstandings and conflicts due to cultural differences were aired at Williams last semester at the race relations panel. Yet I don't think the event touched the core of the issue. I believe cultural differences are extremely powerful and cannot be resolved by simply "putting down our cultural baggage."

As an American abroad in a Latin culture, France in this case, I have heard the words "rude" and "impolite" thrown around carelessly by people describing cultures other than their own. American students, for example, find French students impolite because they smoke, eat and talk during class. Many American students give the French students disapproving looks to express their annoyance, but the French students don't realize what these glances mean. This infuriates the American students even more. Yet, if it is acceptable in the French university system to smoke, eat and talk, are the French students really being impolite?

The French, on the other hand, find the Americans impolite because they speak in a casual manner to people they don't know and especially, to those who are older than they. In France, this is a form of disrespect.

In the United States, when we buy something, it is polite to hand the money to the salesperson. In France, that is impolite; the money should be placed on the counter.

In all Latin cultures men comment on women's looks in the street; sometimes they even touch them.

This notion, then, of what is polite and what is rude is not an absolute. We cannot rightly say "it is polite to..." And yet, every culture takes politeness seriously.

In all Latin cultures men comment on women's looks in the street; sometimes they even touch them. For women brought up in the Anglo-Saxon culture, this is an invasion of their space, so the words "impolite" and "rude" spurt out. Yet the comment is not in itself rude, rather it becomes "rude" somewhere in transition between the two people from the two different cultures.

There are many such examples but I chose this last one for a particular reason. Latin Americans are included in the Latin culture with the French, Italians, flicts resulted from cultural differences. Imagine how powerful a barrier these differences are, that they affect even people who know each other very well.

"Putting down one's cultural baggage" is probably one of the hardest tasks to ask of anyone. It entails questioning every value and every instinct, both of which are taken for granted by everyone and therefore are not recognized as mere values or instincts. They are so deeply ingrained in everyone, and used in order to function in one society day after day, that they become invisible. It is therefore practically impossible, not to say impracticable, to destroy them completely.

Yet we could only benefit from shaking them up a bit. One method, the best, perhaps the only one, would be to immerse ourselves in an "other" culture. Thus we would in turn become the "other" culture, in other words, the minority. Would we dare accuse, while in Europe, every Frenchman, Italian, Spaniard and Portuguese of being rude?

Our greatest hardship, though, would be to be forced to bear prejudices against our own culture, to be called rude because of a simple misunderstanding of our habits (and there most certainly are strong prejudices against Americans in Europe).

Perhaps then, we wouldn't be so quick to turn a misunderstanding due to cultural differences into that cultural or social slur I've heard so often: "The —s are so rude."

Peer Health admits mistakes but maintains its impartiality

by Jennifer Fox '89 and Gerry Kirschner '88

Five months after the first copies of the Williams Guide to Health and Sex appeared on campus, the controversy began. In three recent issues of the Record, several Op-Ed pieces and letters concerning the Guide have been published. We, as coordinators of the Peer Health, feel a responsibility to reply to the (sometimes valid) criticisms that have been raised.

To begin with, we feel that Professor Drew is justified in questioning our statement that "heterosexuality is learned, not innate" in the section entitled "Sexuality and Sexual Preference" (Record of 3/8/88). This idea is difficult for many people to accept and we should have emphasized the specific assumptions that support this statement. Our self-defined role is to impartially inform the campus on health-related issues and as such our error was to present an idea that cannot be proven as fact. Unfortunately, due to the inherent inadequacies of language this Guide and we take full responsibility for its contents.

We are grateful to the Dean's Office and the Health Center for their monetary and substantive support in the production and planning. As acknowledged on the last page, the Guide was reviewed thoroughly, before publication, by Dean Spear and by Dr. Corkins. Their monetary support of the project (half the production cost) was obviously contingent on their approval of the subject matter and language of the Guide. Furthermore, upon learning that only freshmen were to receive copies of the Guide, Dean Flix asked that we print enough to give one to every student presently at the college and to the Class of '92. Professor Drew's comment that Dean Flix felt that the Guide had been "undersupervised" seems to conflict with the Dean's suggestion to expand the circulation.

Professor Drew's somewhat legitimate claims of poor scholarship seems to be generalized to a criticism of Peer Health in toto. To our knowledge, he spoke to no Peer Health members prior to writing his Letter to the Editor. A Peer Health member spoke with him by telephone after the Letter appeared and it was clear that he was unaware of the full scope of our activities on campus. Unfortunately, he did not appear at a meeting scheduled to be in his office and has not yet contacted the member to reschedule and to discuss his concerns.

To avoid further misunderstanding, we would like to re-emphasize that we strive to present the most impartial and informed counseling possible. We do not mean to encourage sexual relations; we simply wish to make certain that those who are sexually active understand the disease and pregnancy risks involved. We would like to remind those critical of our treatment of sex that we do regard abstinence as an important option (please see p. 34 of the Guide). In support of this, it is often one of the first issues raised in our freshman entry talks.

Admittedly, there are problems with the Guide. There will always be those who disagree with our methods and our philosophy. The best we can do is to work for impartiality and to focus on the assumptions which support our statements. It is undeniable that there is a need for student initiated health counseling. We intend to fulfill that need.

In November 1973, Cliff Shaw was stricken with cancer.

Fortunately, it was detected early enough. And with surgery, Cliff was able to continue living a healthy, active life. There was a time when such a diagnosis was virtually hopeless.

Inclusion sees leveling of preferences

Associate Dean of the College Mary Kenyatta called this year's freshman inclusion process a success. Results were posted in Baxter Hall after spring break. Ninety-three percent of all freshmen received their first or second choice housing category.

"I'm really pleased," Kenyatta said. "Last year about 90 percent got their first or second choice, and I didn't think we could get any higher."

Statistics released by Kenyatta also showed that only 14 students were placed in their fourth or fifth choice category, down from 51 a year ago and 56 in 1986.

The Greylock Quad was again the most popular choice for freshmen, although only 162 requested it as their first choice compared to 250 last year. Many students appear to have foregone Greylock in favor of Mission Park or the Row Houses, both of which had significant rises in first choice applicants.

Kenyatta said that the leveling out of preferences was responsible for the high percentage of students affiliated with their first or second choice. "Instead of trying to beat the system, people are putting down their real choices," she said. She also said she thought students are being more realistic in their choices, and that some of the aversion to the Berkshire Quad is dying down.

The BQ experienced its second consecutive rise in popularity, with 67 students requesting it as a first or second choice, up from 45 last year and 21 two years ago. Kenyatta credited BQ house presidents for the rise.

Dane Dudley '89, the president of Prospect House, said that he and others have made a conscious effort to alter stereotypes about the quad. "Everyone was involved in trying to change the image—not just to try to make us more popular, but to try to get people excited about living here," he said. Dudley said that throwing late night parties at Prospect and talking to Junior Advisors and freshman has helped.

Hart Murphy '88 brought about a discussion of the BQ's image problems in 1985 when he protested his placement there and called it a ghetto for the college's "misfits and homosexuals."

Room draws will begin soon, and some students will be bumped out of the houses with which they have been affiliated. This year, Prospect will be doing some of the bumping. "I think that's a first," Dudley said. "This year we have about ten people too many."

CUL forwards two proposals to Deans

Last week, the Committee on Undergraduate Life forwarded a proposal to modify the freshman advising system and a proposal for a student activities coordinator to the Dean's Office. The CUL discussed the proposals at last Tuesday's meeting.

The proposal to modify the current system of freshman advising calls for advisors to be assigned to freshmen based on student interest. According to Assistant Professor of Philosophy Peter Lipton, freshmen will either be assigned to one of their fall semester professors or to an advisor who shares an interest previously indicated by the student on a questionnaire.

The freshman advising proposal also suggests scheduling more meetings between the advisor and the student, and allowing some of the paperwork to be accomplished by other means. For example, Lipton said, a general informational meeting could be held, Junior Advisors could be given more registration material and a general fair could be held to introduce freshmen to departments.

"We want to shift the relationship (between advisor and advisee) from bureaucratic to intellectual," Lipton said at the meeting.

According to Professor of Mathematics Olga Beaver, Chairperson of the CUL, the Gaudino Committee recommended that students not be assigned advisors who they have as teachers because the student may be reluctant to meet with an advisor if he or she is doing poorly in the course, does not like the course or does not like the teacher.

"I think there could be, whether real or perceived, discomfort on the part of the student," she said, apparently in agreement.

But Lipton argued that such cases will be in the minority, and that the benefits of the proposal far outweigh the possible negatives. Marc Klaus '91 added that it may not be a bad thing for a student who is doing poorly in a course to meet with the professor.

The committee also discussed a proposal concerning a student activities coordinator. The position, which was originally suggested in the Gaudino Report, would serve a threefold purpose of increasing student awareness of campus and community events, coordinating events with a similar focus and helping professors to incorporate extracurricular events into courses. The proposal suggests that the position be filled by a recent Williams graduate.

Party Policy — "as liberal as is possible"

On February 29, Committee on Undergraduate Life Chairperson Olga Beaver forwarded the CUL's recommendations on party policy to Dean of the College Stephen Fix. The CUL recommended that the policy remain the same.

A memo sent from the CUL to Fix stated, "We feel that, given the current legal restrictions, the policy, as instituted in the spring of 1987, is as liberal as is possible; it is one with which all the members of the community can, and indeed must live. Any substantive relaxation of the policy would be legally unwise for both the college and its students."

In addition to their review of party policy, the CUL recommended the implementation of a campus-wide alcohol educational campaign. In the memo, the CUL suggested that, because freshmen are particularly vulnerable to alcohol abuse, a special effort should be made to educate them.

According to Associate Dean Mary Kenyatta, no decision has yet been reached on how to implement the educational campaign.

The CUL further recommended a meeting between the deans and house presidents with the purpose of "trying to help house presidents understand their role, especially concerning problems that center around the keg," Kenyatta said. According to the memo, house presidents and Deans could "discuss all the nuances of the policy, as well as the issue of appropriate party behavior."

Debate tournament is coming

At least thirty to fifty debaters will be coming to Williams to participate in the first annual Williams College Debate Tournament on April 15 and 16. The tournament is being organized by Brian Dolan '89, president of the debate society, and Dave Niles '89, vice-president.

According to Dolan, between 10 and 20 schools, including Oxford, Harvard, Yale, Amherst, Brown, Smith and Mt. Holyoke, will be sending debaters. A publicity match between Williams and Amherst is planned for the night of April 14 in Perry House.

This is the first tournament Williams has held since the beginning of the American Parliamentary Debate Tournament by Princeton University in the early 1970s. The Adelpic Speaking Union, the former Williams debate team, began in the 1800s but died out in the 1950s or 60s. Williams did not have a team again until 1985-86, when Alex Boutsell '88, Dolan and Niles started one.

According to Dolan, the team began because of a debate in his freshman English class, which was taught by Associate Professor David Smith. Afterwards Smith asked him if he was interested in starting a debate team.

Dolan said that most of the faculty was not interested, but Dean of the College Stephen Fix, who debated in college, was enthusiastic, and helped get the project started.

Buildings and Ground is giving the debate team the use of most of the science quad for the tournament, Dolan said.

The tournament will consist of parliamentary debate and public speaking. Dolan said that parliamentary debate differs from other types of two-man debate because little preparation is needed. The emphasis is on wit and extemporaneous speaking.

Off-Campus housing debate continues

Williamstown resident Martha Mercer asked Planning Board members at their March 29 meeting to consider changing town bylaws to prohibit students from living off-campus.

In a letter presented to the board, Mercer wrote, "Affluent students ... can pay very high room rents. Because town bylaws do not adequately protect residential neighborhoods, recently there has emerged a trend in which homes in a residential district are purchased and held by absentee landlords for the purpose of extracting high rents from ... transients."

Mercer's objections to off-campus housing can be traced to last September, when she learned that students would be living in a rented house on her street.

Mercer said the town could change the bylaws to require that landlords live in any dwelling they wish to rent to transients, or it could abolish an existing bylaw that permits unrelated adults to live in a home without the owner residing there.

Charles Schlesinger, chairman of the planning board, said no immediate action will be taken on the issue. "It's not part of our charter to get into college and town relations. If there's some sort of zoning to be done, the planning board will look into that, but whether that's even legal or not, I don't know."

The planning board is the latest in a long line of town bodies to consider the possibility of restricting off-campus housing. The Town-Gown committee addressed the issue in early March, and presented their concerns to the Board of Selectmen on March 14. Alan George, chairman of the Board of Selectmen, reported that no definitive action was taken at that meeting.

"Right now it's a major issue," said George. "We have to deal with a lot of serious concerns, including legality. We don't even know if it's within our jurisdiction." George went on to say the immediate future of the issue was uncertain, although he feels the Town-Gown committee is certain to continue their deliberations on the subject at their next meeting on May 5.

Meanwhile, through the seemingly endless meetings and discussions, Martha Mercer remains optimistic. "Our purpose," she wrote in a letter to The Transcript, "is to protect the character and integrity of our long-established residential neighborhoods from absentee landlord flophouses."

Ifill next Dean of Freshmen

Lecturer in Economics Roberto Ifill will become Dean of Freshmen on July 1. College President Francis Oakley announced the appointment in a letter to students last Thursday.

Ifill will succeed Associate Professor of Biology Joan Edwards, who will serve as Acting Dean of the College next year when Dean of the College Stephen Fix takes a sabbatical leave. Ifill is currently on leave in Washington as a fellow at the Brookings Institute. He will continue to teach in the economics department.

Ifill served as Assistant Dean of the College during the 1985-86 academic year. He has been at Williams since 1983.

Ephs bring help to Harlan County

by Michael Reisman

The 20 Williams students who traveled to Cranks, Kentucky over spring break expected the Appalachian coal-mining town to be a long way from home in more ways than one. What they didn't expect was the appreciation they would develop for the values held by the community that they had come to help.

"My idea of Appalachia was that of a strip-mined area," Jonah Neuman '89 said. "It was a lot different when I went down there. I could sense why people like living there. It was beautiful — a less complicated, less pressured, way of life."

This is the second year that the chaplain's office sponsored a trip for volunteers to assist the work of the Cranks Creek Survival Center. The center is run by husband-and-wife team Bobby and Becky Simpson, who have spent their entire lives in the area.

Phil Jordan '89, Chaplain Kathleen McNeely, and Katie Brennan '90 were among the Williams volunteers who spent part of spring break working in Harlan County, Kentucky with the Cranks Creek Survival Center. (Reisman) of the jobs that had existed in the area have disappeared with the closing of most large coal mines.

Attitudes

The students said working in the area changed their attitudes about it.

"People down there were more open than I thought they would be," Philip Jordan '89 said. "I was sensitive at first when asking questions so as not to offend them. After working and talking with people I found that we had a lot in common."

Amidst all the poverty and environmental decay there was a sense of an optimistic, dedicated people. Sarah Peterson '91 noted, "They seemed happier than I thought they would be. They also seemed to like a lot of things about the community."

Members of the group said they were surprised to discover that people who had previously moved away had returned to the area even after the floods.

The group split up daily into several small groups to work on individual projects, mostly painting, carpentry and cleaning. They learned that there are definite limits as to what 20 college students can do in a week's time. Although at times the results of their work was visible, such as a newly painted house, but there were times when the benefits of their work were not as obvious.

They said they also found that there is a danger in imposing help on people unaccustomed to receiving it. John Hitt '90 echoed the group's sentiments when he said that it was important for them to realize that it was not their place to go in and encroach upon another people's way of life.

"I went there with the attitude that what needs to be done is modernization," Peterson said. "However, you have to work within their framework. You

Dartmouth

Racial tensions continue at Dartmouth College as a number of minority students and officials question the sensitivity of the administration to the racial problems which exist on campus, reports the Berkshire Eagle. Black English professor Horace Porter said that Dartmouth is a white college that blacks are made to feel they should be extra grateful to have the privilege to attend. The charges of racial insensitivity stem from a Feb. 25 incident between a black music professor and four student contributors to the Dartmouth Review during which the four students harassed the professor. Three of the four students have since been suspended, and the fourth has been placed on probation. Along with the charges, students in the Afro-American Society are calling for the administration to initiate a course of racial education, because they believe that not enough people have knowledge of races beside their own. Black sophomore Kimberly Robinson said, "There's a lot of ignorance by people not knowing anything about black people, or women, or anything other than themselves." In spite of the problems, however, students are hopeful that new college president James Freedman will be a key factor in improving racial relations.

University of Pennsylvania

Dartmouth is not the only Ivy League school which is experiencing racial difficulties. According to a recent article in the Philadelphia Inquirer, a prestigious University of Pennsylvania fraternity has been shut down for 18 months because it hired two black female strippers for a party it hosted in October. This incident is only one of many that are the source of contention. According to critics of university policy, the administration has not dealt effectively enough with the racial discontent present among the black population. Among the issues which the black members of the UPenn community want to see addressed are ways to increase both the numbers of black students and black faculty members currently at the university. The administration noted, however, that attempts to bring more black students to UPenn are hampered by the fact that there has been a marked decline in the number of qualified students. Only 26 percent of black high-school students continue on to college today, down from 33 percent in 1976. Said President of the University Sheldon Hackney, "If we could have more black students, that would be terrific. But the competition from other schools is keen."

University of California at Berkeley

According to an editorial in the Berkshire Eagle, students at University of California at Berkeley who have chosen liberal arts majors, as opposed to business or engineering majors, are finding themselves unable to receive Citibank credit cards. Citibank failed to inform prospective cardholders that their major would determine whether or not their applications for credit would be accepted. The editorial reports that a Citibank representative recommended that a reporter for Berkeley's student newspaper in the process of applying for a credit card claim a major other than English, her actual major. Similarly, a student who had previously received a credit card at another university as a mathematics major was rejected upon his transfer to Berkeley and his switch to a rhetoric major. Citibank, meanwhile, has promised to change its present credit policy by the end of June.

UMass at Amherst

Jason Rabinowitz, the new student president-elect of University of Massachusetts at Amherst, has created an uproar in the school's student government because of his membership in UMass Young Communist League, according to a recent Berkshire Eagle article. Rabinowitz ran with Shari Silkoff, who is not a member of the League, as co-candidates in a liberal-radical coalition. The school senate, however, may have their election declared invalid, based on claims that the student constitution of the university does not provide for a co-presidency.

Rabinowitz, who does not plan to introduce communist ideas into the government if he remains in office, said he does not believe that his communist sympathies should present a problem. He said, "Communism, to me, means [being] concerned with working for a better world here at UMass. My opponents are trying to divert the issues." He claims that the allegation that a co-presidency is invalid is simply an excuse to prevent the liberal-radical coalition from assuming power. Some members of the student body, unlike many members of the current student government, do not mind the idea of a communist president. Said senior Cynthia Kenicki, "I don't find it offensive. I don't find it unusual for UMass. Anything goes here."

The Marie Brooks Dance Theatre performed "Swirling Skirts" as part of their presentation in Lasell last Saturday. (Sabin)

Marie Brooks troupe has youthful vitality

by Heidi Zimmerman

Looking at the stage in Upper Lasell Gymnasium last Saturday night, it was difficult to believe that most of the performers in the Marie Brooks Caribbean Dance Theatre were between the ages of eight and eighteen: the quality of the dances, and the enthusiasm that spread throughout the audience, all made their young ages easy to forget.

Marie Brooks prefaced the performance with an informal introduction explaining that the children had travelled to the Caribbean, Africa, and Third World countries to actively research their heritage and their culture. She called it the "barter method, meaning that we take what we need; we give you what we have."

After the first piece, a South African Welcome Dance frequently punctuated with high pitched squeals of "Eeeee-ya!", the dancers bounced back onto the stage, singing "Beat, beat, beat them drums." But they weren't the only ones bouncing: the audience moved to the drummers' contagious rhythm, which was usually led by twelve year old Alfred Shepherd.

One of the most memorable pieces focused on spiritual rituals adapted from what the children had learned after witnessing celebrations in Haiti,

Jamaica, Trinidad, and even Baptist churches of New York. Saad Muhammad, one of the drummers, even had a "solo" of sorts. "Brothers and Sisters!" he cried, as the dancers melted into kneeling positions, "AMEN!"

Saad was featured again in a duet with Delva Haynes, one of the dancers. They sang a song called "South African Rap for Social Change," which Saad had written himself. "I know about South Africa and I know what's goin' on," he rapped, the rest of the dancers backing him, chanting "Freedom!" after each line.

Swirling Skirts seemed to be a favorite among the several Season's final performance

Williams Trio performs works by Beethoven and Arensky

by Ellen Weld

The Williams Trio ended its season with a bang on Friday night in a concert that featured works by Bohuslav Martinu, Ludwig van Beethoven, and Anton Arensky. With Doris Stevenson on piano, Timothy Baker on violin, and Douglas Moore on cello, the group demonstrated its technical prowess as well as a keen sensitivity and musical expressiveness.

The concert began with Martinu's Trio No. 2 in D Minor, a three movement work written in 1950. Like many of Martinu's works, this piece blended Czech nationalistic ideas, jazz-like rhythms, and unique, often dissonant, harmonies within a traditional musical form. Throughout the entire piece, the musicians worked sensitively with one another, each maintaining a separate voice while also blending gracefully with the others. The group captivated the audience during the somber Adagio, projecting a lush but haunting sound to convey a restrained, dignified suffering.

The next piece, Beethoven's Sonata No. 3 in A Major, featured just the cello and piano. In the Allegro, Moore executed the long melodic lines with a rich lyricism and full-bodied sonority, while Stevenson complemented him with crisp, energetic chords. In the Scherzo, the two musicians conversed playfully with one another, tossing a dance-like motive back and forth in a "question and answer" pattern.

Arensky's Trio No. 1 in D Minor concluded the concert, and, in many ways, it was the strongest work of the evening. Composed in 1894 in memory of the Russian cellist Carl Davidov, the piece showed Tchaikovsky's influence upon Arensky, particularly in the Elegia. The trio played this movement with intense sensitivity, simultaneously communicating agony and melancholy reflectiveness. During the middle, contrastingly joyful section, Baker presented a lovely solo, preserving his clear, singing sonority even in the violin's higher registers.

The only mishap of the evening occurred at the beginning of the Arensky Finale, when the musicians failed to enter in unison, and were forced to begin the movement again. This did not seem to interfere with the playing, however, and the Finale moved forward steadily, ending with conviction. In an amusing and appropriately Russian manner, the musicians ended the concert with many kisses.

Flashy books feature contemporary artists

by Travis Pierson

Vintage Contemporary Books have been at the forefront of the new age in literature, producing slick, neon-hued paperbacks about Downtown hipsters in hell by contemporary authors such as Jay McInerney and Janet Hobhouse. Some have hailed the series for displaying the voices of a new generation, while others have dismissed their glossy packages as literary fast food for the MTV generation. The loudest noises made by the books, however, have been their success in sales.

More recently, Vintage Contemporary has stepped into the art market with their Artists series — paperbacks of interviews with contemporary artists. The first four in the series, published late last year, featured Francesco Clemente, Robert Rauschenberg, David

Salle and Eric Fischl. In keeping with Vintage Contemporary's sleek image, the covers each feature the name of the subject. Each book also includes a few color plates of the artist's work inside, along with some black and white reproductions.

The books' lengthy interviews make available the ideas of important contemporary artists, examining the artist's life from their birth to the present day. Also, the books' accessibility in terms of price and format helps the casual observer, one who might otherwise be baffled by the disparate objects thrown on a Salle canvas, to understand their meaning (or lack of it, as the case may be).

The only problem with the books is that the interviews sometimes do not go deep enough. The series is called Contemporary Artists, rather than Contemporary Art, but too often the dialogues rest on easy

Affirmative action group is still negotiating with Oakley

by Stephanie Jones

Negotiations between College President Francis Oakley and a multiracial group of Williams students that has been calling for a stronger college commitment to affirmative action continued in a meeting before spring break.

Oakley and members of the group are scheduled to meet again, but a date has not yet been set.

The group, which is calling itself the Coalition Against Racist Education, first met with Oakley on March 7 after issuing a set of 13 demands to Oakley and Dean of the College Stephen Fix. A list of the demands, some of which Oakley has already said the college will meet, was made public in an all-campus mailing distributed before spring break.

Germaine Belle '89, a member of the group, said that the group is informally structured and consists of more than the original 24 students who met with Oakley on March 7.

Belle said that she definitely thinks Oakley and the administration are willing to meet more of the group's demands, but she said she would not be willing to speculate about which demands they would meet or when they would be met. Oakley could not be reached for comment.

The mailing said that the group was dissatisfied with the basic goals and methodology of the college's affirmative action program for faculty hiring. "From our perspective the administration says only: 'you should be satisfied with the fact that we compare favorably with other schools whose efforts on minority hiring our just as ineffective as ours.'"

That statement was apparently a response to a March 2 college mailing that said, "Though we wish we had more minority faculty at Williams, in assessing our present situation one should compare Williams with other colleges and universities across the nation."

The mailing said that the percentage of minorities teaching full-time at institutions of higher education is about 10 percent, the same as Williams in 1987-88. The mailing came from Nancy McIntire, assistant to the president on affirmative action, and Acting Dean of the Faculty George Goethals.

Council discusses new Mission Park lights

by Gillian Lippert

The College Council will inform Dean of the College Stephen Fix that students want the installation of outdoor lights to continue at a quickened pace, Council President Trace Blankenship '89 said at last Thursday's meeting.

At the meeting, which was the first under the new administration, Blankenship said Fix had asked for students' opinions on the new lights around Mission Park.

Council member Catherine Dissly '90 said that several students thought that because of a combination of bright lighting and the bare landscaping resulting from a storm last October that caused the loss of trees and branches, the land in front of Mission Park now resembles a parking lot. Dissly suggested replanting as a solution.

Matt Levin '90 suggested that temporary lighting of some sort be installed in the Greylock parking lot, which he described as an area waiting for something to happen.

College Council Secretary John Bellwoar '89 made note of the comments and Blankenship said he will include them in a letter to Fix. Blankenship said he will stress that the college should push forward with installing lights where needed elsewhere on campus.

Blankenship ended the meeting by stressing the importance of the Council's commitment to the Kids' World playground project. Construction by volunteers near the Williamstown Elementary School is scheduled for the last week in April. Blankenship asked every council member to solicit their friends and houses to sign up to help.

New twist

In another twist on disinvestment advocacy, the ACSR voted down four proxies that asked companies to sever economic or business ties to South Africa. Members apparently felt that the wording of the proxies went beyond the policy of disinvestment advocacy, and by opposing the proxies they were not contradicting the policy.

"I think that at some point you have to draw the line in terms of your efforts," said Canty, during a discussion of a proxy asking Cummins Engine Company, Inc. to cut all of its economic ties to South Africa. "The reasonable expectation is to ask a company to get out."

ACSR chairperson Donald Dubendorf '75 called the Cummins proxy "a clumsy effort on the part of a proxy proponent to get at a very complicated world of relationships."

Economics professor Paul Clark, who is a committee member, said it is important to draw a distinction between selling and production activity in a country.

Embargo unreasonable

"My opinion is that selling exports to a country when it is not a unique product doesn't benefit it (the country) significantly ... it's not reasonable to try to block all exports to a country," he said.

Reed said in February that the college would embrace a new definition of withdrawal from South Africa advanced by the Teachers Insurance and Annuity Fund, the college's pension company. That definition specified "the termination of all marketing rights or obligations in South Africa, as well as any licenses, franchises, or other agreements to supply goods, materials, products, services or technology to that country."

The pension fund advanced the new definition, according to an article in the Chronicle of Higher Education, because it was "concerned that some of the corporations continued to have strong business ties to South Africa after supposedly having ended operations there."

The committee voted to support proxies asking Goodyear

Tire and Rubber Co., Caterpillar Tractor Co. and United Technologies to withdraw from South Africa.

Pine Cobble's effect on water supply disputed

by Michael Reisman

Williams College engineers and town officials are at odds over the potential environmental effects of the college's proposed $3 million Pine Cobble subdivision, to be used to provide land for faculty housing.

Town officials have stated that the site of the project, Pine Cobble Mountain, is a water-recharge area for the town's aquifers. The college maintains that the subdivision will lie low enough on the mountain so that it would not affect any water-recharge area.

The college has already begun doing preliminary site work on the 70-lot subdivision. Engineers of the BSC Group of Boston have been making test borings in order to help find water and sewage lines on the 210-acre tract, which lies off North Hoosac Road in the northeast corner of town.

College officials and engineers held a work session with town board members last week to present information obtained from the drillings. "At least at this point, where the subdivision would be does not appear to be in a water recharge area," said Pine Cobble project engineer Michael Kilish.

Will ask for comment

The college will soon file an Environmental Notification Form for the project with the state Executive Office of Environmental Affairs, which will ask for public comment on the project. The college will then learn whether it must file the more detailed and costly Environmental Impact Report. Assistant Director for Construction Services Antonio R. Janairo said that the college doesn't anticipate having to file an EIR.

The Definitive Subdivision Plan, which was filed by the college on February 16, is currently being considered by the Williamstown Planning Board, which has held preliminary hearings on the proposal. The next hearing is scheduled to take place tonight. Unless the

Students and faculty rack up awards, fellowships, grants

Two Williams graduates, Katharine Elliot '86 and Bruce Smith '86, were recently awarded Mellon Fellowships in the Humanities. The fellowship was created in 1982 to encourage students with an interest in teaching to pursue doctoral degrees. In their senior year, both received Herchel Smith Fellowships for study at Emmanuel College, Cambridge University, where this June they will be completing the B.A. in History. Elliot plans to pursue a Ph.D. in History, while Smith hopes to enroll in a joint Ph.D.-J.D. program in History and Law. Both students intend to pursue academic careers after completing their graduate studies.

Christopher Myers '88 has been chosen by the college to be this year's General Electric Fellowship recipient. The fellowship will cover the total costs of his first academic year of graduate work. Myers, a chemistry major, plans to pursue graduate study in chemistry, and is particularly accomplished in experimental work. According to Assistant Dean of the College Williams Wagner, Myers has completed several important and sophisticated research projects, some of which have already contributed to joint scholarly publications.

Pine Cobble

college asks for an extension, the board will render a decision on the plan by May 15.

At an open meeting held last month, town residents and officials told the college that they should study the effects of the subdivision on the town's water supply before going ahead with the project. Williamstown environmentalist Robert McCarthy Jr. went so far as to advocate a moratorium on building in the mountain recharge zone until a study is done.

Noted as recharge area

Pine Cobble was noted as a primary recharge area for the town's artesian aquifer in a 1983 hydrogeological report for the Berkshire County Regional Planning Commission. A water-recharge area is a natural conduit through which surface water seeps into subsurface water supplies.

According to Assistant Director for Construction Services Antonio Janairo, the engineers working on the Pine Cobble site have drilled in several places and they think that the subdivision rests on impervious glacial till, which will not hold water. Janairo agrees that Pine Cobble is a water-recharge area, but he believes that since the subdivision is in the lower reaches of the mountain, it will not affect water supplies.

Janairo added that the college has pledged a number of safety measures, such as a closed drainage system to prevent road salt contamination and catch basins that would trap any oil spills. The college is also considering restricting the use of herbicides and pesticides in the development.

Task Force warrant

The town's Growth Management Task Force will place a warrant article on the May annual town meeting to appropriate about $20,000 to hire a hydrogeologist to review the test borings already made by Williams' engineers. The town had earlier sought assistance from the BCRPC in order to conduct a study of the town's aquifers.

If the Planning Board approves the subdivision plan, it will then be considered by the Zoning Board of Appeals. The state Department of Environmental Quality Engineers and the Town Conservation Commission will provide comments at each step of the process, Janairo said.

The college anticipates that, assuming there are no major delays, early road and infrastructure construction may begin as early as August. Some of the units may be ready for construction next year.

Two Williams seniors have been awarded a Watson Fellowship for study and travel abroad next year. Peter English '88, a biology major, plans to travel to Costa Rica, Ecuador, Venezuela, Peru and Brazil in order to compare and evaluate the efforts being made in each of these countries to conserve the environment.

Dianne Rosky '88, a Psychology major, plans to explore the role of women as artists and producers in selected communities in Northern Thailand and the Kathmandu Valley of Nepal. Through an extended stay in a limited number of communities, Rosky hopes to learn about and experience alternatives to Western approaches to women's artistic and economic contributions to society.

The Faculty Committee on Graduate Fellowships has awarded Hubbard Hutchinson Memorial Fellowships in the Creative Arts to two members of the senior class. The recipients are Kathryn Kent '88, an English major, and Kristin Szilarto '88, a Theater major.

Kent hopes to pursue a career combining the composition of poetry with teaching literature and creative writing. During the first year of the fellowship, she will live in Williamstown and then either London, England or Berkeley, trying to complete a manuscript of her poetry for publication. She will use the second year of the award to begin graduate study in English literature and creative writing.

Szilarto plans to use the fellowship to enable her to hold an internship in directing at one of several small regional theaters that are currently producing new, experimental plays, especially by women playwrights. She also hopes to complete a cabaret project as well as continue her research on women and feminist playwrights.

Assistant Professor of Philosophy Peter Lipton has received a $3,500 stipend for summer research from the National Endowment for the Humanities.

The grant will support Lipton's research for a book, "Inference to the Best Explanation." Lipton's work involves developing and assessing a theory of inductive reasoning according to which we infer from the evidence available to us what would be the best explanation of that evidence.

Assistant Professor of Mathematics Colin Adams has been awarded a $48,100 grant from the National Science Foundation to support his project, "Cusp volumes in Hyperbolic Three-Manifolds."

Adams' project will examine new ways to differentiate between hyperbolic three-manifolds. Three-manifolds are geometric objects that look like three-dimensional space, much in the way the surface of the earth looks like a plane, or a flat two-dimensional surface, until one gets far enough away from it to see that it is a sphere.

ham was never really in this contest as solid scrum play led by Jeff Holley '89, Chris Palmedo '89, and Will Lafave '90 and relentless defense complimented the offensive onslaught.

Twenty-four hours before, on the more hospitable grounds of Cole Field, the WRFC split a pair of matches against not-so-rival North Adams State College. A combined C and D team for Williams swept away the Mohawk A-side, riding the fleet-footed wing-play of Salvatore Vasi '91. The second match was played to a draw after the first half, but the more experienced NASC B-side was too much for the young Williams E and F team, and the referee's final whistle blew with the Mohawks atop 12-0.

can't look at their way of life as inferior. Our notions of progress and efficiency don't have the same importance there."

Jim Santos '90 reflected on the community orientation of people in the area. "I was looking at something that is missing in our lives — values that exist there that don't in our upper-middle-class society. We have a career orientation instead of closeness."

Group members cited a Pentecostalist church service and an informal jam session as giving them a strong sense of the values of the people they met. The church service showed how intensely some held their faith, despite hardships, and the concert showed us how much they could enjoy themselves. The concert was like a culmination, said Santos. "They invited us in and treated us like family."

It Takes Real Caring to Pick Up the Pieces.

It takes more than a good education and good intentions. It takes real caring—a genuine desire to make a difference in the development of someone's life.

At The KEY Program, Inc., of Massachusetts and Rhode Island, we specialize in matching human service and criminal justice professionals with casework they can be proud of: the opportunity to change the course of a troubled life. We're looking for dedication and enthusiasm in our Caseworkers, who work with court-involved and troubled adolescents in both residential and outreach positions.

And we offer you more than this challenge alone. As a member of our team, you'll find your professional growth and development will be encouraged with generous tuition reimbursement, and rewarded with real supervisory potential. You'll also enjoy extensive training, a competitive salary of $17,000 per year, and comprehensive benefits in this unique 14-month position. Relocation assistance is available.

To join us in our work, you need a Bachelor's degree in a related human service field, a high energy level and the commitment to help teenagers pick up the pieces of their lives — and put them back together.

Caseworker College Recruitment

Opportunities are available in the following locations throughout Massachusetts: Springfield, Worcester, Lowell, Westboro, Fall River, Wareham, Hyannis, Lawrence, Methuen and Pittsfield. We also have openings in our Providence, Rhode Island, office.

Interested applicants should look for our representatives on campus, send their resumes or call our Main Office for more information.

North Adams, a cost analysis of construction and a projected budget of income and expenses for the first five years of operation. If Administration and Finance finds the results of the study acceptable, money would be authorized next April, Thompson said.

About 600 jobs

Barrett said that Mass MoCA will bring about 600 jobs to North Adams, and inject an estimated $21 million into the local economy.

He said that he will announce the names of members of a museum authority which will oversee the construction and operation of the museum. The body will probably consist of seven members. He said that Williams College President Francis Oakley and himself, as Mayor of the City of North Adams, will be members of the authority. The other members will be selected based on expertise in the museum field.

College Treasurer William Reed said that the authority members will consist of people "with high-powered reputations," including members of the art world who have the ability to attract international art.

He also said that there was a chance that Krens would sit on the board. Krens is leaving WCMA to serve as director of New York's Guggenheim museum in July.

Commenting on the museum's significance, Thompson said, "Mass MoCA can be as important to the art of its time, that is, the '60s, '70s and '80s, as the Museum of Modern Art is to the art of its time, that is, the pre-World War II era."

Artists include Warhol

So far, preliminary agreements have been reached for long-term loans from the collections of three prominent art collectors and the German Architecture Museum of Frankfurt. Artists represented so far include Andy Warhol, Jim Dine, Richard Serra, Ashley Bickerton and James Rosenquist. Much of the work is large-scale art which supporters have said is best viewed in areas with large space and with few other works to compete with. They have also said that the spaces in the Sprague Electric Company's Marshall Street Complex, which will house the museum, will serve the purpose perfectly.

answers, glossing over the philosophies behind the artists' work, instead discussing less unimportant aspects of the artists' lives. More searching questions and telling answers would make the books of greater service to art historians as well as the general reader.

The best of the series is Barbara Rose's interview with Rauschenberg (I haven't read the Clemente interview). Even though Rauschenberg has been around since the Fifties, his ideas and work are as up to date as the other artists interviewed, and his interaction with the artists of the last three decades gives him a richer historical perspective than Fischl or Salle.

An ambivalent cynicism towards art and the world at large seems to be the uniform opinion of the artists in the series. When asked about the avant-garde, Rauschenberg replied, "That's another one of those things I dislike. Labeling things avant-garde art. What a confusing situation it is — you have to hate something long enough and consistently enough in order for it to later be labeled great. First you have to be hated, and then they all love you. That's the situation we're in now."

Two more additions to the Vintage Contemporary Artists series are arriving later this year, featuring interviews with Louise Bourgeois and Arthur Sultan.

dances. In contrast to the other pieces, it was more fluid and light, like the flute music which replaced the drums as the accompaniment. In long, full dresses the dancers twirled across the stage, so that their heads were the center of dizzying, brightly colored spirals.

Only a little more than an hour after it had begun, the performance ended with a Carnival finale. It included Clyde Walker, who jumped about on fifteen foot stilts. Marie Brooke herself joined the dancers onstage, as did Tasha Norman, a junior, who is a graduated member of the company, and responsible for inviting them to Williams. Everyone had a short solo before giving Marie a hug, while the rest of the group sang their names. The close, family-like feeling between the company members was obvious, and if the finale seemed to drag out, the audience didn't seem to mind, responding with a standing ovation.

The next group coming to Williams will be Marta Renzi and Company. They will be performing in Upper Lasell on April 15th and 16th.

An equal opportunity, affirmative action institution loved his family. He cared about things like the Scouts."

Yet, for all his strengths, she said, Skinner had one main weakness: "He couldn't say 'no.' He tried to do too much."

"He was depressed—I mean clinically depressed—and had been for some time. But he had continued to function perfectly normally," she said. "There wasn't something that hit him that nobody could face."

Mrs. Skinner said she thought overcommitment to teaching, scholarly and community activities did not lead him to take his own life. "I don't think it happened because he was too devoted," she said. "It was an illness like any other, but this one turned out to be incurable. I don't want those things that he did to be forgotten. That was the real Jim Skinner. That person who killed himself was somebody else."

Besides his responsibilities as instructor, director of laboratories and department chairman, Skinner had also been Williams' pre-medical advisor since 1975. He worked with pre-med students throughout the entire application process.

"He knew it inside and out," said Mary Ellen Ulmer '88, who will be attending Northwestern University Medical School. "His biggest strength was his incredible organization." A college press release said that medical schools accepted 90 percent of his advisees.

In addition to his concern for the instruction of his students, Skinner was concerned about making the chemistry building itself an educational experience, according to Professor of Chemistry Lawrence Kaplan. "He'd spend a lot of time on a bulletin board," Kaplan said. He'd hang [models of] molecules from lights and ask people to guess what they were."

Mrs. Skinner said her husband loved to work with his hands and enjoyed glassblowing and carpentry.

He put his interest in manual labor to work when he and his wife, on sabbatical from Williams in 1970-72, set up science facilities and taught at a new secondary school in northern Nigeria. "My husband and I were the chemistry department," Mrs. Skinner said.

Skinner was born on July 19, 1940, in St. John, New Brunswick. He received his M.S. and Ph.D. from Yale University and was a postdoctoral fellow there and at University College in London.

His students were notified of his death by a letter sent out over spring break by the chemistry department.

Mrs. Skinner, who is currently running for a position as Williams town Selectman against incumbent J. O'Brien Locke, said she will remain in the race.

Besides his wife, Skinner is survived by his daughter, Elizabeth, 20; his sons, Andrew, 18, and Matthew, 14; his mother, Helen Skinner; a sister, Diana Aske; a brother, Bernard Skinner; and several nieces and nephews.

A college memorial service was held last Sunday in Thompson Memorial Chapel. The family asks that in lieu of flowers donations be made to Boy Scout Troop No. 70 through the Hopkins Funeral Home or to the James F. Skinner memorial fund through the President's Office.

Baseball drubs Dartmouth 11-5

by Scott Mozarsky

After an impressive 500 (5-5) start in Florida, the Williams baseball team started their Northern season by splitting two games last week. The Ephs opened their season at home on Thursday and lost 8-5 to RPI. Although losing the opener at home was disappointing, the Ephs showed tenacity in coming back from a 7-0 deficit in the early innings.

RPI took the lead on the hot hitting of sophomore right fielder Omar Portuguese who drove in two runs in both the third and fourth innings. The Ephs cut the lead down to 7-3 in the fifth inning with a two-run single by designated hitter Scott Kennedy '89 and a walk by senior Steve Holsten which forced in a run. Senior Sean Logan then scored on a wild pitch to bring the Ephs within three, but that was as close as the game got.

Hot hitting

Even in defeat, two Ephs continued the hot hitting that they exhibited in Florida. Jim Duquette '88, this week's Bud-wleser Athlete of the Week, continued to rip the ball with two singles and exhibited excellent base running by coming away with two steals. Brian Harwell '90 also had two singles.

Dartmouth clubbed

Coming off of the RPI defeat, the Ephs travelled to Dartmouth on Sunday and took out their frustrations on the Big Green with an 11-5 victory. The game was highlighted by the impressive pitching of Junior Chris Conway who shut Dartmouth out for the first five innings while Williams took a 4-0 lead.

Conway tired in the sixth however, and the Green tied the score at 4-4. In the seventh, the Ephs exploded for five runs. The rally started as Chris Donato '89 reached on an error and then went to second on a single by Logan. After a double steal, the two players were driven home on a single by Duquette, who then stole second and third. The two steals gave Duke, who went 3-5, a total of five for the week and reinforced assessments by fans that he is the "Tim Lincecum" of Williams College. After an intentional walk to Holsten, Duquette was driven home when Kennedy hit into a fielders choice. The inning was capped off by a two-run homer by Chris Pachus.

Holsten homers

The Williams offense was paced by Duquette, Holsten and Pachus. Pachus had two hits and three RBI's while Holsten was 3 for 3 with a home run, triple and four RBI's. Holsten's offensive showing had to make Coach Briggs feel great as the team missed Holsten all last year when he spent his junior year abroad in Oxford. Just as impressive had to be the performances of both Conway and freshman Chris Pentz. Conway went 5 1/3 innings and allowed only three runs and Pentz used a mixture of heat and off-speed deliveries to allow only two runs in 3 2/3 innings and gain his first collegiate victory.

The Dartmouth win pushed the Ephs record to 6-6 overall and 1-1 since coming back North. Williams will try to continue its winning ways as it hosts Trinity on Tuesday and goes to North Adams State on Thursday.

Senior reliever Scott Garfield starts his delivery against RPI on Thursday. The squad dropped that contest 8-5 in their first game north of the Mason-Dixon line. The Ephs finished their Florida trip with a solid 5-5 record. (McDermott) how would our impressionable Ephs survive that form of mind control? I can only argue that a conservative chaplain would have the same right to free speech that a liberal one would have; contras or contraceptives, freedom of speech is freedom of speech. After all, the entire point of college — after making money, of course — is to open our minds to all sides of an argument, not to censor the ones with which we disagree. We shouldn't stifle what little meaningful debate we have on campus.

The First Amendment applies to the Chaplain as well as private citizens. An act to bar a religious official from political discussion, whether by government or by Williams College, would be a clear-cut violation of First Amendment rights; it would be an attempt to limit the exercise of worship, and to define its form within those limits. Indeed, it would be difficult to imagine an America without activism led by religious figures such as Rev. Martin Luther King. Rather than underestimating the intelligence of Williams students and protecting them by censorship, we should act to encourage the expression of all views. Argue with the Chaplain, if you wish, but don't deny her fundamental right to argue.

Offers a way to heal the pain of racism

To the Editor:

We have heard many, many words spoken on the subject of racism in recent weeks. We have seen minority students meet with the administration on this matter. We have seen the administration issue policy statement after policy statement, clarifying, reiterating and defending their position. We have seen articulate and capable members of faculty from different departments speak intelligently and academically on various perspectives of the anatomy and physiology of this beast in our midst — racism.

There are many things that we have not seen very much of in the public arena, though. We have not seen, out in the open, the deep pain that those who have been victims of racial prejudice carry with them. We have not seen, face to face, the bitterness and anger that these people have nurtured within them. We have not looked in the eye the sullen resentment of those who find themselves accused of racial prejudice. We have not truly stared at the hatred, numbness and insecurity in the hearts of those who have inflicted pain on others by their racial prejudice. Indeed we have not honestly examined the reactions and emotions within each of us. (In the words of a friend, this monster that we call racial prejudice lives in each one of us, black, brown, yellow or white; student, staff or faculty, rich or poor.)

We have not been willing to face these emotions and feelings, real as they are. Indeed, I understand that a Commission on Race Relations Panel last semester opened by urging people not "to be emotional." I submit that we have been so cautious (and we have ignored some very real issues), not only because we have been concerned with propriety and "civilized discourse" but also because we have recognized that we are helpless in the face of the powerful forces that rule our hearts. No panel, no academic discussion on the historical power struggle between ethnic groups, no hiring policy adjustments; none of these on their own can heal the wounds that several (yes, several) members of our community carry around with them. What or who will heal these wounds then? I have been fairly vocal in the past in pointing to the person of Jesus Christ. I hesitate to make sweeping prescriptions. Yet the force of my personal experiences, and the evidence that I have seen in other people's lives (both those that I know personally and those that are documented) compel me to urge you to consider and to experience him: afresh. Just in case you are now turning away at what appears to be yet another weak and simplistic solution, let me assure you that I do not consider that this solution to the problems of racial prejudice is either weak or naive. This is not the place, nor am I the person to hold forth on the details of what Jesus Christ has to say and do on this subject, but may I suggest that with a Bible, an open mind and heart, and a quiet place and some time, things may begin to happen. Please consider this.

Bolin Fellowships are intended to support minority graduate students for a year while they complete their dissertations and teach a one-semester course at Williams.

CARE also demanded that students be required to take a course in minority history and/or culture and that the college establish an Afro-American major with a permanent chair by 1989-90. The college currently offers a concentration in Afro-American studies. Oakley referred the group's suggestions to the Campus Commission on Race Relations and the Afro-American Studies Committee.

Other demands included:

- The establishment of a Minority Special Assistant to the President. The position would be filled by a black or Hispanic-American and would be responsible for non-student affirmative action.

- The creation of a non-voting minority chair on the Committee on Appointments and Promotions, which currently consists of only white males.

- Increased recruitment and scholarships for black and

- Two visiting professorships for Hispanic-American faculty by 1988-89.

- One black and one Hispanic-American tenure track professor in a Division Three department by 1989-90.

- The percentage of black and Hispanic-American faculty in any year be at least equivalent to the percentage of blacks and Hispanic-Americans in the student body.

whistle which signalled the Eph's doom was met only with the crowd's stunned silence of disbelief.

Hill puts Ephs away

Hamilton thus entered the sudden death overtime period with both possession of the ball and a man up. Lambert turned away the first Continental offering, but the Ephs couldn't gain possession. Thirty-seven seconds into OT, Hamilton star Pete Hill touched twice for the game-winner. Hill had tortured the Williams defense all day as he racked up five goals and three assists. "Once we weathered the storm, we controlled the game well, with one exception — Pete Hill. He's just a real strong player," said Lamb.

Nevertheless, Lamb was pleased with the way his team dealt with adversity. "The kids proved a lot to themselves today. We outscored them over the last 56 minutes 10-4. I hate to lose, but I can't see us ever giving up six goals like that again."

Aside from the early lapse, the Ephs played excellent lacrosse except for one noticeable flaw which worried Lamb — only three of 10 goals were assisted. "If it [the early barrage] had any effect on us, it was to make us revert to individual play. Our better game is passing, we were trying to beat Hamilton, not play good lacrosse," said Lamb.

Trounce Albany

Earlier in the week, the Ephs downed Albany 19-8. Brent Powell lead the attack with three first period goals, as Williams dominated the early going to take a 6-1 lead. Smith ripped the nets three times and Boyd twice en route to the victory. Fuller and Rodgers were stellar at the midfield, winning 30 of 33 faceoffs. Williams won the game with their familiar ball control offense, frustrating Albany by controlling the ball over 75% of the time.

Still, the Eph defense showed some weak spots in that while they cleared the ball well, when Albany did have the ball they scored too easily, putting in their eight goals during only fourteen minutes of possession.

Coach Lamb says he will stand by his defense, making no changes in preparation for this week's action as the Ephs travel to Westfield State Thursday in preparation for Saturday's battle versus Tufts. Last year the Ephs and the Jumbos split two games, with Tufts winning the regular season contest 7-6 while Williams took away an 8-7 victory in the second round of the ECAC playoffs.

SPORTS SHORTS

W. Rugby

The WWRFC kicked off their spring season Saturday with two matches against the Albany Women's Club. The A-side faced an extraordinarily strong Albany scrum, yet still dominated the play with quick thinking and perseverance.

Senior scrum captain Sonja Lengnick ran the ball in from a maul near the try line in the first half to score. The remainder of the contest was a shutout as Albany was unable to get through the tenacious Williams defense.

The B and C sides joined forces in the second match. In the first half the B's held the score at a tied 3-3, with fullback Katy Carr '91 scoring on a penalty kick. An enthusiastic C side took over in the second half as many of the women dove with vigor into their first match ever.

The greater level of experience of the Albany club proved too much for the enthusiastic C-siders, however, as Albany tallied three tries and two conversions for a final score of 19-3.

The B and C sides will be at home this weekend playing Bates and Trinity, while the A's take to the road to attend a New England Rugby Football Union tournament.

M. Crew

The Williams College Men's Crew Team has begun its '88 season with two very strong performances against Drexel University on April 2 and against the powerful Dartmouth lightweight this last Sunday. After defeating Dartmouth, the first varsity boat's record is 2-0; the second varsity is 1-1, having lost to Dartmouth by a few seconds.

The first boat had a powerful start against Dartmouth, opening a seven seat lead by the 1000 meter half way mark. Taking advantage of an inside lane, the Green began a come back move which cut the Williams' lead to three seats with 500 meters to go. Dartmouth started their final sprint early, taking their rating up to 40 strokes per minute. Williams then responded with its sprint but with 20 strokes to go the boats were dead even. Williams, stroked by co-captain Tim Bock '88, then made a final push, but after crossing the finish line neither crew knew who had won. Williams emerged the victor, edging Dartmouth out by .4 seconds, 5:47.7 to 5:48.1.

The second varsity boat, coming off of a decisive 18 second humiliation of Drexel, lost by one boat length to Dartmouth's second eight, but easily beat the Green's third boat. This race mirrored the results of the earlier Novice lightweight eight race where Williams lost by two boat lengths to Dartmouth's first freshman boat, but defeated its second eight. The Novice lightweight eight is now 1-1, having defeated Drexel the week before in Philadelphia by over four seconds.

The Williams lightweight four did not race this last weekend in Hanover. In Philadelphia it suffered its first defeat against a strong heavyweight Drexel boat after a close first 1000 meters.

Head Coach Matt Hettie is pleased with his team's performance in the first two weeks of the racing season, after its productive two weeks of Spring Break training on the Potomac in Washington, D.C. Hettie's strategy is to finalize his boats' personnel before this weekend's race against W.P.I. and Conn. College so that they will have enough time to work together before the Little Three Regatta in Amherst the following week.

WUFO

The Williams Ultimate Frisbee Organization opened their spring season Saturday with a strong tournament showing at SUNY Albany. Playing in cold, windy conditions after only a week of practice, and missing some key players, WUFO showed they were the same team that had ended last fall with only one loss.

The first game of the season, against SUNY Binghamton, was the toughest game of the season. WUFO's defense was impressive, but the team couldn't find the finishing power, losing a commanding 12-9 lead to fail 12-15.

Next WUFO faced Locomotion, a club team from Albany. In a tight battle, the Ephmen fell behind 8-10, then came afire to outscore Loco 6-1 for the win, led by the acrobatics of President Joe Escherick '88. The next game against Scam Ultimate was dominated by the WUFO zone defense, the Ephs triumphing 15-12.

WUFO grew lax in the final game against Syracuse U., an expected easy win, and fell behind 6-9 before exploding for five straight points to win 11-9. The Eph zone carried the day, with intense support from Chris Page '89 inside and high-flying help from deepman Hal Hermanson '89. After such solid early play, the team is looking forward to a spectacular season.

Men's A and B ruggers
maul Framingham State

by Andy Harris

Propelled by 4 victories during spring break, the White Dogs of the WRFC romped to 16-4 victory over Framingham State College in the regular season opener. The WRFC, never trailing, snatched an early 3-0 lead as senior fullback Jon Hollenberg converted a penalty kick. But swings in momentum typified the first half as neither team could effectively execute its offensive plan. The larger and faster Framingham line repeatedly attacked a steadfast Williams defense with hard straight-ahead running. Not intimidated, the Dogs repelled each challenge, slowly sapping the drive from the Framingham team.

The crafty White Dog backs continually frustrated their opponents with ingenious running and deftly placed kicks, and with superior pursuit and support offered by the forwards, Williams eroded Framingham's offense. Marching 10 meters off a scrum-down, the irresistible force of the Williams pack pushed Framingham across their own try-line before Mark Stepsis '89 pounced on the ball for the score. A Hollenberg kick raised the lead to 9 points.

Framingham comes back

Williams early success was not, however, enough to extinguish the explosive Framingham team. With 30 minutes gone in the first half, Williams lock Tom Bottern '89 retired from the pitch after an injury to his left eye. The loss of the 6'5", 235 pound Bottern forced Williams to play a man short and the psychological impact of this disadvantage seemed to shake the WRFC. A 60 meter kick that pinned the Dogs mere inches from their own goal deflated them even further, and with only seconds left in the half, Framingham rolled in for the score, before missing the conversion.

After the intermission Williams rallied to dominate the host Rams over the final 40 minutes. Senior Hollenberg posted a second penalty score to raise the lead to 12-4, while Chap Peterson '90 galloped 25 meters for a try to extend the margin to 12 points. Every Framingham bid to score was denied over the second period, and as frustration gave way to desperation for the hosts, Williams took complete control of the game.

It was Halloween weekend '87 that Framingham State dismissed the WRFC from the divisional playoffs at Orono, Maine. That painful overtime loss burned intensely over the long Berkshire winter, making Saturday's victory especially gratifying. Said senior captain Michael Sullivan, "you can't ever re-write history. But with sufficient preparation and the right attitude, you can properly avenge gross injustice."

Killer B's sting

Hanchlich overpowers Amherst in six-hitter

by Christopher Jepson

The women's softball team opened its 1988 campaign in dazzling form by pummeling hapless Amherst 18-5 at Cole Field on Saturday. First year coach Dave Caputi was pleased with the women's all-around performance, which included 19 hits, of those 3 doubles and a triple, commenting, "We played well for an opening game."

In a game where all members of the squad participated, there were many individuals who stood out. Perhaps the brightest star was freshman pitcher Cathy Hanchlich, who threw the entire game, giving up six hits, striking out five, and surrendering only one earned run through seven innings.

The game started a little shaky for the Ephwomen when the Lady Jeff's produced two unearned runs to begin the contest. The Lady Jeffs reached on a walk and a hit batter, and Hanchlich was able to retire two hitters before an infield throwing error brought home the two baserunners. The freshman, showing the composure of a senior, struck out the next batter to end the threat.

Nether the lead nor the Ephwomen's opening day jitters seemed to last long as they countered with 5 runs in both the first and third innings. The eight run lead not only put the game out of reach, but proved to be demoralizing to the visitors, who could muster only three more runs for the rest of the game, and those came in the seventh and final inning.

Offensively for the Ephwomen, three hitters led the way: Nancy Hedeman '89 produced a single and a double, as well as 3 RBI's; Jackie Weider '91 also punched out a single and a double; and Hanchlich helped her own cause by contributing with 2 singles and a double, as well as 3 RBI's.

The women try to make it two in a row this Thursday when they travel to Union to face the ever dangerous Dutchwomen.

The WWRFC kicked off their spring season Saturday with two matches against the Albany Women's Club. The A-side faced an extraordinarily strong Albany scrum, yet still dominated the play with quick thinking and perseverance.

Senior scrum captain Sonja Lengnick ran the ball in from a maul near the try line in the first half to score. The remainder of the contest was a shutout as Albany was unable to get through the tenacious Williams defense.

The B and C sides joined forces in the second match. In the first half the B's held the score at a tied 3-3, with fullback Katy Carr '91 scoring on a penalty kick. An enthusiastic C side took over in the second half as many of the women dove with vigor into their first match ever.

The greater level of experience of the Albany club

proved too much for the enthusiastic C-siders, however, as Albany tallied three tries and two conversions for a final score of 19-3.

The B and C sides will be at home this weekend playing Bates and Trinity, while the A's take to the road to attend a New England Rugby Football Union tournament.

The Williams College Men's Crew Team has begun its '88 season with two very strong performances against Drexel University on April 2 and against the powerful Dartmouth lightweights this last Sunday. After defeating Dartmouth, the first varsity boat's record is 2-0; the second varsity is 1-1, having lost to Dartmouth by a few seconds.

The first boat had a powerful start against Dartmouth, opening a seven seat lead by the 1000 meter half way mark. Taking advantage of an inside lane, the Green began a come back move which cut the Williams' lead to three seats with 500 meters to go. Dartmouth started their final sprint early, taking their rating up to 40 strokes per minute. Williams then responded with its sprint but with 20 strokes to go the boats were dead even. Williams, stroked by co-captain Tim Bock '88, then made a final push, but after crossing the finish line neither crew knew who had won. Williams emerged the victor, edging Dartmouth out by .4 seconds, 5:47.7 to 5:48.1.

The second varsity boat, coming off a decisive 18 second humiliation of Drexel, lost by one boat length to Dartmouth's second eight, but easily beat the Green's third boat. This race mirrored the results of the earlier Novice lightweight eights race where Williams lost by two boat lengths to Dartmouth's first freshman boat, but defeated its second eight. The Novice lightweight eight is now 1-1, having defeated Drexel the week before in Philadelphia by over four seconds.

The Williams lightweight four did not race this last weekend in Hanover. In Philadelphia it suffered its first defeat against a strong heavyweight Drexel boat after a close first 1000 meters.

Head Coach Matt Hettie is pleased with his team's performance in the first two weeks of the racing season, after its productive two weeks of Spring Break training on the Potomac in Washington, D.C. Hettie's strategy is to finalize his boats' personnel before this weekend's race against W.P.I. and Conn. College so that they will have enough time to work together before the Little Three Regatta in Amherst the following week.

WUFO

The Williams Ultimate Frisbee Organization opened their spring season Saturday with a strong tournament showing at SUNY Albany. Playing in cold, windy conditions after only a week of practice, and missing some key players, WUFO showed they were the same team that had ended last fall with only one loss.

The first game of the season, against SUNY Binghamton, was the toughest game of the season. WUFO's defense was impressive, but the team couldn't find the finishing power, losing a commanding 12-9 lead to fall 12-15.

Next WUFO faced Locomotion, a club team from Albany. In a tight battle, the Ephmen fell behind 8-10, then came afire to outscore Loco 6-1 for the win, led by the acrobatics of President Joe Escherick '88. The next game against hosts Scam Ultimate was dominated by the WUFO zone defense, the Ephs triumphing 15-12.

WUFO grew lax in the final game against Syracuse U., an expected easy win, and fell behind 6-9 before exploding for five straight points to win 11-9. The Eph zone carried the day, with intense support from Chris Page '89 inside and high-flying help from deep man Hal Hermanson '89. After such solid early play, the team is looking forward to a spectacular season.

Men's A and B ruggers maul Framingham State

by Andy Harris

Propelled by 4 victories during spring break, the White Dogs of the WWRFC romped to 16-4 victory over Framingham State College in the regular season opener. The WWRFC, never trailing, snatched an early 3-0 lead as senior fullback Jon Holenberg converted a penalty kick. But swings in momentum typified the first half as neither team could effectively execute its offensive plan. The larger and faster Framingham line repeatedly attacked a steadfast Williams defense with hard straight-ahead running. Not intimidated, the Dogs repelled each challenge, slowly sapping the drive from the Framingham team.

The crafty White Dog backs continually frustrated their opponents with ingenious running and deftly placed kicks, and with superior pursuit and support offered by the forwards, Williams eroded Framingham's offense. Marching 10 meters off a scrum-down, the irresistible force of the Williams pack pushed Framingham across their own try-line before Mark Stephens '89 pounced on the ball for the score. A Holenberg kick raised the lead to 9 points.

Framingham comes back
Williams early success was not, however, enough to extinguish the explosive Framingham team. With 30 minutes gone in the first half, Williams lock Tom Bottern '89 retired from the pitch after an injury to his left eye. The loss of the 6'5", 235 pound Bottern forced Williams to play a man short and the psychological impact of this disadvantage seemed to shake the WWRFC. A 60 meter kick that pinned the Dogs mere inches from their own goal deflated them even further, and with only seconds left in the half, Framingham rolled in for the score, before missing the conversion.

After the intermission Williams rallied to dominate the host Rams over the final 40 minutes. Senior Holenberg posted a second penalty score to raise the lead to 12-4, while Chap Peterson '90 galloped 25 meters for a try to extend the margin to 12 points. Every Framingham bid to score was denied over the second period, and as frustration gave way to desperation for the hosts, Williams took complete control of the game.

It was Halloween weekend '87 that Framingham State dismissed the WWRFC from the divisional playoffs at Orono, Maine. That painful overtime loss burned intensely over the long Berkshire winter, making Saturday's victory especially gratifying. Said senior captain Michael Sullivan, "you can't ever re-write history. But with sufficient preparation and the right attitude, you can properly avenge gross injustice."

Killer B's sting

Hanclich overpowers Amherst in six-hitter

by Christopher Jepsen

The women's softball team opened its 1988 campaign in dazzling form by pummeling hapless Amherst 18-5 at Cole Field on Saturday. First year coach Dave Caputi was pleased with the women's all-around performance, which included 19 hits, of those 3 doubles and a triple, commenting, "We played well for an opening game."

In a game where all members of the squad participated, there were many individuals who stood out. Perhaps the brightest star was freshman pitcher Cathy Hanclich, who threw the entire game, giving up six hits, striking out five, and surrendering only one earned run through seven innings.

The game started a little shaky for the Ephwomen when the Lady Jeffs produced two unearned runs to begin the contest. The Lady Jeffs reached on a walk and a hit batter, and Hanclich was able to retire two hitters before an infield throwing error brought home the two baserunners. The freshman, showing the composure of a senior, struck out the next batter to end the threat.

Neither the lead nor the Ephwomen's opening day jitters

seemed to last long as they countered with 5 runs in both the first and third innings. The eight run lead not only put the game out of reach, but proved to be demoralizing to the visitors, who could muster only three more runs for the rest of the game, and those came in the seventh and final inning.

Offensively for the Ephwomen, three hitters led the way: Nancy Hedeman '89 produced a single and a double, as well as 3 RBI's; Jackie Weider '91 also punched out a single and a double; and Hanclich helped her own cause by contributing with 2 singles and a double, as well as 3 RBI's.

The women try to make it two in a row this Thursday when they travel to Union to face the ever dangerous Dutchwomen.

Laxmen's comeback bid foiled in OT

by Marc McDermott

"All my years of coaching and I've never seen anything like it. Everything they did worked, the ball took bounces into their sticks and we were caught out of position."

Coach Renzie Lamb's sentiments were felt by everyone who watched the Hamilton lacrosse team burst to a 6-0 lead over the Ephs after only four minutes of play at Cole field last Saturday. Goalie Robbie Lambert '90 made no saves during the defensive collapse against the team which ended Williams' season last year with a 15-11 defeat.

The Eph defense tightened up, however and the offense managed to control the ball with help from middies Tony Fuller '89 and Ted Rodgers '91 who continued to control over 60% of the faceoffs. By the end of the half the difference had been cut by one and the Continentals led 8-3.

Smith, Boyd lead comeback
The Ephs refused to go down quietly as they staged a comeback in the second half nearly as impressive as Hamilton's opening. Freshman Ian Smith and Senior Billy Boyd combined for seven goals on the game and Robbie Lambert stopped seven shots while allowing only one goal per quarter before junior midfielder Doug Gilbert knotted the contest at 10 with only 1:17 left. Jon Edie '88 and Dan Calichman '90 also scored while Gilbert had two assists and Edie one.

As both teams scrambled to avoid overtime, Williams fell victim to a one minute penalty with only nine seconds remaining when Smith was flagged for checking above the shoulders while trying to scoop a ground ball. Usually, referees refrain from calling marginal penalties late in a close game, and the

Assalante new tennis coach; leads men past SUNY Albany

Paul Assalante got his Williams College coaching career started off on the right foot, as his men's tennis team swept by SUNY Albany 7-2 on Wednesday.

Assalante takes over the tennis and squash coaching position from Sean Sloane, who left Williams to join the United States Tennis Association. Assalante spent the last three years as director of racquet sports at the Apawamis Club in Rye, New York. Before that, he coached for ten years at the U.S. Military Academy in West Point.

His Cadet tennis and squash teams both posted impressive records during his tenure. In eight years, he coached three All-American squash players and led his teams to a 98-54 mark. In tennis, his teams posted 116 victories in nine seasons. Assalante also served as executive director of the Rules and Infractions Committee of the U.S. Squash Racquet Association, as well as secretary-treasurer of the Eastern Tennis Association.

In addition to his coaching successes, Assalante is quite an accomplished athlete himself. Currently ranked second in the nation in doubles squash, he also captured the New England individual gymnastic championship as an all-arounder in his senior year at Springfield ('74) and was ranked eighth in the country in the college division.

The tennis team first practiced under its new coach on their spring break trip to San Diego, where Assalante met them. "I'm really enthused about the new coach. He's really bringing a lot of energy and enthusiasm to the program," said number three singles player Steve Buxbaum '90.

In the victory over Albany, the Ephs got singles victories from number two player Marc Caltabiano '90 in straight sets, and three set victories from numbers four through six, Robby Hallagan '88, Pler Friend '88, and Brad Hunt '90. Friend's match featured an exciting comeback by the senior co-captain, as Friend captured the third set with a 7-5 tiebreaker win.

That victory provided the momentum for the Ephs going into the doubles competition, where they took all three matches in three sets to finalize the score at 7-2. The netters faced the Panthers of Middlebury today at home, and play against Clark at home Thursday and Tufts away on Saturday.

Women first, Men fourth at Westfield Invitational

by Kristen Tallo

The women's track team sprinted to victory in the final mile relay to edge Trinity 105-102 in the season-opening Westfield State College Invitational on Saturday. The men beat out Middlebury to squeeze in at fourth, trailing host Westfield State, Trinity, and the Coast Guard.

The women's team was breathing the exhaust of leading Trinity until surging ahead in the last three events. Ann Dannhauer '90 and senior co-captains Sara St. Antoine (who also took second in the 800 meter) and Sarah Pierce began by scooping up all three top positions of the 3000 meter run. Mika Brzezinski '90 swelled hopes for victory by capturing first place in the 5000 meter run in 19:38.8, upsetting nationally ranked cross-country runner Gail Wehrli of Trinity.

Trinity nipped in final

Williams was tied with Trinity when Kim Barndollar '91, Dannhauer, Joan Davis '88 (winner of the 200m), and co-captain Dawn Macauley '89 (who collected firsts in both the high hurdles and the 400m) went into the final relay. "We just hammered away and sandbagged them with no difficulty whatsoever," said Macauley. Both the Ephs and second place Trinity left the rest of the field at the starting gate, as none of the other three teams scored even twenty points.

Spotlighted first-place events were: the triple jump, won by Sue Northern; the discus, won by Meg Brown '91; and the 1500m run, won by Anne Platt '91. Karlyn McNall '90 also bested the school record in the long jump by a half inch, flying 16'4" in taking second in that event.

For the men, Carey Simon '90 breezed over the finish line first in the 200m run. Dave Nadelman '89, Ted Arrowsmith '88 and Evan Driscoll '91 cruised in at second in the 800m, 5000m, and steeplechase respectively.

Notable third place performances were Mike Simpson '90 (hammerthrow), Scott Powers '88 (long jump and 200m), and the 400m relay team of Simon, John Berger '89, Lars Hem '90 and John Walker.

Records fall

The members of the women's team displayed blatant disdain for the record book, breaking five marks during pre season events. At the Florida relays over break, Platt, Pierce, Morris and St. Antoine established a new record in the four mile relay with a time of 22:02. Pierce and Platt were joined by Davis and Dannhauer to pare down their distance medley relay time to 12:33.7. The Duke Invitational of April 1-2 was the site of a history-making 100m hurdle time of 15.92 by Junior Dawn Macauley, who broke her own record which had stood for two years. Macauley's 400m record was topped by Davis at 59.39, while Dannhauer came in five seconds under the 1500m record at 4:43.37.

Shining for the Men at Duke were Nadelman, who sailed home with a first place 4:06.4 in the 1500m, and Arrowsmith, whose 9:53.5 steeplechase qualified him for the Div. III New Englands.

The track teams will join Connecticut College to face Trinity again on April 16.

Women's Lax at 6-1 after stellar start

by Mariam Nafficy

"Good aggressiveness. Good skills. Good passing." These were the reasons, according to coach Chris Larson-Mason, that the women's lacrosse team beat Bates last Saturday by a score of 11-6, raising its record to a promising 2-0 in the league and 6-1 overall after last Wednesday's win against Division II Springfield.

Coming back from winning a scrimmage against Bowdoin the day before, the team displayed a quickness and depth which started Sunday's game off in the right direction. Co-captain Mara Burnett '88 scored first during the Eph-dominated first half, followed by one Bates score and goals from Mo Flaherty '90 and freshman standout Bevin Cooper. The score at the half stood at 4-1, even though Larson-Mason and Burnett said that the Bates All-American goalkeeper had "shaken [the team] up" in the beginning.

The Ephs then proceeded to demolish a fairly weak Bates defense with six consecutive goals. Flaherty smoothly intercepted a Bates pass and surprised the goalkeeper with a quick throw, then Burnett drove down the field, dodging the Bates defense and scoring easily. Lisa Tenerowicz '88 scored on a penalty shot, and subsequent scoring combinations of Beth Bernheimer '88 to Cooper, Flaherty to Tenerowicz, and Cooper to Bernheimer proved unstoppable.

Speed and mental toughness
Williams seemed to tire during the last ten minutes of the game, when Bates did most of its scoring. However, the Ephs' defense rebounded, and goals by Amy Kershaw '90 and Flaherty sealed their win. Burnett cited Jeannette Owen '90 and co-captain Christine Boddicker '88

as standout defense players during the game, adding that "as a whole our defense is really solid. There are no holes." Burnett also felt that speed and mental toughness were reasons for the Eph victory.

That same speed and mental toughness seemed to serve the team well last Wednesday, when it beat Springfield by a score of 11-5. This is a definite landmark of improvement for the team, which were beaten by Springfield last year by one goal. This impressive victory followed an equally impressive Spring Tour in Florida, where the women's record was 4-1. Beating Hartwick, Greenwich Academy, Wesleyan, and Mount Holyoke, they fell only to Division I Cornell and by only one goal.

The laxwomen host Skidmore at Cole Field this afternoon and travel to Boston to take on Tufts this Saturday.

Bevin Cooper '91 dekes the confused Bates goalie as she notches one of her two goals in the squad's 11-6 win on Sunday. Cooper also added an assist for the 6-1 Ephwomen, who have continued their winning ways from Florida, where they were 4-1. (Scala)

Trustees ok faculty housing, Jewish center

by Peter Balaban

The Board of Trustees authorized the college to move forward on planning for several long-range projects, including a new Jewish center and townhouses for junior faculty, when it was on campus last weekend.

College Treasurer and trustee secretary William Reed said the townhouses would be aimed at improving housing arrangements now available to junior faculty members, and are needed because of the variety of junior faculty lifestyles (spouses living elsewhere, whether they have children or not). Reed said the townhouses, which will probably cost around $3 million, could be located near Tyler House or near the Stetson apartments behind Mission Park.

The degrees committee decided that the theme of next fall's convocation will be a celebration of the 25th anniversary of the Civil Rights movement, Reed said, but he said he did not know the names of the speakers yet.

Stand-alone

Reed said the Jewish center would be a stand-alone structure located somewhere on campus and would cost between $1 million and $1.25 million, which the college will try to raise from donations. He said the center was a high priority for the trustees. The Jewish Association currently meets in the Kuskin Center in the basement of Thompson Memorial Chapel.

The trustees were briefed on Friday by Assistant to the President for Affirmative Action Nancy McIntire and Dean of the Faculty George Goethals about the college's affirmative action policy. Goethals said that they had asked that the issue be put on the trustee's agenda because of events on campus over the past few months.

"They're very interested in the issue and what the college is doing," Goethals said Saturday. "They want to be well-informed," he added. "It (affirmative action) is a very important goal for them as well as for us."

Reed said the Friday meeting included an in-depth discussion

Gay awareness week challenges assumptions

by Dan Skwire

Despite cold and slushy weather, over 100 people gathered around Chapin steps Friday to listen to students and professors speak about gay pride and gay experience at Williams.

The rally was part of Lesbian/Gay/Bisexual Rights Week, sponsored by the Williams Bisexual, Gay and Lesbian Union. Other events during the week included the distribution of stickers to student mailboxes that read, "Why Assume I'm Heterosexual?" as well as a number of lectures and a letter writing campaign in Baxter Hall.

In past years, the BGLU has sponsored a gay awareness day, but this was the first time events lasted a week.

"We wanted to challenge the campus to examine their homophobia," said senior Katie Kent, a BGLU leader, in explaining why the group decided to hold a week of events. "A week makes more of a continuous confrontation, while a day is easily dismissed."

Kent reported enthusiastic participation from many students and faculty, although she added that not everyone responded positively. "It has given a lot of air to homophobic comments," she

Seniors survive a winter of interviews

by Rob Welsberg

A veteran of the battle for jobs of 1988, Lorri Williams '88 recalled one of her scarier interviewing experiences.

"The interviewer suddenly said, 'You have 30 seconds to tell me what one percent of a million is. Go.'"

Williams is one of 300 seniors who went through the recruiting process this year, according to Office of Career Counseling Director Fatma Kassamali. The process begins in the fall as seniors get a sense of their options.

"Fall is where you try to narrow down — to get your resume together, to go to information sessions," Jonny Hollenberg '88 said. The OCC starts fledgling job hunters on their way with career panels and sessions with alumni, Kassamali said.

The real interview process begins with company pre-screening folders, one per company, into which students put their resumes to apply for interviews.

Historical groups criticize Hopkins Hall renovations

by Michael Reisman

Renovation of Hopkins Hall has destroyed its historical integrity, according to letters written to the state's Executive Director of Environmental Affairs by the Massachusetts and Williamstown Historical Commissions.

Although James Hoyte, the state's director of environmental affairs, ruled that the college will not have to file a detailed environmental impact report for the $7.2-million project, members of the commissions are upset that the college was not required to file an environmental notification form, which opened the project up for public comment, until a large part of the construction had already taken place.

The college filed an ENF in February as part of its application for a loan from the state to fund the project and other projects that have already been

Make it your business

Tolerant. Polite. Not as bad as it could be. These were words used by students at a rally held last Friday on Chapin steps. The rally happened to be about gay rights, and the speakers happened to be gay and bisexual students and professors who were talking about difficulties they faced coming out and admitting their sexual preference in a closed community. But the words apply equally well to life at Williams for members of any minority group, no matter how you define minority.

If you need any proof of this, try to remember the last time you asked a Black or Asian student what kind of difficulties he or she faces in a community that is predominately white and for the most part unwilling to openly discuss issues of race.

Or when was the last time you asked someone who you knew was gay what kind of difficulties he or she faces at a place like Williams and what you could do to understand those difficulties.

When was the last time you asked?

Most students seem to think that just letting people 'be' is enough. "After all, it's none of my business," we say. And if members of the community who are in the minority find it difficult to adjust to life at Williams, the responsibility to deal with their difficulties falls on their shoulders, not ours. But that's where we are wrong.

As members of a community that claims to encourage diversity, we are responsible for allowing people to view their differences as a source of pride rather than something to be stifled or hidden. The way to do this is not by ignoring people who are in the minority, but by acknowledging and appreciating their differences. The responsibility falls on the majority to make Williams more than just tolerant and polite. We have to find out what we can do to make life in a small and isolated community more open and supportive.

Don't compare racist S. Africa to Israel in W. Bank

To the Editor:

I would like to enlighten Mr. Edward Feltzinger on his erroneous comparison in his letter to the editor equating the situation in South Africa with that in Israel. As the American Jewish Congress has pointed out, the two situations are vastly different.

First, in South Africa, an 18 percent white minority forcibly rules an 82 percent non-white majority which has hardly any political rights. Israel, on the other hand, is a democracy, with an 83 percent Jewish majority and a 17 percent Arab minority. Each person has a single vote, can be elected to office and enjoys full equality before the law.

Regarding the West Bank and Gaza, their status differs entirely from that of South Africa as well. Israel has not annexed the territories, leaving the door open to negotiations and is thus prevented, under International law, from granting citizenship to the Palestinian residents. In contrast, the racist government of South Africa denies full citizenship to its non-white majority.

Israel's Declaration of Independence, issued May 14, 1948, proclaims that it welcomes Arabs within its borders to share full citizenship. Because of the very real danger of terrorist incidents, travel in Israel by non-citizens is subject to regulations.

South Africa has refused even to consider negotiations with black leaders. Israel has always sought to negotiate directly with Palestinians from the territories or with a Jordanian-Palestinian delegation.

All this is not to diminish the plight of the Palestinians which has caused much distress within Israel. There is great tragedy in the fact that moderate Palestinians who have been willing to attempt negotiations have either been assassinated or dissuaded by intimidation from such attempts by the PLO. Until the Palestinian leadership acknowledges the right of the state of Israel to exist, the sad situation in the West Bank and Gaza will not be ameliorated.

Israel will soon celebrate its fortieth anniversary. In that brief time span, it has not been allowed to relax its vigilance in a hostile environment. The West Bank and Gaza were won in a war waged simultaneously by Egypt, Syria and Jordan against Israel in 1967. Hopefully the next forty years will bring peace to the region.

WCFM's idea of a joke isn't very funny

To the Editor:

WCFM, the Williams College sponsored radio station, plays an ad that pokes fun at an unfunny topic: drunk driving. This must stop. The advertising cart, entitled dancing and driving, was created to lampoon an anti-drinking and driving cart. To some, most notably the directors of WCFM, this is funny. To me it is disgusting. WCFM is, in a sense, the voice of Williams College, and it is heard by residents of our community. Think, for a minute, what type of image this cart projects. Williams College finds drunk driving humorous. Think how this looks to the teenagers in our community.

In the past Williams has made a great effort to aid the community. It should, for Williams College, as a prominent resident of Williamstown, has a responsibility to support the community. This advertisement, however, works directly against this goal and only serves to damage Williams' reputation. The directors of WCFM, as spokespeople for the College, should take their roles a little more seriously and think about the impact of their actions. For starters, the directors of WCFM should apologize for their insensitivity and destroy the cart. Otherwise Williams College will cease to be a responsible member of its community.

The experience of thesis writing is probably a lot like giving birth

by Lewis Collins '88

Giving birth to a thesis is a fairly major ordeal. There is the research, the writing and rewriting, and the editing. Even when I wasn't working on the beast, I was worrying about it: was my research thorough enough? am I getting my point across? will my thesis help me win friends and influence people later in life?

When I submitted my proposal last May, I'm glad they didn't tell me that I would consult nearly 100 sources, take almost 800 notecards, write over 300 pages and compile 542 footnotes. I might have reneged, but then Jesup Hall wouldn't have had to take out that loan to keep me in computer paper (now you know the real reason for next year's increased tuition).

At the end of May I left school for home and your typically relaxing and humid Tennessee summer. I had a job lined up — I think it was called banking — but I was much more interested in training for football, my summer-league baseball team, the poolside, the never-say-die Atlanta Braves ... and, of course, my thesis.

People still raise an eyebrow when I tell them I devoted all that time to John Singleton Mosby and Confederate Guerrilla Warfare in the Civil War. But, to be perfectly honest, I found it very stimulating. Here was a guy who called up a few of his buddies from the farms of Northern Virginia and said, "Let's go bother the Yankees." This they did so effectively that, as I would argue, they prolonged the Civil War for six months.

Most of my Northern friends, however, are quite skeptical of my stated conclusion. They are certain that my true intention was not to compose an analytical and well-documented argument. Instead, they claim that my thesis should be entitled, "Why We Lost," and they insist that I was actually trying to spark a radical "South's gonna rise again" movement amongst my kinkfolk and neighbors. "In wars," they say, "we're 10-1. You guys are 0-1, and you talk too slow."

Although I had grand illusions of getting ahead during the summer, it was simply not in the cards. I read a couple of books on the beach during the family vacation, but all that accomplished was greasing the pages with suntan oil and getting sand in the bindings.

I did make some small strides in the summer, but instead of feeling like I was on top of things, I could only focus on the huge task ahead when I returned to school in September. In other words, I was scared. To make a long story short, I devoted first semester to my thesis. Sure, I spent a lot of time on football, some on my senior history seminar, and close to none on my other two classes, but my thesis was my raison d'être. I was my thesis. My thesis and I were one.

It was a very loving, nurturing, intense and symbiotic relationship for that first semester. Soon my friends didn't remember me. They forgot that I go by my middle name and, relapsing into freshman-days form, called me by my "Claude" praenomen. But it didn't bother me. I had conceived a baby, a new and wonderful form of life, and I was growing heavier and heavier with child. How many males of any species can say that?

When I finally took a breath, it was Christmas. Thanksgiving must have passed me by. Maybe that was the reason the snack bar brought a cold turkey sandwich and chocolate frost to carrel #57. After a quick Christmas break, I returned to the familiar confines of Sawyer. I then realized that I had two boxes full of notecards, a lot of blank computer disks and only three months until April 11. In my dreams that night, to the tune of the Gilligan's Island theme song, I kept hearing "... a three month tour, a three month tour."

And, just as the song promises, the weather started getting rough. Instead of spending my waking hours in the library, I now developed an affinity for my computer. Not only did the thesis fulfill my Winter Study academic commitments, my baby satisfied my social and athletic desires as well. As I said, my thesis and I were one. Like Lolita for Humbert, it was the "light of my life, fire of my loins, my sin, my soul."

Did I ever consider aborting the beast? I sure did. But by this time, my first trimester of pregnancy was over, thus rendering such action a felony. Besides, I had now written about 100 pages, and I thought I could see the light at the end of the tunnel. That light turned out to be one of those reflectors in the middle of a dark highway.

Spring, as usual, is flying by. So did my thesis during the second semester. I worked on it day and night; and, during the month before spring break, I was on a chapter-per-week pace. Writing was now second nature, I was in a groove, and I knew what I wanted to say. I was also determined to finish my first draft before vacation, so that I could fully enjoy my final fling in Florida with the baseball squad.

While in Florida, however, I received an unexpected boost. One afternoon, as my teammates and I sprawled about the pool, I nonchalantly pulled out chapter 1. To my surprise, there was soon a host of Ephmen crowded around my chaise longue. "Chapters," they demanded. "We want chapters." I quickly obliged, and the fellows were soon perusing my endeavor with ravenous gusto. Although my pages were again besmirched with suntan oil, it was not fruitless. I'll bet there is no baseball squad in America that knows more about John Mosby!

Having typed the final corrections onto the computer the previous night, I awoke early Monday, April 11 full of excitement and hope (hoping, for example, that I wouldn't trip on the way to the computer center and drop my disk in a puddle). I reached Jessup uneventfully and, in answer to my prayers, the computer expectorated my entire thesis without a glitch. I had finally given birth to my long-awaited baby!

With the Chariots of Fire theme ringing in my ears, I climbed the Stetson Hall stairs, turned the corner and approached the History office to submit the completed beast. But my ear-to-ear smile was soon wiped away when I turned the knob and found the door tightly locked. The sign said, "Gone to lunch." I was convinced it was a conspiracy.

Thirty minutes later, I returned to the office to find the History Department waiting for my baby with open arms. I gladly relinquished it. Now it was time to celebrate. As Horace put it, "Nunc est bibendum."

Since September, several other History thesis parents and I had been planning a trip to the local watering hole for April 11. But to my utter chagrin, my finest moment was again spoiled. Upon checking my valid Tennessee driver's license — which correctly labels me legal in all fifty states and around the world — the bartender refused to serve me. "I don't accept out of state licenses," he muttered.

By this time I was down on my hands and knees. "But I'm twenty-two years old," I complained. "Here's my college I.D. Here's my old driver's license. Here's my Master Card, my bankcard and my social security card. And here's my library card." But it was to no avail. My twelve forms of identification were unsatisfactory, the Purple Pub would not serve me, and I left the establishment with my head in my hands.

But all was not lost. That bartender soon went off duty, and we bounded back to the Pub with even more enthusiasm than on our first trip. Everything went smoothly, and we were soon reminiscing about our respective children.

"Was it worthwhile?" you ask me as I ease into my well-deserved senior slide. "Yes," I reply without hesitation. "Especially since it's over." There were certainly hard times, and I often wondered what I had gotten myself into. But in the end, I felt a great sense of accomplishment. I tackled a difficult task, and now it's done. And besides, in the years since Mary Shelley wrote Frankenstein, how many people can claim to be the proud parent of a monster?

Lewis Collins recently finished writing a History thesis.

The College Council: a reporter's views on its politics and ideas

by Bill Savadove '91

An editorial in the March 15 issue of The Record described College Council as "a good beat for Record cub reporters." From November 12 to March 10 (the end of President Carter Zinn's administration) I was that cub reporter.

In a journalistic sense, College Council was difficult to cover. Meetings usually consisted of tedious, bureaucratic procedure punctuated by furious debate. I found it even more of a challenge to remain silent, in my capacity as a reporter, and not try to make a point during debate. Council members tended to be paranoid about what they were saying; they feared being misquoted or quoted out of context even when what they were saying was of no importance to my article. After the second meeting, my relationship, at least with the officers, became more workable. Specific references to my presence finally stopped when council members learned that I wasn't going to take an off the cuff remark or off color joke and put it in Quote of the Week. In the last three weeks of Zinn's term, there was some spirited Record bashing. This criticism arose when the council discussed funding for The Issue and the amount of payment The Record should receive for running a political ad. So I would like to digress here a moment and try to answer Jim Munson's pointed question: "Why do we need The Record at all?"

The Record was harshly criticized for the now infamous January 26 issue which gave coverage to "keg etiquette," a phrase coined by Zinn. This coverage sparked a clever satirical letter and, in part, contributed to the founding of The Issue. I maintain that this anger was misdirected. The Record was covering discussion that occurred at both a CUL and a College Council meeting. Instead of questioning the coverage of this event, students should have reacted to the fact that a proposal regarding keg etiquette was seriously discussed by the CUL and College Council at all. If for nothing else, this campus needs a newspaper to find out what committees and the College Council are doing.

Zinn, to his credit, kept the meetings running smoothly. But, like the consummate politician, he engaged in a certain amount of blame avoidance. Once, in explaining why he barred an individual from the Junior Advisor selection committee, Zinn said, "I thought there were too many rugby players on it. But I love rugby players. I love you all." Zinn also spent a fair amount of time praising the council. Perhaps this was a morale building device, but often it seemed the amount of praise was disproportionate to the actual achievement.

There is no doubt that all of the officers worked hard. Secretary Trace Blankenship brought solid opinions and an impressive knowledge of parliamentary procedure to meetings. Vice President

Nicole Melcher, although not as vocal as Zinn or Blankenship, always had information ready. In addition, she handled the difficult job of running the elections. Treasurer Mark Ralsbeck rarely spoke at meetings unless asked for comment, but my sense was that he worked very strongly behind the scenes to handle funding requests.

On the council itself, Matt Levin was one of the few who consistently asked the questions that needed to be asked. Amy Scott was another. As a freshman, I was personally disappointed that the freshmen representatives on the council rarely spoke. The council's biggest problem was lack of attendance. Twice, the council lacked a quorum, which meant no votes could be taken. Towards the end of his term, Zinn addressed criticism that the council was serving as a rubber stamp. He did not mean this term to have a negative connotation. Rather, he was using it to describe a particular administrative method. For what the council was doing at the time, establishing budget and election guidelines, this was the best and quickest way to get things done. This method was appropriate for the time, and, furthermore, the votes were often unanimous. But I think that this method does point to a larger problem — the failure of the College Council to examine more serious and far-reaching issues.

Much of the work of the council was bureaucratic in nature. Legislation concerning standing rules to monitor budget allocations, sophomore seats of representation, and standing rules for election procedures was generated by the body itself. Other issues that were acted on did hold some importance with students: the 24 hour study area, the proposed lock system, various funding requests, and parking. For these types of issues, the council served its role admirably. But the council did not achieve any truly far-reaching legislation. Granted, some gains were made in the area of women's athletics; the council helped to resolve field use conflicts, establish a rotation schedule for the purchase of new uniforms, and set up a athletics liaison committee. In other areas, however, progress was small. The council did a survey on Division III courses, but did not follow up with recommendations. There should have been a more prompt follow up to the race relations panel, which was partly sponsored by the council. The council did make recommendations on proposed math department course changes, but strictly in an advisory capacity.

This is not to say that the sometimes trivial "ideas from the council" section of the meeting should be eliminated. The College Council should do something if Williams C does not have a bike rack. However, these requests should be balanced out by more serious, controversial issues.

Trace Blankenship said, "This year we showed that we would leave no stone unturned in going after solutions. Our next move is to convince every student that there are no limitations to what he or she can ask the council to do." Let's hope that Blankenship goes after some bigger stones this term.

Teacher evaluations systematized

by Scott J. O'Callaghan

After two hours of heated debate, the faculty gave their approval to a uniform procedure for evaluating the teaching of non-tenured faculty. The new procedure, approved by a margin of 37-30, will go into effect next fall.

Individual departments have in the past been allowed to determine the combination of techniques used in evaluating the teaching of junior members of the department. The evaluations were then used by the Committee on Appointments and Promotions in making reappointment and tenure decisions.

The proposal makes mandatory the use of a new, shortened Student Course Evaluation Survey for all courses. It also requires that tenured department members interview ten students per year for each non-tenured department member.

The proposal establishes guidelines for in-class visits by senior members of the department, but it does not make such visits mandatory since faculty were largely divided over the issue.

Acting Dean of the Faculty George Goethals said the new procedure will increase the amount of information collected from students and systematize

Classes with a British accent: Williams prepares for tutorials

by Stephanie Jones

Beginning next semester, Williams students will not have to go to Oxford to take tutorials. Descriptions of the tutorials were recently distributed to student mailboxes, and students will be able to register for them next week along with their other classes.

According to the statement on the tutorial package, "[a tutorial] will help the student gain insight and understanding of what knowledge is... The student presentation drives the tutorial."

The program has gone through many changes since the Committee on Educational Policy began working with the proposal last year. According to Assistant Professor of English Stephen Tift, a CEP member, the original idea was that students would be required to take a tutorial sometime during their time at Williams. Tift also said that tutorials were planned as primarily a sophomore program, although some thought they would work better with seniors.

A preliminary model of the tutorial program was taken to the faculty for advice, Tift said. This resulted in the current program, which is completely voluntary and aimed at all classes. According to Tift, because the tutorials are no longer required, fewer are offered than originally planned.

Basic notion unchanged

Professor of Economics Henry Bruton, who is in charge of the program and planning to offer a tutorial, said that the basic notion of a tutorial has not changed.

According to Assistant Professor of Physics William Wootters, who offered a tutorial this year and is planning to offer it again next year, the only important change in the program since the faculty voted on it last year is that instructors now have the option of including a final exam.

A meeting for students interested in tutorials was held last Monday, but only about 15 students attended. In a separate interview, Bruton said he was not worried by the small turnout.

"My hope is that most students simply found the package and the statement to be sufficient," he said.

Bruton, Wootters, Assistant Professor of Philosophy Peter Lip-ton, Professor of English Peter Berek and College Registrar Charles Toomajian were present to answer questions about the program.

"As far as we can ascertain, no other place (in the United States) has a real tutorial program," Bruton said at the meeting. He emphasized that the tutorials would not be another type of independent study, research project or Winter Study.

Even with new lots, College foresees restricted parking

by Todd Owens

The Ad Hoc Committee on College Parking Facilities and Policy, in their final report to college administrators, recommended that the college build new parking lots near the Stetson Faculty Apartments and at the end of Spring Street. If College Treasurer William Reed has his way, however, the number of cars on campus will be restricted by not allowing freshmen and sophomores to have cars.

Reed, who will be a part of the administrative group who will make the final decision, said "I'll recommend that we limit cars to seniors and juniors." He said that Williams used to have such a rule. "I hate to spend money on parking which could be spent on other things."

The committee's report recommended that freshmen be prohibited from having cars, Assistant Dean of the College William Wagner, who chairs the committee, said. The Freshman Council reported to the College Council that they supported this recommendation.

According to Wagner, the parking committee submitted its final report to administration officers late last week. The committee has been meeting since the beginning of the year to address the problems caused by an insufficient number of parking places on campus and traffic congestion.

The committee recommended that the college start a shuttle service to Albany airport and bus station. They also suggested a taxi service so that students could get around campus more easily. These programs, if approved by the administration, could go into effect next year, Wagner said.

Reed said that he expected the shuttle to Albany to begin next year, but was unsure about the taxi service. "My main concern right now is getting people to planes and trains," Reed said.

The committee also recommended a change in the method of enforcing parking revisions. A limit in the number of tickets received in a term or year would be established, and a student who exceeded this limit would lose the right to have a car on campus for the remainder of the year.

Wagner said that they prioritized the college's options for building new parking lots. The number which will be built depends on the administration, he said. According to Reed, the administration should reach a final decision by the end of the academic year.

According to Wagner, the committee concluded that, based on the size of the problem and financial constraints, the college needs to build approximately 150 new parking spaces. The committee recommended that the college build a 70-space lot in the field between the tennis courts and the Stetson Faculty Apartments, and another 60-space lot in Denison Park, which is located at the end of Spring Street. Wagner estimated the cost of these two lots at approximately $250,000.

These proposals represent a change from the preliminary report of the committee. In its first report, the committee recommended building a new lot in the field below Thompson Infirmary and expanding the lot

Pine Cobble won't threaten water

by Michael Reisman

The college's proposed 70-lot faculty housing subdivision on Pine Cobble came one step closer to approval by town officials last week with news that the development would not adversely affect town water supplies.

"From the information we have now, the subdivision would not impact the quantity or quality of water," said Michael Healey, senior hydrogeologist with the BSC-Group-Boston Inc.

The BSC Group prepared the site plans for the $3 million subdivision, which is proposed for the lower slope of Pine Cobble mountain at the intersection of North Hoosac Road and Locke Avenue.

The town has retained the services of an independent hydrogeologist, Linda Marler, of Arlington, to review the tests done by college engineers. In accordance with town by-laws, the college will pay for Marler's services, according to Planning Board Chairperson Charles Schlesinger.

Below recharge area

At a town planning board hearing last week, Healey said that test borings on the site have shown that the proposed subdivision would lie below the portion of the mountain that acts as a water recharge area, where surface water seeps into underground water supplies.

The ground underneath the subdivision is composed of glacial till, which is largely impervious to water, Healey said. As a result, water falling on the slopes of Pine Cobble does not penetrate through the soil to the fractured bedrock underneath.

The town's Upland Conservation District prohibits building above the 1,300 foot elevation. Although the proposed lots would end at about the 1,050-foot elevation, local environmentalists said they worried that homes at even this level could impinge on the water recharge area that feeds the town wells. Some town officials and residents have stressed the need to fully examine the geology of Pine Cobble before any large-scale development is done.

"... the subdivision would not impact the quantity or quality of water."

According to Assistant Director for Construction Services Antonio Janairo, Marler will conduct a review of the information already gathered by the college and will submit her findings to the planning board by the end of the month. Janairo said that he hoped Marler's study would remove doubts in the town about the validity of the information that has been received.

The subdivision proposal must be approved by the Planning Board, which will hold at least one more hearing on the subject before it makes its decision. Schlesinger said that the board must decide before May 16.

Need to manage space

The Planning Board also asked the college to come up with a mechanism for managing and preserving the nearly 75 percent of the property that will remain open space within the development.

Director of Physical Plant Winthrop Wassenar said the college intends to own and maintain the open space below the 1,300-foot elevation for at least the first 10 years of the development's life. The land above that elevation could be transferred to the town or a conservation group such as the Williamstown Rural Lands Foundation, he said. No date was given for submission of a plan for open space management.

The college has filed a notice of intent with the town Conservation Commission, which it is required to do under the Wetlands Protection Act because the development will affect wetlands that exist at the intersection of Locke Avenue and North Hoosac Road. The commission will meet on April 28 to discuss the notice.

Stanford

The Williams Coalition Against Racist Education (CARE) recently included in its list of thirteen demands a request that all students take a course in minority history and/or culture. This requirement will soon become a reality at Stanford University, where freshmen will be required to study the works of women and minority authors beginning with the class of 1992. According to The Chronicle of Higher Education, students will choose from a group of year-long courses in which one text per quarter will "explicitly" deal with issues of race, gender, and class. The faculty senate passed the proposal in response to controversy over the university's "Cultures, Ideas and Values" requirement, which had required freshmen to choose one of eight year-long courses, each of which conformed to a core reading list that included no women or minority authors. Asked about the omissions, Paul Robinson, director of the "Cultures, Ideas and Values" program, said, "We couldn't see how to do it without appearing to be tokenistic."

Wesleyan

Two Wesleyan University women driving out of Indian Hill Cemetery at two a.m. on April 7 were stopped by a police officer who saw "a large piece of furniture sticking out of the car's trunk." The Hartford Courant reported that Nancy Herzog and Helen Papavizas, both sophomores, had used a crowbar to break into the cemetery's chapel and steal an antique organ. The two were charged with second-degree burglary and third-degree criminal trespass, among other counts. Damages to the Gothic Revival chapel's hand-carved wooden doors have not been estimated. The two women told police they had stolen the organ because "it would look good in their room."

North Adams State

The North Adams State College chapter of Beta Chi Gamma may not be allowed to sponsor its April 30 Roll-a-Keg fundraiser and following party for A Child's Wish Come True, a program which grants a wish to a seriously ill child. The event involves students rolling an empty beer keg down a five-mile course through the streets of North Adams. This year, according to The Transcript, the fraternity petitioned the town of Florida to allow it to hold the party in a lot across Route 2 from Giovanni's Restaurant. The town selectmen are hesitant about approving the party. "We only have three police officers to handle the crowd if something happened," said Chairman Wayne Boyce. "While you're doing a good thing for charity, I can't help but think that it's more of a party." A decision on the event is expected soon.

What do you think of the new tutorials?

Interviews by Stephanie Jones; Photographs by Valerie Losito

"I'm planning on taking one... One hour of class a week is a big plus, and there are no tests... I can be put on the spot once a week to read a paper and then have 6 days off."

— Mark Stepsis '89

"I think they're going to be incredibly hard."

— Bruce Young '90

"Most of them were science tutorials, and considering the number of science majors here I don't think that's fair. I thought it would have been better if the humanities had put more effort into it."

— Donna Murch '91

"I think they're a great idea, especially since they'll be able to give more students one-on-one contact with their professors."

— Judy Contil '91

"They sound fantastic, really interesting; I'm planning on taking one. It's great that Williams offers them."

— Erik Sebasta '91

"I find they're a lot like the classes that are already taught. I think they could have gone to the students and found out what their specified interests are."

Seniors trod the road off-traveled pre-screening, the lottery comes into play. Each student ranks 20 interviewing companies in order of preference. Then, Kassamail said, a computer chooses a schedule for the companies based on those preferences.

"I put down a lot of different things," Williams said. "My top six were consulting firms. I got no interviews with consulting firms."

From early February through spring break, students may have up to a dozen or more interviews to handle. Williams once had three in a single day.

"By the end of the day, I was numb," she said. "At 4:00 p.m. the interviewer is beat and you're beat."

Extra classes

Williams added that the interviews can take a toll on the rest of one's life. "Someone said it was like having two extra classes a week. For a lot of people it's really hard to get your schoolwork done," she said.

Anne Shulman '88 said, "It gets hard to think about school — looking back, I wish I had spent more time on my thesis, or just enjoying school."

Interviews vary, but everyone has an interview horror story.

"In a recent interview the interviewer went through the courses I took to see if I had any direction," Hollenberg said. "Then he asked me on the spot to formulate a five-step plan for the Monroe Doctrine in Honduras."

Hollenberg's interviews for a teaching position differed in format from business-oriented ones.

"All of mine were one-on-one and less formal; they didn't involve wearing suits. We talked about experiences that were interesting to the interviewer."

Avoid the crunch

Although Hollenberg's route was different than that of many seniors who go through the OCC, a good number of students avoid the February interview crunch altogether. Fifty seniors choose to pursue their futures without any contact with OCC, Kassamail said.

The interviewer went through the courses I took to see if I had any direction. Then he asked me on the spot to formulate a five-step plan for the Monroe Doctrine in Honduras.

Marcie Wallace '88, who is interested in a career in cognitive psychology, said that the companies performing work in that field do not come to OCC. Her job search was almost exclusively an individual effort, from locating companies in her field of interest to making contacts.

For many seniors, the process is still not over. "Now it's just a waiting process," Hollenberg said. "If you're lucky, you get an offer. I still have other options..."

Williams added that the end of the year brings release from senior interview anxiety. Under pressure, it can be hard to figure out that one percent of one million is ten thousand.

"I'm now doing an independent research project and... going to all those interviews now would be terrible," she said. "The disadvantage is that I may graduate and not have a job yet just because I didn't want to do that."

As spring approaches, interviewing seniors move into the final phase of the job search: the call-backs and second interviews.

"One company called me the same day as my interview, and the interviewer took ten of us out to dinner," said Williams. "Most just say, 'We'll get back to you' and have you call their travel office." She said that the travel to Boston and New York involved in second interviews was the most fun of the entire process. "You know they like you, and they usually treat you pretty well. You usually have to stay overnight, and they put you up."

Williams said she found the atmosphere of the second interview calmer.

Dance/Pornography connection explored

by Allison Brown

Visiting artists Marta Renzi and the Project concluded their week long residency at the college with performances this past Friday and Saturday of the dance/theatre piece, "Soft Sell" in the new dance performance space in the Lasell gymnasium.

The piece deals with the parallels between dance and pornography. It is the result of the collaborative efforts of Renzi, her husband, poet Daniel Wolff, and sculptor Harry Roseman, and was conceived out of the three artists' discussions and thoughts on the objectification of women's bodies inherent in both pornography and dance performance.

Through movements and words, the piece explores the issues of privacy, sexuality, silence, voyeurism, and objectification as well as the underlying feelings and "humanity" of both viewer and viewed. By directly confronting and questioning social taboos and conventions, it forces the audience to understand its relationship to the performers as a pornographic one.

Roseman's sculpture was the first part of the work to be completed and thus served as the base on which the poet and choreographer shaped their contributions. The four sections of the piece accompany the four different scenes designed by Roseman.

The first set, a bed and chair set on a steeply angled platform, gives the audience a bird's eye view of a bedroom and the eerie sensation of being a fly on the wall, or a participant, in this intimate scene.

In following sections the bedroom space recedes, and the audience's relationship to the scene, and the dancer's in it becomes more separated and voyeuristic. The false perspective, exaggerated angles, and artificial colors of the scenery provides an effective backdrop from which Renzi and Wolff examine the tensions between the observer and the observed.

Renzi's choreography works with and against the contorted angles of the bed and chair; the dancers move around and on the raked stage naturally, and then collapse and slide making use of "real" gravity, using these punctuations to underscore the artificiality of the scene and scenery.

The dance incorporates many explicitly sexual gestures, a hand at the crotch, an arching back, legs spread to the audience, as well as cartoonish characterizations of nude dancers' mannerisms simultaneously attempting to arouse the audience and to shock it into questioning the nature of that arousal.

While Renzi's choreography focused on eliciting a visual and visceral response in the audience, Daniel Wolff's poetry provided accompaniment and a voice to the silence of the dancers and the dance. It served as a vehicle through which the audience could intellectualize their response to the movement and understand that the performers had personalities, and lives, and weren't just bodies onstage which could easily be objectified and forgotten.

The poems reflect different voices, male and female, and explore both men's and women's fears and feeling about their own and each other's bodies—looking at and being looked at by others in the contexts of life, pornography, and dance. These lines from Wolff's text provide a summary of the main issue of the piece, "How do you watch a person move, without eating their flesh with your eyes? You know how an audience . . . doesn't exist, trying to stay as still as they can, as if to say: 'We're not really here. We're just watching!'"

"Soft Sell" does not attempt to answer any of the moral or ethical questions that it raises about pornography. The artists themselves are not even in agreement on their feelings towards it. Instead, and perhaps more powerfully, it implicates the audience in a voyeuristic relationship with the performers, and forces them to realize and question their role as "viewer" from this personal vantage point.

The tension which arises from this makes the piece difficult and painful to watch, but by showing how pornographic objectification is manifest in dance and indeed, in all areas of life, "Soft Sell" succeeds not only in entertaining, but in educating those who see it.

Percussion Ensemble takes inventive beat

by Sean Timmons

Anyone who still thinks of percussion instruments as only appropriate for background accents or keeping the beat in a group of other instruments must have missed Saturday's Thompson Concert. The Percussion Group, ensemble-in-residence of faculty members at the University of Cincinnati, displayed a varied repertoire which showed how expressive, and even lyrical, percussion instruments can be.

The three man group started off the evening with a rag, "Log Cabin Blues," played on marimba and xylophone. Not only did each of the performers show fine mallet technique, executing difficult runs flawlessly, they were also careful to highlight the timbral differences between the instruments, which helped keep the sound from becoming too homogeneous.

Since the body of literature for percussion is a fairly young one, many of the pieces in it are performance art pieces as well. A striking example of this nature was "Raintree" (1983) by Toru Takemitsu. The stage started out in total darkness, and each time a player had a prominent line, he switched on his stand light. When the line ended, the light went out.

The visual element was very effective and added to the drama of the piece, but did not overshadow the organ-like tones of the bells and vibraphone. Indeed, through outstanding control of dynamics, the performers were able to make a surprising contrast between the harsh tones of the light and the mellower tones of the mallet instruments.

The highlight of the evening, however, was a more standard piece. The Percussion Group finished their concert with Minoru Maki's "Marimba Spiritual" (1984), a piece featuring that instrument against a background of Chinese drums, gongs and cymbals.

The marimba soloist had remarkable four stick technique, and his agility over the instrument was astounding, producing variations from lush chords to sharply accented dissonances. The piece, while obviously difficult, was definitely idiomatic to the instrument, and used its melodic and harmonic capabilities to the fullest. In addition, the accompanying parts for drums heightened the overall drama of the piece. At the end of the piece, the performers were given a well-deserved standing ovation.

The two John Cage pieces deserve mention for their creative use of everyday objects as percussion instruments. In the work "Credo in US," Cage requires the use of ordinary food cans as drums against the background of the traditional Cagan prepared piano. In addition, there are parts for record player and radio.

The other Cage piece, "Living Room Music," was again a kind of performance art piece, in which the players acted as if they were having an afternoon together in someone's sitting room (complete with portable window).

In the second movement, a Gertrude Stein poem was rhythmically readapted, and in the third, the players variously whistled, tapped cards on a table, flicked a lighter, and banged soda cans together. While the piece maintained a clear musical content, it was wonderfully amusing and the performers seemed to be having a great time with it.

ARTS IN VIEW

Tonight, Pulitzer prize-winning poet James Merrill will give a reading of his work at 8 PM in Brooks-Rogers. Also at 8 PM this evening, The Brass Ring will give a concert at the Clark Art Institute featuring works by Victor Ewald, Malcolm Forsythe, Stanley Weiner, and Enrique Crespo. Admission is $3.50; $3 for Friends of the Clark; and $2 for students. On Thursday, in Brooks-Rogers, Vina Chandra will give a sitar concert of classical Indian music. On Friday, April 22, the Berkshire Symphony Orchestra will perform in Chapin Hall at 8 PM. Admission is $4, or free with Williams ID. Williams Theatre will present Chekhov's "Three Sisters" on April 21, 22, 23 and 28, 29, 30 at 8 PM on the Adams Memorial Theatre Mainstage. Tickets are $2, or $1 with student ID. Two exhibitions, "New Acquisitions" and "American Prints," open on Saturday, April 23 at the Clark Art Institute. Also on Saturday, Anders Knutson will talk about his exhibition at the Williams College Museum of Art at 2 PM. The Ephratis will give a concert on Saturday at 8 PM in Chapin Hall. Admission is $1.

Newsbriefs

Williams' fees up 11 percent next year

Williams' tuition and fees will go up 11 percent next year, from $15,666 to $17,329, the largest increase in several years. College President Francis Oakley announced the changes in a letter sent last week to parents and members of classes of 1989-91.

Oakley cited the prices of goods and services that colleges and universities buy, which rise faster than the general rate of inflation, as a principal culprit.

But he also identified curricular changes and innovations approved by the faculty which will require some expansion of the teaching staff as a contributing factor.

The biggest jump will be in room fees, which will increase by 23 percent next year, from $1,550 to $1,910. Oakley attributed the rise to planned dormitory renovations.

The letter said the trustees have reaffirmed the college's continuing commitment and ability to meet the demonstrated financial need of students currently enrolled and who will be entering as freshmen in September.

"Students now receiving aid (whose family circumstances have not changed) can expect to have their aid increased to match our new levels of tuition and fees," it said. "And, because of this increase, some students will become newly eligible for help."

The letter said the trustees have increased the overall budget for financial aid.

College Treasurer William Reed said that the vast majority of students who apply to Williams also apply to other high priced schools, and in that league Williams does not stand out.

He said he does not think many students who would not qualify for financial aid but are not very wealthy are discouraged from applying because of increasingly high fees.

"I'm sure we're losing out on some," he said, "but you never know about the student who doesn't apply."

Jobs will be open to all students

Because of a shortage in Food Service student workers, the Financial Aid office has approved several changes intended to attract more students, particularly those not receiving financial aid.

Director of Financial Aid Philip Wick announced a bonus plan for students working in Food Service and a pay raise for second year Food Service student employees.

The Financial Aid office has also decided to allow non-financial aid students to apply for campus jobs during the first four weeks of the academic year. These changes, proposed by the Student Employment Review Committee, are scheduled to go into effect next fall, Wick said.

In the past, student employees have been forced to hold jobs for financial aid students for the first four weeks of an academic year. Next fall, however, employers will be able to hire any student who is interested in the job.

"Hopefully, this will increase the base of students who are willing to work," Wick said. A letter was sent to all financial aid students on April 4 which informed them of the change and encouraged them to seek jobs now for next year.

Under the new bonus plan, students working for Food Service are eligible to collect a $.50 per hour bonus. In order to qualify, students must work an average of 6 hours per week, have no more than one unexcused absence and work during finals. The bonus will be awarded at the end of a term. Driscoll Hall Manager Rob Parkinson-Shutt said that the current "Star Performer Program," which awards employees with gift certificates, is a similar idea on a smaller scale.

The pay raise will allow students who have been employed by Food Service for at least one full year to be paid at the C rather than B pay level, Wick said. According to Parkinson-Shutt, this is equivalent to a $.15 raise.

The Student Employment Review Committee began meeting last November to address a growing shortage of students on campus who were willing to work, especially in Food Service and to a lesser extent in Security and Sawyer Library, Wick said.

No single-sex entries in quad

Dean of Freshmen Joan Edwards said last week that there will be no single-sex entries in the Freshman Quad next year. Entries in East College and Fayerweather will remain single-sex.

This year there are nine single-sex freshman entries, six of which are in East and Fayerweather. Next year the six entries will be the only single-sex freshman entries on campus.

Edwards said she would prefer to have only two single-sex freshmen entries, one male and one female, but the structure of the two freshman dormitories in the Berkshire Quad made it impossible.

"There are a small number of students who request single-sex entries and I guess I'd like to honor that request," she said.

The problem lies in the bathroom situation in East and Fayerweather. There is only one bathroom per floor in both dormitories, and if the entries on each floor were made co-ed freshmen men and women would have to share bathrooms.

"I don't think I've got a problem with that," she said, "but parents or students might."

Edwards pointed out because the transition to college is such a big switch for freshmen, she wants to make things as comfortable as possible for them. And she said she thinks freshmen are probably more comfortable with single-sex bathrooms when they first come to college.

In both dormitories, men will live on the top and bottom floors and women will live on the second floor. Edwards said she hopes that arrangement will give the houses a more co-ed flavor.

FRS will go on

The faculty voted last Thursday to continue the Freshman Residential Seminars next year, after the FRS Evaluation Committee recommended the move.

FRS was originally supposed to run for two years and then stop for a year while it was evaluated. But the committee apparently felt the break was unnecessary.

"As the program progressed . . . it became quite clear that it was quite successful," said Vice Provost David Booth, a member of the evaluating committee.

Booth said the committee will do a full evaluation of FRS next year.

FRS participants live together in the same entry and take one course together during their two semesters as freshman.
